Historically however, and statistically, the British experience has been that the newspapers have not availed themselves of this opportunity because the newspaper's remedies lie in other directions. Surely, the most effective remedy is not going to a room—and I am not an expert—but it would seem to me that it is not going to a room and complaining to a committee, but you see the editorial pages of a newspaper.

Mr. Denhoff: Senator Prowse, I don't mean to interject here but if this committee did decide to do something in that regard, once again I would hope it would not be something of special benefit directed to newspapers.

In some places in the United States at least, possibly federally as well, they do have right-to-know laws regarding government—specified government documents.

There again I think I am right when it establishes that this is the right of everyone to know, not just the newspapers, and I don't think that we should be treated in any way as a special group. I think this should be a citizen's right to know.

Senator Prowse: Well, just a minute now. You are a very special group because the public depends on you for their information. I have to depend on what I read in the newspapers in order to know what is going on in the world.

There are a very, very few people that have the privilege of deciding what information the public are going to have. Now, surely to goodness that terrible responsibility ought to weigh heavily enough on you that you should always be conscious, as I was impressed by the fact that Mr. Garner was, so conscious of his desire to be fair, that he says "I won't print anything."

Mr. Denhoff: Senator, I agree that it is true to a large degree that the public depends on the press and its local press, but surely this is only because the reputation that newspapers have built up through the years, which people no longer...

For example, in a small city if you go to the annual meeting of the School Board and the annual meeting of the Town Council you will see five people there. It is because they know they have been able to depend on the newspapers.

Senator Prowse: But our researchers led us to believe, and newspaperman have come in and told us, that they are concerned about the fact that people don't consider the press as a credible source of information today.

Now, if I were in the press today I would be very, very concerned about anything that would help to make my image more credible.

Mr. Denhoff: I think the best answer we should have is that I think we should do our very best to do a damn good job.

Senator Prowse: Well, I think you are too easily pleased.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if Mr. Garner in view of his other statements to the effect that he was not too familiar with the way the British Press Council works—if you don't wish to put on the record sort of a qualification to this sentence which you have in your brief of the Press Council impinging on the freedom of the press.

I think you have said very candidly and very honestly that you were not too familiar with how the British Press Council works—is that correct?

Mr. Garner: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Well, how could you say that you do not favour a body similar to the British Council if you don't really know how it operates?

Mr. Garner: Well, in my mind, a press council was something that had some deterrent effect possibly, on what a newspaper could publish. I have heard of the British Press Council but not fully of all of its activities, and this was the basis for my statement here.

Mr. Fortier: In paragraph 19 of your brief Mr. Garner, you speak of newspapers lewding, or following opinions, then you say that your dictum at Peterborough is that you should present all the information that is available for the people to form their own opinions.

My question to you is: should not the newspaper have some opinions of its own?

Mr. Garner: We do.

Mr. Fortier: What do you do with those? Do you editorialize?

Mr. Garner: Editorializing, certainly. That is what an editorial page is for.

Mr. Fortier: Do you seek to lead the people in your opinions? Do you seek to lead the people in your opinion-giving or do you seek to follow them?

Mr. Garner: It isn't a case of leading following. It is an opinion which is voiced after due consideration and reached on the basis of what we think is the case.

Mr. Fortier: If you were up against a deadline on a major story, do you allow your desire to railroad the copy on occasion?

Mr. Garner: Well, I don't quite understand what you have in mind, but on this basis it is quite frequent that possibly a half an hour before deadline a news release will come which we cannot cover fully but we do give an abbreviated account of the story in our paper, and the next day give the full account.

Mr. Fortier: Is that what you understand that railroading of copy means?

Mr. Garner: I have never heard that expression in relation to copy.

Mr. Fortier: What is a 4-em dash?

Mr. Garner: It is a dash about one-quarter of an inch long.

Mr. Fortier: Do you employ kickers and decks in your newspapers?

Mr. Garner: Yes. Not decks-kickers.

Mr. Fortier: What is the purpose of a sub-lead?

Mr. Garner: A sub-lead to my mind is a lead that if you just read that much of it you got the main facts of the story.

Mr. Fortier: What is the difference between a lead paragraph and a sub-lead paragraph? Do you know the difference?

Mr. Garner: I am not as familiar with the complete editorial usage as Jack Denhoff is, for instance.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Garner, I am directing these questions to you at the moment because in your brief, in paragraph 4, I read that the initiative for all decisions regarding the presenting of the news and editorial opinion is left with the publisher. And you come here today as a publisher saying that you have this authority on the editorial side of the newspaper, and I wonder who having come up through the ranks, not on the editorial side but rather on the publishing and advertising and managerial side, you can say this?

Mr. Garner: When I say I have the full authority—the preventing of the news is the news itself. How it is handled in the paper—whether they put a two-column head on it or an eight-column head on it, this is decided by our make-up.

Mr. Fortier: Who is responsible for the editorializing in your newspaper?

Mr. Garner: Our managing editor. And in conference with him I can decide, or we can decide jointly, that a certain story should have so much display, and then it is his job to present it in the best way under those guidelines.

Now, whether he uses a kicker or whether he uses a drop head, or whatever it is, this is his ground.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I find it difficult to reconcile what you have just said with this sentence here, that the initiative for all decisions regarding the presenting of the news and editorial opinion is left with the publisher.

Mr. Garner: Well, one is a writing operation and the other is a mechanical operation.

Mr. Fortier: And who is responsible to whom? Is the editor responsible to you?

Mr. Garner: Yes. We do have conferences and possibly a daily...

Mr. Fortier: I don't want to put him on the spot again, but I wonder if Mr. Denhoff could tell us if he agrees with that statement that the initiative for all decisions regarding the presenting of the news and editorial opinion is left with the publisher?

Mr. Denhoff: If I were phrasing it I would have said the responsibility—the ultimate responsibility which of course is distinctive from the act of putting a paper together. This is why we hire professional people.

Mr. Fortier: The Canadian Press levies, as is well known and is already on record, are based on circulation. Is that not correct?

Mr. Denhoff: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: The levies on the individual newspapers are based on the newspaper's circulation?

Mr. Denhoff: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: We have on file figures showing that your paper's circulation in 1967 was 26,495 and in 1968 was 26,279. The Canadian Press levy between those two years went down by some $4000. Could you explain this?

Mr. Garner: I haven't the answer.

Mr. Fortier: You must have realized when you paid the bill that the Canadian Press levy was smaller in '68 than it was in '67.

Mr. Garner: They do from time to time put in special assessments to cover deficits in various areas.

Mr. Fortier: But you have no ready answer?

Mr. Garner: No. Just recently there was an announcement of a special levy and this automatically would put it up.

From The Floor: Miss Hamilton: May I ask if your information was from material regarding the paper's figures during those two periods?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Miss Hamilton: Because the difference would be that prior to the Thomson ownership the Peterborough Examiner included all the Canadian Press levies under Canadian Press, whereas in our Thomson account the portion of the Canadian Press levy which we relate to the providing of punched tape is charged to the composing room. That is a production activity...

Mr. Fortier: Then that is probably the answer. Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: In paragraph 7 of the Prince Albert brief you say that "we have a daily minimum news content that has been designed to give complete coverage of local news as well as a full presentation of national and international events." Do you have any philosophy for determining the needs of your readers on any given day as between local, national and international news?

Mr. Denhoff: What do you mean by philosophy, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Well, how do you come to the thought that you will give so many columns to local news and so many columns to international news and so on?

Mr. Denhoff: Possibly I should begin by stating that while we use the word "full" there, it certainly wasn't intending to suggest that we were a New York Times—we are certainly not in that type of operation.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think the New York Times carries too much news?

Mr. Denhoff: No, I do not. I disagree with the sociologist who said that the New York Times was very dull. If they are, I think quite possibly they are deliberately dull because they attempt to give a complete and factual record—I think it is a very good newspaper.

As I say, we are not in that league due to economic circumstances.

To begin with, we start with page 1 of our newspaper. Except for what might be considered an outstanding story in terms of public interest, we do not carry local stories because we devote it to national and international and provincial events. This is the basic idea.

there is more important world news that day or more of importance or more of an interest of local nature. And the same may be true of other pages throughout the paper. But basically the front will always be world or national and other pages inside—page 3 is our basic local news page.

Mr. Fortier: It is well known that only a fraction of the news on any given day is published.

Mr. Denhoff: That is true.

Mr. Fortier: So my question to both of you is this. What policy do you adopt to determine which news will be published and which will not?

Mr. Denhoff: You mean of national or of any type?

Mr. Fortier: Of any type.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, speaking for myself, it is true of most papers that the number of people involved varies with the size of the paper obviously.

We have a wire editor who handles most of the incoming news from Canadian Press. He determines from his own experience—he has been doing it now for I believe 7 years—from his own experience and from the interest expressed by people which stories he will choose, which stories he will give more prominence to—this is done purely on the basis of his interpretation of public interest.

Similarly, the city editor will select from the news turned in by our local staff news that he is going to use on any given day and obviously the display he will give it. He works in consultation with the editor and the sports people of course—that will be sports second and the Women's Editor will handle her part and so forth.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to apply your mind to this question, Mr. Garner?

Mr. Garner: Well, on occasion there have been stories which developed locally which to my mind are more important than some of the international news coming in, so on the basis we will put it on the front page—we will headline it.

Mr. Fortier: Do you take the pulse of your readers on occasion as to what they think of your newspaper and what they would like to read that they don't read?

Mr. Garner: Well, we get this all the time, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: How do you go about it?

Mr. Garner: Well, several years ago we ran four Daniel Starch surveys to try and determine what the interest was in our paper, page by page. I don't know whether you are familiar with this organization but they do surveys on newspapers and magazines and so on and they will come up with a figure for a certain day that this page received the attention of a certain percentage of your newspaper readers, and this advertisement received so much attention, and in this way we did try to find out what our readers thought of our various presentations within the paper.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever done anything like that?

Mr. Denhoff: We have not done it since I have been there, but I believe if my memory serves me correctly our files—I have only been the publisher there for 2½ years—I think prior to that a reader survey of our pages had been done—a survey of interest—sports interest and so on. But as to acceptance, I don't think anything has been done about that because how would one weigh it?

I am sure if you went to any given hundred subscribers in Prince Albert they would say "yes, I would like this or that or this."

Mr. Fortier: Has yours become a better newspaper since joining the Thomson chain?

Mr. Denhoff: My newspaper was published by the Thomson company I believe in 1950. I am not certain of the date. I worked there in 1946, when it was independently owned, as a reporter. Yes, I think I can honestly say that we are a far better newspaper.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Can you be more specific? Can you tell us what the Thomson chain does for your newspaper that it has not done for say the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix which as you said earlier is in some competition?

Mr. Denhoff: I would like that question again, Mr. Fortier—what has...

Mr. Yves Fortier: What does the Thomson chain, what services does the Thomson chain provide for your newspaper that makes it a better newspaper than one which competes in some degree with it, to wit, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix?

Mr. Denhoff: I don't think this would be a reasonable comparison; let me try to answer it this way. The Star-Phoenix, because it is in a much larger community—Saskatoon is a city of one hundred and twenty-five thousand or so, and as you know is owned by the Sifton family along with the Regina Leader Post. For many years they have economically been able to afford their own correspondent, Mr. Stirling King, now in Ottawa for example, similarly to cover the Legislature in Regina on a permanent basis. The days when the Prince Albert Herald was independently owned there was just no hope of having a correspondent in Ottawa. We now have two actually columnists—Mr. Tissington—who was formerly the editor of the Prince Albert Herald.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Do you use those syndicated columnists?

Mr. Denhoff: We use them if we want to use them, I will put it that way.

Mr. Yves Fortier: Well, how often would you use them in any given month, would you say?

Mr. Denhoff: I would think that we would use most of the columns, pretty well everything that Mr. Tissington sends us, but only because what he sends us is sent to us because it is of local interest. It might be on the Fresh Water Fish Marketing Board, or CP might not have a great interest in it.

The Chairman: Or it could be on Mr. Diefenbaker?

Mr. Denhoff: Quite often it is on Mr. Diefenbaker.

The Chairman: I am sure it is.

Mr. Denhoff: There is an abiding interest in Mr. Diefenbaker in Prince Albert. They are used purely on the basis that anything else is used, on interest in them. They have to stand up against everything else. There is no compulsion to use them in any way shape or form.

Mr. Yves Fortier: But you do use them?

Mr. Denhoff: We do use most of them but we do discard some.

Mr. Yves Fortier: What about the syndicated columns to which you can have access, do you use them?

Mr. Denhoff: We use some and we discard some others. A large part of it is women's material...

The Chairman: Ann Landers, is that one of them?

Mr. Denhoff: Ann Landers, of course. We daren't throw that away because our phone wouldn't stop ringing.

The Chairman: And horoscope columns?

Mr. Denhoff: Yes, and horoscope columns. It is not quite the same but bridge, crossword puzzles...

The Chairman: All American?

Mr. Denhoff: No, we have a feature that we run—It Happened in Canada, for example, is very popular and very interesting, dealing with events in Canadian history or interesting sidelights on days gone by in Canada's history. I am not sure whether our bridge man is Canadian or American.

The Chairman: Are there any Canadian astrologists?

Mr. Denhoff: I wouldn't know.

The Chairman: The Broadcasting Act compels broadcasters under law to contribute to national unity. Do you think that newspaper publishers contribute to national unity?

Mr. Denhoff: In Canada, offhand, I know of no newspaper proprietors, publishers, who are preaching separatism of any kind.

The Chairman: Well, does your paper contribute to national unity?

Mr. Denhoff: I was going to say that unless the problems of the Northern Saskatchewan farmer are met there may be a groundswell towards Western separatism. I can't envisage it at the moment but the day might come and I might agree this is one answer for Western Canadians. As I say I don't feel that way at the moment and I can't quite envisage myself seeing it.

The Chairman: You think there would be a greater understanding of the problems of the Saskatchewan farmer if La Presse and Le Devoir had correspondents in Saskatchewan or had people who were familiar with the problems of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Denhoff: I am not qualified to speak on the Quebec question in any way shape or form but I know that one of the papers had an article dealing with bootlegging of wheat by the Saskatchewan farmers. It was the main story across the bottom of the paper—it may have been the Ottawa French paper, I don't know.

The Chairman: Well, the question I am coming to is, do you think it would improve your service to your readers if the Thomson papers retained a correspondent in Quebec? Would this help you interpret French Canada to your readers?

Mr. Denhoff: I honestly don't know. Because of our limitations of space I am not sure that we are at the moment—I don't check the files that often—but I am not sure at the moment that we use everything that is supplied by Canadian Press. We have a very severe space limitation. If I might though I would like to get back to your other question...

The Chairman: Well, just on this one for one moment. Do you think—I don't want to put words in your mouth now, and I am sure you won't let me, but do you not think that your service to your readers would be improved if the Thomson papers had a correspondent in the Province of Quebec?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, what you are suggesting in one sense is that the Canadian Press is not doing an adequate job of reporting events in Quebec.

The Chairman: No, I did not ask you that. asked you if you think your service to your readers would be improved by the Thomson papers retaining a correspondent in Quebec.

Mr. Denhoff: Theoretically it might be.

The Chairman: Well, how about practically in fact?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, I am thinking in terms of space consideration and in terms of all the other areas that we have to deal with and do feel that although we have had individual criticism on the subject of more news from Quebec, I do feel that they are doing quite an adequate job.

The Chairman: I will just ask the same question of Mr. Garner.

Mr. Garner: Well, there are a number papers, members of Canadian Press, Quebec, and as members of the Canadian Press one of the duties of the papers is to furnish information on Quebec. This comes over Canadian Press wires and ends up in our office the same as every other office in Canada. We do use much of this material.

The Chairman: Well then, why have Mr. Nicholson and Mr. Tissington in the Press Gallery in Ottawa—you could use CP and not have your own correspondent in the Press Gallery?

Mr. Garner: Well, there is so much other information here to be gleaned...

The Chairman: Well, I would suggest that there is so much other information to be gleaned in Quebec?

Mr. Garner: Well, one man covering Quebec would be spreading himself pretty thin.

The Chairman: Not quite as thin as no man covering Quebec.

Senator Prowse: I would like both of them to answer and the question is this: do you feel that you are getting adequate news at the present time so that your people are fully informed on what is happening in the Province of Quebec—what is going on in the minds of the people of Quebec?

Mr. Garner: Well, just offhand, I would think that over the past two or three years here is hardly a day goes by that we don't have reference to Quebec.

Senator Prowse: Well, I am not asking you that. I am asking you whether you think your people or the people that read your paper can depend on your paper for information and have they been over the past five years and are they now fully aware of what is going on in minds of the people of Quebec?

Mr. Denhoff: Senator Prowse, surely that question can only be answered if we agree that is actually in the minds of the people of Quebec, and there seems to be a great deal of disagreement, from the Prime Minister with the view on one side that separatism is not the great threat it is made out to be, and Mr. Rene Levesque on the other side.

Senator Prowse: Well, let me put it to you this way: do both of you feel that you have all the information you need so that you are completely satisfied you are aware of what is going on in Quebec and what is motivating that is going on in Quebec?

Mr. Garner: Well, of course, we are a local newspaper...

Senator Prowse: No, no, no. I am asking you as an individual.

Mr. Garner: Well, I think that I am reasonably well informed myself on Quebec and the happenings that are going on there through reading our own columns.

Senator Prowse: And you, Mr. Denhoff?

Mr. Denhoff: Senator Prowse, it is another area where we could certainly devote more space, but I could say that on five other subjects.

Senator Prowse: I am asking what you feel.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, what I am trying to lead up to, Senator Prowse, is that I feel within the bounds of human possibility without visiting Quebec and making a personal survey, I am in a rough way certainly aware of the turmoil and the great movement underway in Quebec but that I can't answer that question without submitting to an examination as to what I actually know. I feel well informed, that is all I can say. Certainly this is from what I read, from what is coming to us.

The Chairman: Could I ask this question which I think is cogent at this time? Do you feel that the Peterborough Examiner understands and is sympathetic towards and interprets for its readers the problems of the wheat farmers in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Garner: I feel that Canadian Press has covered this situation, probably not in depth, but I think so.

The Chairman: Do you Mr. Denhoff? Do you think that the readers of the press generally in Eastern Canada—let's take the specific example of the Examiner—are sufficiently well informed on the problems of the Western farmer?

Mr. Denhoff: Well, I am certainly surprised when I come down here, and I come down once or twice a year, to find people aware and they know that we have had a bumper crop and that our granaries are glutted, but whether this is a general knowledge I am not sure.

The Chairman: I think the Eastern areas are well informed on these problems.

Mr. Denhoff: I know that Canadian Press just recently carried a series on the crop situation, the marketing situation, and the economic situation as related to the Western wheat farmer, but I am not sure that many of the Ontario communities are definitely concerned with the Western farmer, because I understand Massey-Ferguson just had to lay off a number of employees because they are not selling enough farm implements to the Western Provinces, and I hope they are, but I can't say for sure.

The Chairman: Are the Senators who have final questions—I think we should be prepared to...

Mr. Denhoff: There was one question that you asked me a while ago and I didn't want to get it on the record. You mentioned that the radio law insist radio stations contribute to national unity. I think it should be established for the record that as one of the other speakers did mention, there are only a certain number of radio bands, but there is no limit to the number of newspapers that are published.

The Chairman: Well, just let me make my point. I am not suggesting for a moment that there should be a law—I agree with many of the points that have been made at the hearings about Government pressure and Government influence as far as the press is concerned, and I agree with the preliminary statements which were made this afternoon by Mr. McCabe in this connection, and I am not suggesting for a moment that publishers should be compelled by law, but I am wondering if in fact, however I think, the publishers contribute to national unity.

Mr. Denhoff: Well, I think they do feel that way and I think they do feel that responsibility.

The Chairman: Are there other questions that the Senators have?

Mr. Yves Fortier: I would like to hear from our witnesses—when you have these once a year meetings in Toronto with the owner or representatives of the owners, do you ever voice requests for improvements in the service that you receive from the group?

Mr. Denhoff: In terms of capital expenditures? Every year.

Mr. Yves Fortier: In terms of a better coverage.

Mr. Denhoff: I have been happily surprised—it is my own decision in a sense, but I am running a viable business—I hope I am—and it must be strong as a community service and I hope the community deserves it.

I am delighted to be able to tell you that in the years since the newspaper became a Thomson newspaper the salaries are way beyond what I expected them to be when I returned to this newspaper and just the other day I hired a reporter away from Regina which economically could certainly afford to pay much more than I can. But I have no problems in that regard except in a broad sense that there is a limit to what one can do in a given size of community.

Mr. Yves Fortier: I would like to ask you a question along those lines also. These improvements to which you have referred since the Thomson takeover—to what extent are they attributable to being part of the chain—to what extent do you feel they would have happened anyway if circulation, advertisers, and therefore revenue of the local newspaper increased?

Mr. Denhoff: Mr. Fortier, I wish that when I was struggling with a small weekly—it was a successful one I may add—my volume increased, circulation increased and my profits increased. I am very proud—but I just wish that I had the benefit of one tenth of the advice on technical matters, on business matters. I must say that I would have been much better paper and a much healthier paper at that time and in this sense it is just fantastic to me, it just makes all the difference in the world.

The Chairman: You belong to the CDNPA?

Mr. Denhoff: No, I do not.

The Chairman: Do you, Mr. Garner?

Mr. Garner: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: Well, that could lead to a line of questioning which I won't pursue. Does your managing editor belong to the Managing Editors Conference?

Mr. Garner: Yes, he does, sir.

The Chairman: Does yours?

Mr. Denhoff: No, he doesn't. I did when I was managing editor at Moose Jaw.

The Chairman: Well, if I may say, gentlemen, I think I said this afternoon how grateful we were to the people from Thomson Newspapers Limited for coming. I think this particular hearing this evening has been illuminating as far as this afternoon's discussion is concerned, and it has been useful in itself. We are grateful to you both, and thank you Mr. Garner and thank you Mr. Denhoff for coming.

The Committee adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Friday, December 19th, 1969.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this morning we are receiving a brief from the Chairman and the publisher of The Toronto Telegram, Mr. John Bassett who is sitting on my immediate right.

Mr. John Bassett: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Now, Mr. Bassett, as requested, your brief was received more than three weeks in advance, it has been circulated to the Members of the Committee. They have studied its contents, and I think for the purposes of our discussion this morning we could take the brief as read.

I propose to begin perhaps by taking fifteen minutes during which you can explain its contents or expand upon it. Indeed you may talk about anything else which may be on your mind. You do not need to use that time period, it is entirely up to you. Following the fifteen minutes the Senators would welcome a period of questions. They may question you on the contents of the brief, but there will be other questions as well. If you wish to direct any of the questions that they ask to other members of your group, please do so I am sure I would not mind, there may be specific questions they would wish to address, for example to Fraser.

Having said that, the only other thing I would like to mention, if there is, during the question period, anything which you feel is of such a private and confidential nature that you would prefer to answer in camera, then we would be prepared to meet any such request. It probably will not be necessary, but in the event it should arise—fine.

Mr. J. W. H. Bassett: Thank you very much, sir. Taking for granted that the brief has been read, I have nothing further to say, gentlemen, other than what is in the brief. As the brief points out, if my premise is correct, namely that when we talk about Canadian ownership of newspapers, what we really mean and hope to achieve, is a diversified, viable Canadian ownership whenever possible, with strong local identification. As I said in my brief, I had the permission of the former Prime Minister to account in the brief, a dinner party in Mr. Pearson's home where a lot of us were there and did discuss the matter very seriously throughout an evening. I don't think anybody objects at all—nobody that I know of in the publishing business, doesn't believe that the communications in this country should be in the hands of Canadians.

I think there are many of us, certainly I am one, who would hope Senator, that this Committee would closely investigate the possibility for the future, if recommendations could come forward to make it more financially possible for those daily newspapers which are still independently owned and published, and managed in the areas where they are published. I am thinking, as I said in the brief, perhaps because I operate out of Toronto, I am thinking particularly of the provincial press in Ontario: I think if this could be done, that this would be a great service to the press, and beyond that because I believe the press exists to serve the public, and therefore I think it would be a great service to the public.

The other aspect of the brief was simply that I would hope that this Committee would examine the use by Canadian publishers of Canadian newsprint, and would perhaps use the power of this Committee to find out in some detail what takes place in Sweden. It is very difficult, I have tried for some years. I sent a man to Sweden, the Swedish newspaper publishers are very careful about the information which they give. I guess they do not want to upset a good thing, I don't know, but it does seem to me that the use of Canadian newsprint by Canadian publications, Canadian publishers is important, and this should be perhaps of interest to this Committee.

Now, I know that the whole brief could be interpreted as being a special plea for the communications print media particularly, and of course, it is: and I make no apology for that, and as I point out in the brief, it does seem to me that the precedent has been set. The Government of Canada has used fiscal policy quite properly, in my view, because they believe that it is in the national interest that daily newspapers—and it applies beyond that, but here I am appearing in the capacity of a newspaper publisher of a daily newspaper—remain in Canadian hands.

Again quite properly in my view, the Government did not wish to enter into direct legislation which might have been interpreted by some, as an interference with the traditional freedoms of the press, and therefore they used fiscal policy to achieve their objective, all quite properly; but it did have the end result of putting the newspapers in a special category, and therefore if this was regarded as important in the national interest, my view is that it is equally important to see that what I believe are really the underlying objectives of this action be considered, and if my views find some merit, this would be carried forward.

If I may, as I said in my brief, be allowed in public to a personal note, I did want to make it clear while this may be construed as a personal, or special plea for communications, it is not a personal plea because I do not own any shares personally at all. Whatever shares I have owned of any of our businesses have long since been put in a trust, and if I died tomorrow, although I hope to live to 98, if I die tomorrow, this would not affect my situation at all, and I did not want anybody to think that it did.

Thank you very much.

The Chairman: The one thing that I intended to do in my remarks, and did not, perhaps you would just explain the absence of John Bassett?

Mr. Bassett: Yes. Two of my three sons are engaged in business with me. My third son is not. He is engaged in the financial business in New York. My eldest son had hoped to be present, and at the time I wrote the brief I thought he was coming; however, he had to have a cartilage operation on his knee the other day, the third one unfortunately, so he only got out of the hospital the day before yesterday, and is limping around on crutches. I am sorry, I apologize.

The Chairman: Section 2 of your brief states your son Douglas is sitting on your left. I would like to make it perfectly clear.

Mr. Bassett: Will the real Keith Davey...

The Chairman: I know John, and we are sorry he is not here, and please convey our good wishes. I would also like to give to the senators and to the witnesses some indication of our time table. I am hopeful that we may be able to complete our questioning and adjourn at about 12.30 because I promised the members will attend the Royal Assent which is 12.45.

I would also like to mention to the Senators that Mr. Bassett is here today in the capacity as Chairman and Publisher of The Telegraph Publishing Company Limited and while questions about CTV and CFTO will not necessarily be out of order, you should be mindful of the fact there will be opportunities later these hearings to talk to people in CTV and CFTO.

Yes, Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Now, as Mr. Bassett knows, I have a special interest in the newsprint business which I do not think we need to go into, he knows that.

I have looked at this brief very carefully and I must first insofar as the brief in general is concerned, it is a very valuable one in this respect—that you point out, and aim at certain recommendations, and it is on the basis of those recommendations I would like to see most of our discussions rest, because it is a very unusual and very interesting proposal that you made with regard to newspaper print prices.

In your brief starting on Page 10 you begin the discussions, and it follows along to Page 14 when you arrive at your proposal that consideration should be given to newspaper that tax benefits should be considered for newsprint manufacturers to be used for a reduction of prices to the total Canadian publishers, I interpret that as being a kind of Government subsidy to the public interest because it involves a media that must be in serious trouble. You would prefer to stand on your own two feet.

Now, I would like to explore that a little bit if I may. In the first place I want to draw your attention to the table, and it is an interesting table, on Page 11 showing the constant rise in the cost of newsprint. I know it is a worry to a lot of the publishers. It is a worry to the newsprint industry too. I hope I am not taking too long to paint a background on this thing?

The Chairman: It is fine.

Senator Smith: Because there have been times when we have just about hoped we have finished one of these periods in which the industry found itself in serious trouble. Perhaps the most serious trouble the industry was ever in was in the days when newsprint sold for $35.00 a ton when you, yourself, were a temporary employee of a news print industry in my own area, but let me just...

Mr. Bassett: If they survived...

Senator Smith: That was worse, of course. That was during the very, very tough days. Let me ask you this question then. At the bottom of your table as of January 1st., the price of newsprint according to your table will be $143.00 per ton Canadian and you were notified of that on September 30th., 1969. Do you expect to have to pay $143.00 a ton for all the newsprint that you use as of January 1st., 1970, and if not, what price are you going to pay for it?

considered opinion that if any other industry raised its prices—I am not at the moment speaking of the amounts which may be justified or may not be justified—but if every mill and every aspect of a business in this country raised its price by the same amounts within the same period of time to every single customer it does seem to me that there might be some interest by the Combines people in that kind of procedure over a period of years.

Senator Smith: Yes. I am quite familiar with your statement in your brief, but I do not have the reference here, that you have always taken the position that there is, in effect, a Combine; that the response when you have taken it up with the Newsprint Association and Pulp and Paper Association has been that Mr. Fowler has always said "well, go ahead and prove, if you think so". This is not the first time I have heard it raised, and it is a subject that interests me perhaps as a Parliamentarian as well as a citizen and my information over the years, and gained only from being very friendly and—of course, I want to put on the record I have no connection whatsoever with the Bowater Mersey Paper Company. My profession used to be a dental surgeon and that is a far cry from the newsprint industry—but they themselves, have always categorically denied that insofar as the extent of their supply to the Canadian market was concerned, and also with regard to supply of certain areas of their market in the State because they have been into very competitive situations.

Now, just recently I have had another assurance that insofar as their knowledge is concerned that they have now passed through one of the most competitive market situations that they have ever experienced. It has been difficult; they have been searching within the radius of Toronto, and over in Detroit for extra markets to take up the slack. As we all know, the industry itself has been down. They have laid off men for varying periods...

The Chairman: I think the Senator is coming very dangerously close to making a speech.

Senator Smith: Oh, all right, I will stop. It is a difficult area to explore. Now, I think I have come to the question.

The Chairman: I do not mean to interrupt your train of thought, Senator.

Senator Smith: Quite apart from the billed price, I may be misinformed and I want to know whether I am because I am seeking the real story on this thing, are there any other—I do not like to use the word “device”, there must be a better word—is there any other technique of getting a favourable position in the purchase of newsprint apart from the price “so much per ton”? You say that you are going to pay $143.00?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, there is. Yes, the advantage that we have been able to achieve, and I am speaking only of the Telegram obviously, we have with certain of our suppliers—it is important in the money market of today, and we use a great deal of newsprint, we have been able—with I think two of our suppliers to have extended credit which has, if you figure in the interest rates, gives you some advantage. In other words, we get a ton of newsprint and instead of paying in 30 days in certain areas we would not pay for it for 90 days.

The Chairman: Do you ever go higher than 90 days?

Mr. Douglas Bassett: Oh, I think we have on occasion.

The Chairman: What is the highest?

Mr. D. Bassett: It depends on the arrangement you would make, probably 120 days at the most.

Senator Smith: Do you ever figure what that monetary value is?

Mr. J. Bassett: Maybe it amounts to $3.00 to $4.00 a ton but this is applied to two suppliers, and we have five suppliers. We were not successful in negotiating it with the others.

Senator Smith: Yes. Are there any other techniques used to try to better this price that is supposed to have been the agreed price?

Mr. J. Bassett: Not that I know of. When I came to the Telegram as General Manager, and Mr. McCullough was alive, the Telegram got all its newsprint from one source. I felt this was a weak position for the newspaper to be in. As President of that Company when the contract ran out after I had been there about a year, I then negotiated with other companies; but the President of the newsprint company which had been the traditional supplier, and still supplies us with a considerable amount of newsprint was a great friend of the late George McCullough. I had not consulted Mr. McCullough about these negotiations but of course the President of that newsprint Company did; and we again signed a contract for one supplier only. It proved to be an unwise decision because during that period of time Weekend Magazine came into being. We went into Weekend Magazine and we were responsible for a coloured comic section, and this newsprint company in spite of its promises to us did not supply it. It was in the amount of about five thousand tons of newsprint a year; so happily we were able to find the newsprint in other sources. Of course when that contract ran out—in the meantime Mr. McCullough unfortunately had died, but I then negotiated with several suppliers and we have followed that policy since.

Senator Smith: Mr. Bassett, is this price that you pay, is that F.O.B. at the back door of your plant—perhaps the front door?

Mr. Bassett: No, the back door. Delivered to the plant.

Senator Smith: Has it always been that way?

Mr. Bassett: There was a time it was delivered to the siding, and we had to deliver it from the siding to our plant.

Senator Smith: There would be a trucking charge?

Mr. Bassett: That is right, there was a trucking charge. Now the mill absorbs that charge.

Senator Smith: Is all your newsprint brought to you by rail?

Mr. Bassett: No. 60 percent by rail and the balance by truck.

Senator Smith: You don't have any newsprint delivered by water?

Mr. Bassett: Oh, we tried for awhile. You knew Moby Jones—he was Chief Engineer of the newsprint at Bowater. As you probably know better than I, they were very keen, and when he talks of the competitive situation they were very keen to extend their sales within Canada. They felt they should be selling in Canada which they were not doing to any great extent at all. We were glad to do business with them for lots of reasons. H had the idea if the newsprint came by water this would reduce the cost to us—reduce the cost to them thereby reducing the cost to us. It just did not work out that way. Do we still do business with them?

Mr. D. Bassett: No, no. The damage at the wharf was just fantastic.

Senator Smith: That is an interesting point. Do you know the reason?

Mr. J. Bassett: I do not know specifically. I have heard talks about the stevedores, but...

Senator Smith: Well, you know it appears not to be, but it is a very delicate thing to handle on the wharf side—unfortunate circumstances. I presume this was supplied by Bowater (Newfoundland) by one of the ships going up the canals. I would not know anything about that at all.

I would like now to turn to your reference in the brief with regard to the differential between the price the American publishers pay, and the price that the Canadian Publishers have to pay. From the reading of your brief, there is a certain difference but you seem to play it down as though it was not important. What is that differential in your experience?

Mr. J. Bassett: It is important, but I do not think it is important enough. The differential is traditionally based on the price of newsprint delivered to New York, Mr. Perigoe, correct me if I am wrong, which is quite possible—but traditionally the price was fixed on what it cost for a ton of newsprint F.O.B. New York City. If a paper was located nearer a mill than New York City the transportation of getting that ton of newsprint from that mill to that newspaper was less, and that advantage would accrue to the publishers. For instance for some years I was publisher of a small daily newspaper in Sherbrooke, Quebec. It was a small paper but we used to get our newsprint sent down in the back of a truck virtually from the International Paper Mill in Three Rivers. So the cost of the newsprint delivered to Sherbrooke, a few hundred tons a year, in that way, sent down the road from Three Rivers to Sherbrooke was less than the transportation of a similar ton of newsprint from that mill to New York, and therefore the differential grew in that way.

Senator Smith: What is your experience of today with regard to what that differential really is?

Mr. Perigoe: About $9.00 a ton. $152.00 in the States, and $143.00 in Canada.

Senator Smith: It used to be $4.00. Now it is $9.00?

Mr. Perigoe: Now, it is $9.00.

Senator Smith: Have you also taken into consideration the effect of the American exchange situation?

Mr. Perigoe: The American customer is only paying $152.00; he is paying it in U.S. funds.

Senator Smith: He pays in U.S. funds?

Mr. Perigoe: The benefit is to the mill.

Senator Smith: Thank God for that.

Mr. Bassett: Oh, of course, I would not care if the American publisher paid $180.00 a ton.

Senator Smith: You don't agree then this should form part of my personal assessment of the facts of the differential. I should ignore this 8 percent or 9 percent, whatever it is, that goes into it when I am trying to understand the comparative position of the publisher down in New York with your position in this country. You believe that I should disregard the exchange situation?

Mr. Bassett: Senator, I do not suggest you should disregard anything. There was a time, when the mills, for a short period of time when the Canadian dollar on the exchange was slightly higher. During that period, of course, the mills suffered on the exchange. I personally do not believe that the exchange rate is a fundamental aspect of the price per ton of newsprint. If tomorrow, through sound financial management, or through whatever reasons in this country, as compared to the United States, our dollars were par, the mill would lose that advantage. Now, presumably there might be other advantages that the mills would accrue in other ways if the dollars were at par. I do not know, but if that advantage goes to the mills, and if they regard it over-all as an advantage, I am glad. The thing, which as I say in the brief, and this discussion has been going on for years with the publishers and the newsprint manufacturers, some publishers, I, for one of them, have been much more vociferous about it than others. For a period of fifteen years I have been complaining about this because I object to the principle as much as anything else.

The fact is that the price of a ton of Canadian newsprint to a Canadian publisher is basically set on the price of newsprint delivered in New York. I don't think that is right.

The other matter, as I said in the brief, is for years presidents of newsprint companies would say to me, "Well, John if we make any real differential in price to Canadians, this is going to upset our American customers. How are we going to justify to an American customer that you are paying less". I don't believe that to hold water anymore because newsprint manufacturers will be the first to tell you that if their American customers can get their newsprint less expensively, and just as conveniently, and the quality is good—more or less. The Georgia Pines development is an ever increasing source of newsprint—the American publishers that used to take Canadian newsprint that can now get it less expensively from the State of Georgia have not hesitated because of the long association with their Canadian suppliers. They have not hesitated two minutes, and I do not believe this would upset their customers in the U.S. Fellow who buys newsprint in Canada buys it because it is the best product all around that he can get at the price delivered to his newspaper. That is my view.

The Chairman: Just on that point, you said that you do not think that argument holds water any more. Do you think it ever did?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I think it held water before there was any newsprint available from Georgia. Georgia Pines Development is a post-war development.

The Chairman: But prior to that development?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I accepted it. I was a young fellow, as I say in the brief.

Mr. Chairman: You were naive.

Mr. Bassett: I was naive—maybe. Also no Canadian publisher that I know of, and I do not want to be misconstrued on this—I think the Canadian newsprint industry is a hell of a fine industry, and its development has meant millions and millions of dollars of foreign exchange coming into Canada which we vitally need—nobody wants to interfere with that situation, a great export like that.

The Chairman: You made that clear enough.

Mr. Bassett: But the total Canadian use of newsprint is approximately 10 per cent of production. My view is that if the Government of Canada has decided in the national interest newspapers have to be in a special category and I find nobody that disagree with that. I therefore question if anybody would come before the Committee and suggest that this Committee recommend to the Government that Canadian qualifications be removed so that the publishers could then go out and sell their newspapers, if they so desired, in the market place to the richest purchaser. I don't suppose anybody would ever suggest that.

Mr. Chairman: Well, subject to reading the record I think that has been suggested.

Mr. Bassett: Well, I would be totally opposed to it.

Senator Prowse: Not quite.

The Chairman: Not quite—almost.

Senator Smith: You just cannot agree with me then that the fact that the price in New York City is $152.00 U.S. is not the basis the U.S. translated into lesser Canadian dollars. That does not seem to me to be the basis for their prices down in the United States, and do not want to —

Mr. Bassett: I don't think I follow you, sir.

Senator Smith: All right, let me start again. It seems to me in the first place that if the American exchange was wiped out...

Mr. Bassett: Yes.

Senator Smith: In order for the newsprint industry in this country to stay in business because they export 90 per cent of it, and not all to the United States of course, they would then have to negotiate a relatively higher price in order to compensate them for the loss of that 8 per cent or 9 per cent. It is 8 per cent American exchange advantage which they are under, otherwise they could not do business. That is their profit if some of them are having profits under average conditions; but you just do not agree with me apparently that this is part of the reckoning when you figure the differential?

Mr. Bassett: I believe it is perhaps part of the reckoning of a board of directors of newsprint companies. I don't deny that, but I question whether the foreign exchange should be part of the reckoning. The proposal has merits, and it may be thrown out immediately, in the first five minutes of your deliberations after the public hearings are over; but I am sure it is part of the reckoning of a board of directors of a newsprint company. I am sure it should be part of the reckoning of the Senate Committee discussing this matter of Canadian publications.

Senator Smith: Well, we have to explore the thing from all angles, and we are going to be wrong in our assumptions, if any of us have assumptions on this, of course...

Mr. Bassett: I hope you are not.

Senator Smith: We are not talking about the effect on the mass media, of the cost of a product which you must have in order to publish, that is cost of newsprint. May I suggest to you and ask you for your comments—this is hypothetical but it can happen—if that American price with the American exchange was levelled off with this country, and that business on the New York market for reasons of survival had to be negotiated rather sharply upward, at least to 8 per cent to keep a lot of mills in operation, would you not under those circumstances expect to pay more for your newsprint in that situation?

Mr. Bassett: I would expect to pay more for it, no question; but whether I would think that correct treatment for Canadian daily newspapers, I am not so sure.

Senator Smith: We are going back to what you are proposing, and this is interesting, of course, if those things happen then it is too much punishment for industry, and therefore Government should consider subsidizing the public industry by giving cheaper newsprint?

The Chairman: No, I do not think he said that.

Mr. Bassett: I reject that as absolutely out of hand. I am totally opposed to Government subsidy for the press in any form whatsoever—absolutely, totally.

Senator Smith: I used the wrong terms. He said the tax incentive, or tax correction with the industry which would result in lower prices.

Mr. Bassett: I do not think Senator that you overlook the fact and basis of this whole brief. I wouldn't be here at all, and unless I invited myself to this party.

The Chairman: You would have been invited, I am quite sure.

Mr. Bassett: But the basis of my whole brief, the reason I invited myself then is that I did not make the decision as a newspaper publisher, and I am empowered to do so. I have never been successful in two tries in getting to a position where I might have had a responsibility in the House, but the fact is that the Government of Canada decided that media was special. There had to be different rules. They said that if you want to go—well, you people were already in the publishing business when the rule was brought down, but they said—now, the rules are going to be changed; newspaper publishers are going to be different; in our free society, unlike any other business that I know of, that does not require a Government license to operate in the first place, you can't sell your product, you can't sell your capital assets should you want to get out of that business to the highest bidder, on the open market because we believe in the public interest there must be certain restrictions; and they did that in my opinion for good and sufficient reason. Now, this Committee has been set up to explore the whole situation. I am simply suggesting that when that decision was taken that that decision should be examined to see if what is in fact happening, is really what was intended by the representatives of the people of Canada.

The Chairman: I think those comments really are contained in the first paragraphs of your brief. The brief was presented and we shall perhaps come on to those, and I quite agree they are basis for observation on the second part of the brief. I think the specific clause that Senator Smith was referring to was 92. I do not have the reference in front of me, in which of course this has been explored. Do you wish to comment on 92 which is really what he was asking?

Mr. Bassett: No, I have nothing to add to it, sir.

Senator Smith: Yes, 92. Well, I have just about concluded this discussion, and I have found it very interesting. Thank you for being here, we are glad you came to give us your points of view, and answer the questions that arose. All I know is the skuttlebutt around the cocktail circle in Liverpool, and you know how small a circle that can be?

Mr. Bassett: Unfortunately when I was there it was prohibition times and all you got was a bottle of red-eye for a buck a throw from the taxi driver.

Senator Smith: Let me just conclude by making this particular reference on this particular subject, that if it is to be accepted that we should ignore the benefits of the foreign exchange situation on Mr. Bassett's tonnage figures which he gives as 44,000, my rapid calculation is that this particular publisher, Mr. Chairman, does benefit from a differential in total per annum of about $400,000.00 at the present time. As he said in the beginning there was a differential and it was important. If you take my figures it gets pretty close to a million dollars, nine hundred and twenty some thousand dollars.

I am sorry I have held the floor so long.

Mr. Chairman: No, that is...

Senator Smith: I have a very simple question, and one of which other Members of the Committee have mentioned. I think others have been asked either formally or informally, and I put it to you, Mr. Bassett. What do you consider the second best newspaper in the country? Tell us why, if you have an opinion?

Mr. Bassett: No, I have no objection. The two best newspapers in this country are the Toronto Telegram and the Toronto Star. Not necessarily in that order, but I think taking it all around that the two evening papers in Toronto are the best papers in Canada. I must hasten to add that I am not sure that is a unanimous decision among all of the members of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, but I think if you examine in detail, and some among your Committee have had professional experience, if you see the total effort that these two newspapers make to meet what I regard as the responsibility of a publisher I think they come closest in the country to the ideal.

Now, the last purpose that I have before this Committee is to promote the Toronto Star, so I will refer only to the Toronto Telegram, but mostly what I say does also apply to the Star. I notice in the Montreal Gazette this morning that Charles Templeton, an old friend of mine, appeared before you yesterday. Although he spoke of the three extraordinarily fine papers in Toronto, I do not put the Globe and Mail in the same category as I do the Star and Telegram. With respect to the Globe and Mail, for instance, Mr. Templeton spoke yesterday about foreign coverage. The great bulk of foreign news in the Globe and Mail, is of course, from the New York Times Service and London Observer. They have a staff man in China, and they have a staff man in Washington, and I think in London.

The Telegram has a staff man in Moscow, the only Canadian newspaper to do so. The Canadian Press has even withdrawn its man from Moscow. Only the C.B.C. and the Toronto Telegram represent the media of this country in Moscow, surely one of the two or three top capitals in the world. We have staff men now in Washington, London, Moscow, Paris, Bonn, Rome and Hong Kong. Now, this is a tremendous effort for a single daily newspaper. There is no daily newspaper in North America with the exception of the New York Times that has more foreign correspondents than the Toronto Telegram. Virtually speaking not quite to the same extent, not by quite the same method, but the Toronto Star also do that kind of job in foreign coverage. For Canadian coverage men who are instructed, if they are not Canadian citizens they are brought here; they have just all left, they come here each year to Toronto and they meet with Mr. Kelly, with our Ottawa bureau and with our senior editors. We have a foreign editor on our newspaper whose sole job is to deal with these foreign correspondents—a well paid foreign editor, that is his job, and as a result for instance what I regard as a failure of the Canadian press for instance to support a man in Moscow, we are able to through a syndicate service, most of our foreign correspondence, particularly our Moscow copy is made available to 34 papers across this country. Doing a national job as well as a job for readers of the Toronto Telegram.

Moving on to national news we support a bureau of three or four people in Ottawa. The Toronto Star at least as many, maybe more. Both papers have bureaus at the city hall in Toronto, Queen's Park, and of course in the Province of Quebec. I was very interested to read the press report of Mr. Ryan of Le Devoir before your Committee because he is a great friend of mine. Le Devoir and The Telegram through our television interests, have been able to do a good deal of things together in the field of public affairs; it has been a great sorrow to him that the French dailies are not as representative of Ontario and Toronto as the Toronto dailies are down there. The Globe of course is included in this too.

Now, if you go into the other aspects of journalism, if you look at the entertainment section of the Star and Telegram they are first rate; they compare with the entertainment section of any newspaper in North America that I see; and I see the New York Times, the Washington Star, and The Los Angeles Times every day. The entertainment section in the evening papers in Toronto, the amount of money they spend, the coverage they do on television, regular television columnists to news of movies, and plays. Toronto Star has a first rate—Nathan Cohen—well, anyway he is first rate.

We now send Ron Evans—Hickland—we now send people down to New York to cover the plays there, plays that ultimately come to Toronto. The whole entertainment section of both the evening papers is first rate. The Globe and Mail has a indifferent entertainment section.

The Chairman: As you cited those virtues, and I think you should know that when it comes to Quebec coverage, a number of witnesses have specifically spoken of the good job which is being done by the Toronto papers, yours included. I could not help thinking that as you listed these things that would not other publishers argue that that is fine; the Star and Telegram can afford to do these things; we cannot?

Mr. Bassett: I would not attempt to answer it.

The Chairman: But you did say that you do not think the Canadian Press does an adequate job in some of these areas?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I used to be very active in Canadian Press, a Director for many years, and I am not very active in the Canadian Press any more. I think that Canadian Press does an adequate job in certain areas but unfortunately these areas to my way of thinking have very little reference to the need of a competitive daily newspaper. I think Canadian Press is designed to supply the needs—somebody has to supply the needs—but I think Canadian Press is primarily designed to serve the needs of smaller middle sized dailies across the country, the non-competitive market.

Senator Smith: This is very interesting—a very interesting response to my simple question. I am so glad you could put this on the record because I think you will find the agreement of those of us who have the opportunity of reading the newspapers that you speak of. A question occurs to me, have you read, or at least do you read the Washington Post?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, I do, not regularly, but I get it.

Senator Smith: Well, I am tracking you now then, do you notice that wonderful piece of newsprint that is published?

Mr. Bassett: Comes from Liverpool, Nova Scotia.

Senator Smith: Bet you life. I would just like to put something on the record in response to Mr. Bassett's reference to no manufactured product rising so rapidly over such a short period of time, and indicate to the Committee a little justification for this rapid increase. In 1945—I confirmed these figures just recently—the basic wage of the fellow that cleans the snow off the driveways, and does other menial tasks was .57¢ an hour; today the minimum wage is $2.98 plus rather expensive fringe benefits which are a little difficult to assess. That is one of the big reasons why the newsprint industry is in the position it is today with regard to price.

That is all, thank you very much.

The Chairman: I thank you Senator Smith, and I am sure the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce will thank you.

Senator Prowse: I think we could leave the snow on the driveway at that price.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Smith. I would like to pursue the question, Mr. Bassett, with the second best newspaper in Canada. We have heard a great deal of hearsay already, and I am sure we will hear more about the happy situation in Toronto, as it has often been referred to, of three active competitive daily newspapers, a situation which is said to be unique certainly in Canada, and perhaps in North America. Why does that situation pertain in Toronto? If I may say, Mr. Bassett, it is perhaps not sufficient to say it is the size of the area, because there are other cities, New York for example, which is probably four times the size of Toronto, has only three daily newspapers. Why does the situation pertain in Toronto, and not in other big urban centres? What is unique about Toronto?

Mr. Bassett: You say it is not enough to say it is the size, I think it is the importance of the Toronto market. It is probably the basic ability of the Toronto market to support this because after all there is not only three dailies, there are six television channels, and six or seven radio stations. I think that the basic reason has to be the richness of the Toronto market.

The Chairman: Well, let me ask you this, I quite appreciate we are not studying the problems of newspapers in the United States, but I think for our study it would be interesting to know. Why, for example, in your opinion are there only three daily papers in New York, and other big American cities which you know better than I do, why there is not as much competition as in Toronto?

Mr. Bassett: I think one of the factors of the situation in New York, and it is one of the reasons of course, why both The Star and The Telegram in recent years have gone into the business of acquiring suburban weekly papers in the peripheral areas of Toronto, of metropolitan Toronto. I suppose Mr. Honderich is coming here and he can answer for himself but certainly for instance at The Telegram, we had no interest at all in entering the weekly newspaper field as such. I have not any interest in that field as a publishing field.

Now, that is only my personal view. I think the weekly papers served more in rural areas, and in all areas because they get to the heart of local news, and local issues that are of interest to the people in restricted areas; but we did not go into the weekly for those reasons at all.

We went into the weekly business largely—I made this decision just a very few years ago—when I saw the tremendous development of the daily papers in Long Island. With the flight to the suburbs, the New York papers suffered greatly, and while papers were dying in New York a couple daily papers were developing in Suburban Long Island. So one day I took a pencil. I said—well, here is Lake Ontario, and I went like that (indicating) and I said let's try and get weekly newspapers at strategic areas. I do not know what the future of these papers will be. Well, let me say first of all we got into this field to protect The Telegram. That was the objective, and my view was that possibly at some stage these weekly newspapers, on the day which they are normally published, would go to the readers in those different areas as an insert—Harper, you know what I am talking about—as an insert of The Telegram itself, and in this way we could retain the interest of families who perhaps at one time lived in Rosedale, or Forest Hill, or wherever, and had fled to the suburbs.

The Chairman: When do you think that will happen, Mr. Bassett?

Mr. Bassett: My son owns the weekly papers. They are going well on their own, and as so often happens he would very strongly resist now any idea of making a reader of the Mississauga News have to buy the Toronto Telegram in order to get his hands on the Mississauga News. So I cannot answer that, I do not know what the development will be.

The Chairman: May I just say to the senators on this point, and to you, I am sure you know—I am not sure of the date but I believe it is in March we will be dealing with the weekly newspapers. We have a weekly newspaper forum scheduled and Douglas, I am awfully glad you are coming, and perhaps at that time we will get more directly into the problems of the weeklies, and more specifically the particularly interesting phenomena of those purchased by the metropolitan dailies or suburban weeklies.

Mr. Bassett: The reason we went into it and I suspect the Star's was the same, but the reason we went into the field was to protect the position of The Telegram. The weekly field is not really my bag.

Mr. Chairman: Do you think Mr. Bassett that The Telegram serves the suburbs of Toronto now?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, we like to think we do. It is like saying that what is local news in Toronto? Immediately after the war when operated The Sherbrooke Record, there was no problem of what local news was in Sherbrooke, but with the interests of the reader of The Telegram in the metropolitan are like Toronto, it is not so easy to define local news and local services. Now, a great disappointment to me, and I am sure a great disappointment to you, I am not being personal, was the latest civic election in Toronto.

The Chairman: I have already spoken about it—it was terrible—you mean the number of people voting?

Mr. Bassett: Well, yes, I was not as disappointed as you were about that specific result about young Clarkson, but when you have three Toronto daily papers, and in the field of television—at our television station we had nine candidates up, public affairs programs, and columns of space and coverage of meetings, pictures, and the end result is that you get something like 33% of the eligible voters going out to vote in a city of the importance of Toronto. I mean the effect these people have on the lives of all of the citizens of Toronto, it is just terribly disappointing and makes you wonder what the hell is local news.

The Chairman: We spoke about this the morning the C.D.N.P.A. were here, I made the exact same point, and I agree with you. I would like to ask you a question specifically on this. Your suburban weeklies about which we will talk in a month or so are Bramalea, Burlington, Mississauga, Newmarket, Oakville, Stouffville and Whiby. I would regard these and they certainly are suburbs of Toronto but there is an entire periphery of communities in North York and Etobicoke as you know. Speaking of your municipal election coverage, and I have said, on the record, at these hearings, and I say now on the record, that your coverage of the municipal elections was full and fair. I think that is true of all of the papers.

Mr. Bassett: No. No, question at all.

The Chairman: You put forward a slate of candidates for election to municipal offices. All the Toronto papers do; but I live in Ward 1 in North York. I do not believe there was any recommendation from the Telegram as to whom I should support for alderman. The point I am making is there are, I think, eleven wards in Toronto; and you recommended aldermanic elections in those eleven wards, but there are thirty wards in the boroughs which are part of Metro, and you did not feel compelled to offer advice to the people who live in those five boroughs, and I am wondering why?

Mr. Bassett: Well, the answer is simple. We did, as you know, recommend candidates for Mayors and Board of Control, and so on in the boroughs. We recommended in certain specific areas, certain specific individuals besides those men. But your point is well taken. We discussed it at some length, and the decision taken by our editorial board with which I concurred, was that we did not have enough detailed knowledge of the candidates in those areas. In other words, it is something that is going to be discussed very soon after the holiday season as to what we should do. None of the Toronto dailies did.

The Chairman: No, in fairness I was going to say that. I am not putting that to you specifically.

Mr. Bassett: We all maintain large and expensive bureaus at City Hall in Toronto. We do not, in the same detail, cover all the civic affairs in all of the boroughs.

The Chairman: Well, you have one man in each of the boroughs?

Mr. Bassett: That is right, we do have one man, but I think we have six fellows at City Hall in Toronto. Now, the justification of this is, of course, that most of the people that live in these boroughs work in Toronto. Really the City of Toronto is the focal point of the metropolitan community, but I think we are probably going to have to do more.

The Chairman: I did not put forward as a criticism, I was just curious.

Mr. Bassett: That is why. We did not feel qualified. We did not have sufficient information.

The Chairman: I should explain to the Senators who are not from Toronto that in Toronto the newspapers publish slates of candidates, and list everyday the candidates that should be supported in various wards. The point Mr. Bassett was making was they did recommend certain aldermanic candidates in certain boroughs at one time, once in an editorial, on the editorial page; but the slates appear every day. He did quite correctly say they did recommend candidates for the mayoralty of the boroughs and for the Boards of Control, but not for the aldermanic offices; and of course he agrees with me that these are as important as the alderman in the City of Toronto.

Senator Prowse: Does the slate change from day to day?

The Chairman: No, I must say in fairness it does not.

Mr. Bassett: We say we recommend.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Bassett, I was interested to hear your philosophies behind your purchase of weekly newspapers, and I wonder if you could attempt to reconcile this philosophy, verbally expressed some five minutes ago, with the philosophies which permeate your brief, that you favour local ownership of newspapers in areas of publication?

Mr. Bassett: I do not reconcile it at all. I think it would be more advantageous for all those local communities if local people owned the weekly papers which I own.

Mr. Fortier: But circumstances have forced your hand?

Mr. Bassett: But I think it more important The Telegram remains strong and viable, and not be crowded, and not be choked to death—as might not happen, I do not know; but I think it is my responsibility as publisher of The Telegram to take whatever steps I think are necessary to take to insure the strength and survival of The Telegram over a long period of years. We saw in New York, I think it was a factor in New York, I could be wrong, but I really think the factor of failure of daily papers in New York City proper, was flight of population for living purposes, not working, to suburban areas. There were many other factors too, which I am not going to get into, but there were certainly other factors which were important. I believe—it may be an absolutely idealistic situation, but I really believe that if every daily newspaper in Canada, and every weekly newspaper in Canada was owned, and run, and operated by a citizen, or citizens who live every day and were identified through living in the community in which those weekly and dailies were published, we would have a better press in the country. I believe that.

Mr. Fortier: But in this very area though, are you suggesting that it is more important that the Toronto Telegram be economically sound and viable than it is important that the local people know that the local newspaper is published by one of them?

Mr. Bassett: It is more important to me.

Mr. Fortier: This is what I understood. I thought you clarified...

Mr. Bassett: But just as I am sure, and I have read, with other fundamental differences, that as owners and officers responsible for the operation of the chain dailies take the steps which they think are the best, and so on to insure local identification of papers which they own, through varying degrees of authority given to the local editors and so on so we do with these weeklies. The fundamental difference however, and I have argued this quite often—as I said in my brief, I expressed my respect and indeed my affection for most of the senior people in the chain operations in this country, but I also said in my brief...

Senator Prowse: I notice the "most".

Mr. Bassett: Well, it is very strange to me but not everybody likes me; but the fact of the matter is there is one fundamental difference—I believe it is terribly important in journalism for readers of a newspaper or the individuals upon whom a newspaper may comment editorially—elected people at every level of government, Senators, leaders of business, education—but especially the readers, to know where the ultimate decision of responsibility lies. So there is a fundamental difference between the operations of our weeklies and what I understand to be the operations of the daily newspapers which make up the three predominant chains in this country; and that is, that while the local publishers of these papers have complete autonomy in areas of local issues and so on, they don't have autonomy at all editorially, let us say in a general election. The Toronto Telegram for instance—if there was a general election tomorrow and we supported the N.D.P. which would be unlikely, but if we did, then everyone of the weekly newspapers would editorially support the N.D.P. too, and even one of the readers of those newspapers, if they did not like it, they could pick up the phone and they know Bassett is the fellow that...

Mr. Fortier: What would you do if anyone of the weekly newspapers did not tow the line?

The Chairman: Just for the purposes of the record before we go on, I think the Thomas newspapers in their brief made quite a point of the fact that all of their papers do not support the same party at election time. The decision is left up to the individual paper.

Mr. Bassett: I said that, I said the fundamental difference, the fundamental difference.

The Chairman: Oh, forgive me.

Mr. Bassett: Well, perhaps I should say—my old friend St. Clair Balfour is here, and we have argued this many times, and I have always said to him that I would have no hesitation at all if I was President of the Southam Company, and there was a national issue to be discussed which was of national significance, or if I owned any newspapers across the country, I'd take the responsibility for the editorial policy of all those newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: You as the publisher would take all the responsibility?

Mr. Bassett: Absolutely. So that if I owned a newspaper in some place other than Toronto—and I think this is a drag, I did once own a newspaper, and literally gave it away to the employees. It is a drag to have a newspaper in some place other than where you live and operate—that is just one man's view you understand—but if I did, I believe the responsibility in publishing is the key—that is the name of the game as far as I am concerned. Now, I will give you a specific example, the Telegram as the Senators certainly know for years traditionally and generally supported the Conservatives. In 1963 we supported the Liberals—that cost me over 10,000 readers—10,000 readers. I could bring the A.B.C. figures and show you.

The Chairman: You have since picked that up?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, we have, but it took us a long time, and after all where the hell else do they have to go. They got very mad but it was not going to warm very many Tory hearts to read the Star so they came back to the Telegram. This is what I mean by responsibility. Those readers did not like what they did; they knew who to blame; the letters and the telephone calls were fantastic; they knew who to blame and what action to take, and took it.

The Chairman: This happened when you took the Union Jack off the corner years ago, did it not, or that was prior to your time?

Mr. Bassett: That was prior to my time.

The Chairman: Just on this point if I may, Mr. Fortier, before you carry on, I would like to refer to two comments. Yesterday I read a letter from a gentleman in Owen Sound pointing out that no daily newspaper ever in his country has supported the N.D.P. at election time. Senator McElman challenged that, and I said that we will check the record to find if that is the case, and we will. The question this person asked me to put to the publishers is—how is it that no daily newspaper has ever supported the N.D.P. at election time?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I cannot speak for any other newspaper but the Telegram has never supported the N.D.P. at election time because I do not believe in the policies they espouse.

The Chairman: That is the answer I thought you might make.

Mr. Bassett: What other answer is there?

The Chairman: Well, I think that the point that was made by the person who wrote this was, is it not an unusual thing that the party is able to attract 20 to 25% of the vote to use his figures, and yet never is there any editorial support?

Mr. Bassett: Oh, well now—there is editorial support...

Mr. Chairman: At election time?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, that is right. There are certain proposals, many proposals, both provincially and federally—proposals which have been brought forward by either the leader or individual members of the N.D.P.—which the Telegram has supported. But on balance we have never supported the N.D.P. We have never urged editorially that our readers should elect either at Queen's Park or Ottawa, an N.D.P. Government because we believe the policies are not in the best interests of the country.

The Chairman: The other comment of yesterday which I would like to ask you about is Mr. Templeton when he was here in the morning, expressed the opinion that the majority of members of the working press tend to a small "l" liberal position. Would you comment on that, do you agree?

Mr. Bassett: I do not think that I can speak for the members of the working press. I don't know what a small "l" liberal is.

The Chairman: May I put the question to Mr. Kelly?

Mr. Bassett: Sure, sure.

Mr. Kelly: I am inclined to restrict my remarks to the large metropolitan dailies because I think there is a difference probably. I think probably he is right that there is an inclination in this way and I want to make it very clear, it is the small "l" liberal as opposed to the party Liberal. I doubt if it applies to smaller newspapers across the country, certainly in rural Ontario; I doubt if it applies throughout a good part of the west; but it probably does apply to metropolitan Toronto.

The Chairman: Well, I think Senators, we might break for three minutes.

The Chairman: If I might call the Session back to Order. I would like to begin the questioning with Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would like to follow up some of your last answers if I may?

Mr. Bassett: Certainly.

Mr. Fortier: Do I understand you to say that the responsibility of a publisher in a newspaper also encompasses editorial initiative?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I do not know if I said that, but I so regard it.

Mr. Fortier: You do. The question was asked yesterday to Mr. McCabe as to whether the directors of a newspaper publishing company owe a first duty to the shareholders of the company, or to the general public—to the readers. I wonder if we could have your answer to that question?

Mr. Bassett: I am glad you asked that question. I don't know what Mr. McCabe answered, and I am glad I do not know what he answered because he is a friend of mine. Our company is, of course, perhaps a little different than lots of the large metropolitan companies in this field in that we are a private company—totally. We have only seven shareholders in our company, and I am the Executive head of the situation, and three of the seven shareholders are my sons, two of whom work with me. I think it is fair to say that we regard our responsibility as newspaper people—our first responsibility is to our readers. We have never paid any dividends, I don't intend to go into the financial aspects of our company. As I say it is a private company with only seven shareholders, but for the record we have never paid a dividend. We acquired this company back in 1952; we have never paid a dividend to any shareholders. We have used our profit to build a new plant, buy new presses, expand in those ways.

Mr. Fortier: Would you tell us who the shareholders are?

Mr. Bassett: Three Bassett boys, and four Eaton boys.

Mr. Fortier: These are John David's . . .

Mr. Bassett: His sons—John David's sons. So we would regard our first responsibility to be to our readers. I must say that I think if you do not regard your readers as your first responsibility, your shareholders are not going to have anything to fuss about anyway.

Mr. Fortier: Would you go so far as to venture an opinion that it might be different in the case of a public company?

Mr. Bassett: I have no experience with those companies. I am not trying to beg the question. I think it must be accepted as a fundamental premise that a daily newspaper cannot do its job, no matter what the size, no matter what the community—the daily newspaper cannot do its job if it is not financially viable. You know the New York Herald in my view is a hell of a fine newspaper—I always preferred it to the Times for instance. Well, the New York Herald Tribune ceased to be financially viable so it can happen—in effect, no influence, you can achieve nothing.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent does ownership of a newspaper involve a concept of a public trust?

Mr. Bassett: I think very much. I have no doubt at all in my mind that people engaged in the newspaper business profession in this country—the good solid working newspaper people at any level could earn more money in another line of work, and I include myself. There is no question if a fellow like Borden Spears had gone into business, and devoted the same brains and ability in a company like I.B.M. he would be a hell of a lot better off financially than he is today. If I had gone into the Bank and ended up as President of the Bank of Montreal, instead of going into the publishing business I'd be a much wealthier fellow. I think this applies all the way through.

I think the reporters, the staff—and we lose many of course—the financial pressures of family, the rewards, they go into public relations, advertising, as you know Senators. In my experience which now stretches back to 1937 when I first became a reporter on the old Globe and Mail, so it is getting to be a lot of years, I think the newspaper people of this country are hard working dedicated men and women at every level.

Mr. Fortier: At this aspect of financial return, and I will not press you but I will ask you this question since I think you have opened it up the subject just now, and also in your brief, in Paragraph 67, you say that the costs of publishing a daily newspaper are we own, and in most cases the return on invested capital in a newspaper publication is below the national average of business generally. Could you tell us on what newspaper figures you based this statement?

Mr. Bassett: I based it on the published figures of the Toronto Star which I consider to be a profitable newspaper. The Toronto Star announced recently that they are planning an expansion of something like forty million dollars. I also took into consideration the purchase price of the Toronto Telegram, and the twelve million dollar expenditure we made for new presses and equipment and building. If you take a forty million dollar expenditure, and the Toronto Star published profits of slightly over two million dollars, that is below the national average.

Mr. Fortier: So you did use your own newspaper as the norm also, did you?

Mr. Bassett: I used that to some extent, but I thought I might be asked that question so I worked out figures that were published, and sent them to the public.

Mr. Fortier: How does your editorial board function at the Telegram. Could you explain to us?

Mr. Bassett: We have a daily meeting over which I preside. At each meeting every day the editor-in-chief is there and the people that we call associate editors, people who other newspapers call editorial writers. It is my view, and I have just been complaining about the cost of publication, but it is my view of what I know of metropolitan dailies that these editorial boards are very expensive. A friend of mine once called it the extension of the ego of the publisher.

We are there every day at 11:30 after the first edition comes out. Some of the people on it you know. You know Peter Dempson who has been for years here at Ottawa. Reuben Sloan who writes abroad a good deal. We have an editorial cartoonist. John Harbron is another. Ervey Currell who writes our metropolitan City of Toronto editorials is another. We sit down, the first edition is out of both the Toronto evening papers. We sit there and we discuss what the editorial policy will be. Firstly we discuss the subjects on which we want to comment the following day. We discuss the various aspects, and we hammer out the type of position that we will present the following day on the editorial page.

The editorial cartoonist usually has two or three, sometimes more, but normally two or three very rough drawings which he puts up for consideration. Normally one of which we choose—sometimes we say go back to the drawing board, but normally one is chosen. He then finalizes that editorial cartoon for the next day.

If people like Fraser Kelly are in town he is present, the foreign correspondents, or if our man is up from Quebec City for instance, these gentlemen will also attend these conferences.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to assume on my part that you exercise a right of veto over any decision?

Mr. Bassett: Oh, that would be a fair assumption, you bet. I am one of those that believe in personal journalism—I always have. I believe that the editorial page of a newspaper is the direct responsibility of the publisher. You will never see an editorial on the Telegram that does not express to some considerable degree my beliefs on a certain subject.

Now, let me say that we have lively discussions. These are very happy meetings, at least I enjoy them, but there is lively discussion. A fellow like Fraser Kelly, I don't want to embarrass him but he is not the kind of fellow who comes into an editorial meeting with his cap in hand. Neither is Agnew. These are pros and they are the best in the country. So there is lively discussion, and sometimes there is considerable argument; but if there is a difference of opinion finally which cannot be resolved, then the decision of the editorial position is mine.

Mr. Fortier: This responsibility which you assume also extends to the editorials in the weekly newspapers?

Mr. Bassett: Well; it would—I am ashamed to say I really don't know much about the weekly newspapers. You know my son has just built a new building and bought a new press out in Cooksville. I have not seen the plant yet, but what I say is this. On what I consider a great issue, a general election, I would, through my son, send a directive that on balance we are going to support—let's say the Liberals next time, or the Conservatives which would certainly be more likely—traditionally. Although I do not know that I want to lose another ten thousand readers. In any event to make the point, certainly, if there was a war, and we had a view Canada should be part of that war, on great issues of this kind of national importance, which we regard as such, the editorial policy of the weekly papers would be the same as the Telegram. On local issues we don't—our publishers of these weekly papers all live in the communities where the papers are published, and as far as the election of a town council in Whitby—that is his responsibility.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing there was a great burning issue, which might be the next federal election and you had so decided to support the Conservative party nationally, which decision might come naturally . . .

Mr. Bassett: Might come more easily.

Mr. Fortier: And you instructed your editors to so editorialize and your publisher in Oakville said "no" what would you do?

Mr. Bassett: I would suggest that he had better find some place where he would be happier in his work, no question. What is the use of him having to write editorials with which he disagrees?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I certainly agree with you.

Mr. Bassett: This is his choice.

Mr. Fortier: Would the answer you have just given, and this responsibility which you assume, would that also extend to the reporting which is done on CFTO-TV?

Mr. Bassett: No, it doesn't because of course we don't have any editorial position on CFTO-TV. We don't have an editorial position so it doesn't apply. It has been suggested to me from time to time. In fact I had a discussion about it one time with Harry Boyle, who was a newspaper man before he was Vice-Chairman of the CRTC. He used to write to the Telegram and he said why don't you have an editorial position on CFTO. The reason we don't is a very simple one. There is no technique that I know of on television by which the public can participate. There is no letters to the editor column. There is no technique, you can't have 50 people every day coming allocating—I just don't know how to work it out. Therefore we have no editorial position. We don't take an editorial position. There is another reason too. A television station, CFTO, like all of the others operate under a license from a Government agent. Therefore my view would be that there might be many people that whatever editorial stand you took, the editorial stand might be suspect because you are operating under a Government license.

Mr. Fortier: You explain very clearly why you were forced, as I think you more or less indicated, to go into the weekly newspaper field. Could you similarly tell us how you came to invest in cable television?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, I invested in cable television—you know I am not in it anymore?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I know that you had to get out.

Mr. Bassett: I'll show you the scars.

Mr. Fortier: But I would like to know what your thinking is?

Mr. Bassett: I went into the cable television because—mostly because of an intimate friend of mine called Ted Rogers who was a minority shareholder of CFTO, a member of the board, and a great advocate of cable. I was not particularly interested in cable at all . . .

Mr. Fortier: He is a convincing man.

Mr. Bassett: Yes, and a good friend we have been associated for quite a long time; he wanted to go into cable and he wanted a partner to bring some financial strength to help. It is an expensive business to get started, and one thing and another, and so we agreed to be partners, and we then went in the business in that way. At that time the picture for cable looked somewhat different. It didn't look very interesting to me. I regarded it as simply a gadget to bring programs into people's homes; and I am more interested in the side of the operation which creates the programs.

Mr. Fortier: No other motive?

Mr. Bassett: Well, he persuaded me. He felt over a period of years we might make something. This was a motive.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder to what extent the impending technological changes which may affect substantially the publishing of daily newspapers could have influenced you?

Mr. Bassett: Not at all. I am unfortunately—you know that area of a human person's mind which can comprehend as it applies to broadcasting, I sit and listen to broadcasts as they talk about satellites but I have not figured out yet how the telephone works. I really haven't. So this is an area where we have a couple of fellows devoting all their time, or 90% of their time to the research side. One is an engineer and the other a former managing editor, Andy McFarlane. These two fellows are almost totally involved in research to try and tell what is going to happen in the future.

Mr. Fortier: Is there anyone here today who can help us out?

Mr. Bassett: What will happen? no, no.

Mr. Fortier: Not as much what will happen but how you feel your newspaper and others in North America will be affected?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I don't think so. We would have brought Bob Granger with us perhaps, but I don't think there is. In fact I'm darned sure there is not.

Mr. Fortier: I see there is a volunteer?

Mr. D. Bassett: Well, volunteering to this extent. The technology of newspapers is very low in developing for various reasons—the rigidity of the unions and so on—but it is catching up with us very quickly and we don't know whether in eight or nine years we may be able to push a button and have a newspaper on the wall, or some facsimile. We just don't know.

The Chairman: Would it be fair to request at some point in the New Year one of our stiff people could have a chat with Mr. Granger?

Mr. Bassett: Sure. But this was not a factor at the time.

Mr. Fortier: You had non-media interests Mr. Bassett through...

Mr. Bassett: Sports.

Mr. Fortier: Do your readers know, Mr. Bassett that you have, your readers of the Telegram know that you have?

Mr. Bassett: Oh, I think so.

The Chairman: I think I can answer that by do.

Mr. Bassett: Right.

Mr. Fortier: I speak as a Montrealer.

Mr. Bassett: Well, in every life some rain must fall. Yes, I think they do. You see my father said years ago—and very wise he was—he said that a newspaper publisher shouldn't do anything else. He should not sit on company boards; he should not do anything but operate his newspaper; if offered he should not be a director of commercial companies and so on. He also followed that rule, and I have always followed that rule—with two exceptions, Maple Leaf Gardens and Toronto Argonauts. Well, I am a fanatic about sports, and of course having broken this rule which I think is a good rule generally—of course I did it in probably two of the most controversial areas, publicized areas of operation in Toronto, and there is no question that I think most of my readers who have any interest in sports know that connection.

Mr. Fortier: If any story is going to be published by your sports editor which may adversely affect either the Maple Leaf Gardens or the Argonauts Football Club, what would you as publisher, in the light of what you have told us, what would you say?

Mr. Bassett: Not a thing.

Mr. Fortier: You wouldn't?

Mr. Bassett: Not a thing. I don't see those stories until they are in the paper. As a matter of fact I have had violent disagreements particularly in the area of football, and particularly this season. I thought, not for the record if I may, I thought we had a very poor quarterback in Mr. Wilkinson, and Scott Young and others all thought he was great and we used to have stand-up arguments in the news room. If it affected their writing at all, it only affected it to the extent they praised him even more. I do not influence in any way the covering of those things.

Mr. Fortier: Your father's views on conglomerates with media interests which you have relaxed only to the extent of these sports enterprises, are we to understand that you agree with them today, and they should be applied in Canada?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I don't know that I am qualified to make that statement. I can only speak for myself. I always come back in thinking that it seems to me the key word is responsibility.

Some years ago I was offered a directorship in a chartered bank by the president of that bank who was a friend of mine. I was flattered but I said to him "I really do not think you want me on your Board because what is going to happen if the chartered banks of Canada, or the Bankers' Association or maybe even your bank decides a course of action at your annual meeting and you make a statement on fiscal policy with which the Telegram violently disagrees. If we write an editorial criticizing you, your directors are going to say "What the hell is this fellow, this snake in the grass, this traitor doing on our Board of Directors"; and of course, he was delighted when I said I would not be on his Board.

Now, I do not know that I would say that if the Telegram went out and controlled an apartment block. Then you own it and you are responsible for it. The tenants know where the responsibility lies. It is quite a different thing to being simply a member of a board of directors. I relate ownership, as I say in my brief, in another area. I do not really believe there is many more potent factors towards real responsibility than the factor of ownership.

Senator McElman: May I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator McElman: Well, Mr. Bassett, you say your banker friend had not thought of it in that way, would it be possible that he had thought of it in another way? That if you were on his Board he might...

Mr. Bassett: Oh, I would not think so, Senator.

Senator McElman: He knew better?

Mr. Bassett: I am sure I know him better. No, no.

The Chairman: I do not think, Mr. Bassett that you dealt really directly with Mr. Fortier's question. You prefaced your remarks by saying that you could only speak as an individual. You know I take that point up to a point, but you know you are also, with respect, a pretty senior person in the newspaper business in Canada, and therefore I think he might put that question to you again because we would be genuinely interested in your opinion?

Mr. Fortier: Your views on conglomerates with interest in the media as well as in other fields?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I am opposed to it. I think that a man in the communications business, I would say that in principle and I would apply it to myself, I do not think it is the most desirable thing in the world that the publisher of the Telegram is also chairman of the Maple Leaf Gardens, and the Toronto Argonauts. I don't think it is the ideal situation.

Mr. Fortier: How do you protect yourself from the possibility of undue influence being brought to bear by the T. Eaton Company?

Mr. Bassett: It is simply not a question. When Mr. Eaton lent me the money to buy the Telegram we never ever, ever had a contract. The purchase of the Telegram was, of course, totally unsuspected because of the very sudden death of McCullagh. I have been a great friend of John David Eaton's who was also a great friend of Mr. McCullagh's. We were social friends and thought a great deal of each other, and it never occurred to us that Mr. McCullagh was going to die at the age of 47. When he did I went to Mr. Eaton and said—"you have a simple choice, I do not want to go back to Sherbrooke, and I don't know what is going to happen to the Telegram. I would be very happy if you would lend me the money to buy it, or otherwise I would be pleased to become vice-president of the T. Eaton Company". He said "Oh, my God", so we bought the Telegram. We had no contract, we never did, we never ever had and it was not until later that the suggestion came forward that I was to participate in ownership. The only agreement we had which has never been breached, and in fact never spoken of again, was that I would be publisher and have total and complete editorial control of the newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: And that has happened?

Mr. Bassett: Of course.

Mr. Fortier: You referred to getting out of Sherbrooke, leaving; in effect I think you said giving the paper to the employees?

Mr. Bassett: I did.

Mr. Fortier: Is it possible that another reason is the varied essence of your brief, to wit that you were an absentee owner as far as the Sherbrooke Record is concerned?

Mr. Bassett: My father bought the Sherbrooke Record many years ago in 1936 and then at the end of the war I came home from overseas. I was entitled and could have gone back to the Globe and Mail as a reporter, the job I had left but I did not want to do that. Mr. McCullagh felt that the years had gone on, and this was not good. I had been nominated to run for Parliament for Sherbrooke while overseas, and came back and contested that election—so I bought the paper from my father. I did not want to work for my father on the Gazette, so he said I will sell you the Sherbrooke Record.

At that time the price was set, indeed by the Department of National Revenue from father to son; so I had to borrow some money and bought it. I stayed there for three years until Mr. McCullagh bought the Telegram. He invited me to come back, and I came within five days. I kept the paper because I thought of this boy, Douglas who is very fond of the Eastern Townships, which as you know is a lovely, lovely part of Canada. He had an idea that he might like to go and operate that newspaper. However when he decided his future lay in Toronto, I gave it to Mr. Saunders and another man who had been there operating for me for a long time.

Mr. Fortier: In Paragraph 69 of your brief on state labour costs at the Telegram represent 44% of the cost of operation. I know that the American Newspaper Guild is in at the Telegram. To what extent are these costs represented by this figure of 44%? To what extent are they the result of, I think they can be referred to as union rigidities or excesses, any?

Mr. Bassett: I think as far as the Telegram concerned with the American Guild there are no excesses. I have found over the years that I bargain these contracts personally, and have for many, many years—20 years. I regard my relationship with the American Newspaper Guild as excellent. I can give you an example of which I am very proud. We had a very unfortunate strike of the I.T.U. in Toronto. A strike brought about by the international headquarters in the United States, in Colorado Springs, on three different occasions. The three Toronto newspapers had reached agreement with the I.T.U. and on three different occasions the international headquarters would not approve the agreement reached at the Toronto level. So they stuck us. Of the three Toronto papers only the Guild at the Telegram had in their contract the provision that they did not have to cross the picket line. This contract was not in the contract of the Star or Globe, it was in the Telegram. The Guild crossed the picket line. I think over the whole strike period there were only 14 members out of 350 odd members of the Guild at the Telegram that did not cross the picket line. One was a great friend of mine, Bob Buchanan, who had been a Guild agent. He just felt he could not, and he quit. He left without any fuss as a matter of principle. He had come to work on the Telegram after having represented the Guild. The rest were young kids, what we call hoppers on the trucks—so my relationships with the American Newspaper Guild are excellent.

We have good tough bargaining sessions, no question about that, but I think they recognize the publishers' position as it is. As I said earlier in my testimony—and I feel quite sure that the deliberations here, Mr. Chairman, will bring this out—that the great majority, on the news and editorial side, and also on the advertising sales side, of the people in the newspaper business are there primarily—primarily because they love the profession. They would earn more money elsewhere in my view.

Mr. Fortier: I ask you the same question in relation to craft unions at the Telegram?

Mr. Bassett: I think that the craft unions are very well paid, there is no question about that, but I do not think the union demands in Toronto are excessive. I must say that I have found it a very healthy exercise over the years to negotiate these contracts myself. I don't do it as anxiously with the craft unions now, but I did them all, and I still do all the Guild ones; and for many years I did all of them.

Mr. Fortier: How do your lawyer friends react to that?

Mr. Bassett: They are not there you know. They are not there, and I find this a very healthy exercise. I think it builds a situation within the newspaper. I am a very accessible fellow, and I like them to be accessible to me. I think it is a helluva a good place to work.

Mr. Fortier: What good, in fact, has the Toronto Guild brought to the quality of the newspapers in recent years?

Mr. Bassett: Oh, I think they have contributed a great deal to raising the standards of living conditions in journalism. I like to regard myself as an enlightened publisher and as a responsible warm-hearted person, a warm-hearted human being—you would not expect me to say otherwise—but on the other hand I am perfectly positive that if there was no newspaper Guild in Toronto, the level of salaries would be substantially lower than they are now. I think that by their negotiations—I am talking only about Toronto you understand, that is all I know—I think that the Newspaper Guild has made a substantial contribution to the improvement of working conditions for the press.

Mr. Fortier: Has this in turn improved the quality of the newspaper?

Mr. Bassett: I think so—I do think that many people in the profession could earn more money elsewhere, but they stay because of their love of journalism; but after all you cannot expect people to work under dreadful conditions that are not comparative in any way. I think that through good bargaining, and through the strength of collective bargaining they brought dignity to the profession. I think it is a very bad thing for a fellow to have to go cap in hand and ask a man for a raise. I think it is undignified, and I am totally opposed to it. It is entirely different when you send in your Committee in legitimate collective bargaining flexing your strength and muscle. I think the Guild has done a great thing.

The Chairman: You referred to the I.T.U. strike in the past tense, was that on purpose, Mr. Bassett? The strike is still on, is it not?

Mr. Bassett: No, I always think of it . . .

The Chairman: The strike is still on, is it not?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, I guess so but the strike was lost after the first three days. I mean let us not kid ourselves. When you go on strike, if you cannot close down the factory, the strike is lost.

The Chairman: Is the Telegram picketed presently?

Mr. Bassett: Yes. Irregularly.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Bassett, do you support the suggestion of a local regional, or national press council?

Mr. Bassett: I certainly do not.

Mr. Fortier: Could you tell us why?

Mr. Bassett: Two reasons—I assume, perhaps wrongly, I assume that you are talking of a voluntary press council?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, indeed. Court of Honour as they are called?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, two reasons, two basic reasons. First of all I think it is totally ineffective. I think the press council in England is totally ineffective. The latest example of its ineffectiveness is the issue with the News of the World in the Christine Keeler Memoirs. But the more important reason is that I do not believe that a newspaper publisher should be able to diffuse his responsibility. I do not believe, for instance, that the readers should call me up and say "Gee, that is a rotten story you had in your paper", and I can say "well, it passed the press council, if you do not like it take it up with them".

Mr. Fortier: It is passing the buck?

Mr. Bassett: Certainly. I think this is no sense. And also with particular reference to Toronto which is my chief concern, I certainly would have no intention in the world to pass the editorial policies and the meeting of our responsibilities up to the judgment of Mr. Cooper and Mr. Honderich.

Mr. Fortier: How do you handle dissent in your newspaper—in your letters to the editorial column?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I mostly handle it through my columnists; but as you know again I am a great believer in basic responsibility. Newspapers, particularly in a metropolitan newspaper in Canada, cannot simply get by any more in my view reporting the news. You have got to go behind the news; you have got to offer comments; you have got to offer above all, in my opinion a great diversity of expression.

Now, the Telegram has more columnists than any newspaper in Canada, far more. And in the area of politics we have got on one side Douglas Fisher writing regularly; we have Lubor Zinc writing regularly; we have Senator John Nichol writing regularly not so frequently, but regularly everyweek. We have the former President of the Liberal Party; we have Dalton Camp, the former President of the Conservative Party. Then in other fields we have people like Ron Haggart in civic affairs, who in the last civic election supported a different slate for instance than the paper supported editorially.

The Chairman: A much better slate?

Mr. Bassett: Well, we won. So I think we have all kinds of dissent. Our columnists have complete freedom of expression. I do not reserve the right to kill a column. This is very difficult for me to do, because in practical application I never see them. Occasionally I do; we had an example the other day

We have a columnist called Dennis Braithwaite. My son John who is not here today, is very interested in our broadcast activities, and interested in the production of things. We are the Toronto producers of a musical called "Hair". The people that own this, franchise it out like Kentucky fried chicken; they came to Toronto and they went to the Royal Alex, to Mr. Ed Marvish and they wanted local people to put up the money for local production. He recommended my son, and we are doing so. Well, Dennis Braithwaite wrote a column the other day just tearing the hide off the producers of "Hair". He said it was ridiculous to charge $10.00. It was a very rough column. And so I get lots of dissent on all sorts of things within our own columns.

Mr. Fortier: This is where your readers expect to find dissent from the publishers' expressed views?

Mr. Bassett: That is right. Of course, like all newspapers, we think it is lively; but we certainly get a tremendous volume of letters to editors.

Mr. Fortier: Do you publish them?

Mr. Bassett: We wouldn't publish 20 letters on one subject; we might publish six, then we would put at the bottom—"Expressing about his same point of view we had letter from the following"—and we would put their names.

Mr. Fortier: I see. But there is no letter to the editor, after it has been discovered that it did not originate from a crack-pot, that does not get published?

Mr. Bassett: No, I think not.

Mr. Agnew: We just don't have space for them all; we have to make adjustments, and part from the crack-pots and the ones that don't say anything, we just have to make a judgment, and the same applies to the news. We have not got room for all of it.

Mr. Bassett: We also do a thing for our readers which we think has been absolutely great, and that is Action Line. It started with the reporter Frank Dray and a girl to help him and, now the Action Line staff has grown to something like ten people—eight people; the phone is going all the time. This is an area where people feel they can go for help, and it is a daily, and they certainly use it frequently.

Mr. Fortier: You referred to the "killing of columns", have you killed many columns in recent years?

Mr. Bassett: I saw Douglas Fisher said I killed one.

The Chairman: One only, he said.

Mr. Bassett: Yes, I can't remember the column I killed.

Mr. Chairman: It was a column about Mr. Pickersgill I think, was it not?

Mr. Bassett: He said it was, but I can't remember it.

Mr. Agnew: We have to decide whether it might cause a libel action too.

Mr. Fortier: But there is someone who reads every column on your editorial staff?

Mr. Agnew: Yes, every column is read by myself, or the Managing Editor, or the City Editor. But we do take out libel, and we do take out errors and mistakes. We always phone and tell him what we have done.

Mr. Fortier: The Quebec English Journalists who appeared before this Committee on Wednesday night mentioned the desirability of a Code of Ethics for newspapers in Canada. My first question is—does the Telegram have such a Code?

Mr. Bassett: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And it is a written Code, is it?

Mr. Bassett: No.

Mr. Fortier: Would you tell us of what it consists?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, it consists of what I would regard, and my very senior editors would regard as "good taste" primarily, and that is about all. I killed an article for instance in Weekend Magazine. I had to keep a crew of people up all night to...

The Chairman: I was going to ask you about that?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I don't want to discuss it on the record.

The Chairman: Well then, I am not going to insist that you do discuss it on the record. It might be interesting if we had your views, could we...

Mr. Bassett: Well, it was an article on homosexuality.

The Chairman: What you are saying now will be on the record.

Mr. Bassett: Well, I will simply say that to suggest, as some of my readers did, that the Telegram was so old-fashioned that it would not carry an article on homosexuality—we have carried hundreds of articles of homosexuality, so that is absolute nonsense but this particular article was presented in such a way that in my view it offended good taste, and therefore I killed it.

The Chairman: Perhaps we can talk about it in private because you are on the record.

Mr. Fortier: Good taste, is the taste of the public?

Mr. Bassett: And the senior editors.

Mr. Fortier: As it relates at any given time to the tastes of the community?

Mr. Bassett: No, as it relates to my good taste, I presume. I presume, that again, I take the responsibility for that.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a need in the City of Toronto for an underground newspaper?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I guess there must be, there is one from time to time called "Harbinger".

The Chairman: There are several really.

Mr. Bassett: If there is, then people must be reading it—then there must be a need for it.

Mr. Fortier: Could it be that three dailies in Toronto do not fulfil this need?

Mr. Bassett: Must be.

Mr. Fortier: If so, could it be because what usually gets into those newspapers is "bad taste"?

Mr. Bassett: I couldn't judge that, I don't read them but I understand—the Telegram is not pushing "pot" for instance. We are not going to write articles which say it is great to smoke pot, and we are not going to carry advertisements which tell people where they can go and buy it, which is a great part of the...

Senator Prowse: We are out of "sniffing glue".

Mr. Bassett: That is right. If we are old fashioned because we are opposed to this—then I'm sorry, we are old fashioned.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that a Government of today, be it at local, provincial, or federal level should interfere with the freedom of an individual to publish a newspaper which amongst other things might be pushing pot?

Mr. Bassett: No, I don't. I think as long as they are not breaking the laws of libel, or not breaking the Criminal Code, let them publish. Suppression to me, answers absolutely nothing. If people have ideas that need to be discussed, need to be written about—let me tell you why we are not pushing pot, or telling people where they can get it, or advocating it: we have articles all the time on the drug scene.

Mr. Fortier: You are involved in that area?

Mr. Bassett: Certainly. You see this is one of the big issues of our time.

Mr. Fortier: You are trying to inform your readers?

Mr. Bassett: That is right, we quote from people who do. My wife is here today, she used to be a reporter for a time on the Telegram; and she and a young man lived within that atmosphere a few years ago in the early days of Yorkville. For a period of a week they were young looking people and they did a series of articles on the whole drug scene, and we regard this as our function. We do have a reporter covering the drug scene, and this is a full time objective. A full time operation.

Mr. Fortier: Do you also have a reporter whose duty it is to keep in touch with the thinking at the University level?

Mr. Agnew: Yes, a young girl called Susan Swan, that is all she does.

Mr. Fortier: I was interested to find out during our research sessions that the Telegram is involved with the Toronto Star in some co-operative endeavours in Toronto in the coverage of some rather routine material such as City Hall and the police beats. This has been abandoned, I believe?

Mr. D. Bassett: The only co-operation that did exist, and this was some years ago was in the joint setting up of the Court bureau, there was some joint Court facilities.

Mr. Fortier: Why was this abandoned by you know?

Mr. D. Bassett: Well, it certainly did not extend to the City Hall, the competition could not be keener, and there would be no suggestion on our part at all...

Mr. Fortier: It did not some years ago?

Mr. D. Bassett: Not that I am aware of.

Mr. Bassett: Borden Spears...

Mr. D. Bassett: It used to be that the Court Bureau was at City Hall.

Mr. Fortier: It did not extend to the City Hall politics?

Mr. D. Bassett: Certainly not.

Mr. Bassett: I never knew it really existed. Borden Spears could tell you more about that than I could. Over a long period of years there have been various tentative conversations between the publisher of the Star, and the publisher of the Telegram. We discussed for instance a couple of times the possibility of joint delivery, you see. But to be perfectly frank with you I should think that the publisher of the Star and the publisher of the Telegram would find it almost congenitally impossible in the competitive field in Toronto, in the area of the competitive evening field in Toronto. If we had a joint delivery system with the Star, and the Telegrams were late on Tuesday, and it happened to be a Star fellow who was in charge of the delivery system that week, or that day, I would be sure to say—that fellow is sticking it to me. I am sure if it went the other way Honderich would feel exactly the same way. You have to live in Toronto in the newspaper atmosphere to appreciate the degree of competition that exists. I think that is true, isn't that true, Gordon?

Mr. Ashworth: No question.

The Chairman: Just on that question, you see the Telegram truck and the Star truck coming up Yonge Street in the morning putting the papers out. Does it matter who gets here first?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: In terms of sales?

Mr. Bassett: Sure does.

The Chairman: About how much would it matter?

Mr. Bassett: Well, the Star has 140,000 more papers to sell every day than I do, so it matters that much to me.

The Chairman: Well, you know specifically?

Mr. Bassett: It matters this much, Senator. The great portion of the City sales are the first edition of both evening papers—corner sale, street sale. If somebody hurries out at lunch at noon, and the Stars are late, and the Telegram is there, the fellow is going to lunch, he is not going to wait five minutes of an hour lunch hour to wait for the star Truck to come along; he'll grab a Telegram. Now, the specific figures, I do not know.

The Chairman: It is considerable? It is important to you?

Mr. Bassett: It is this important. When we moved from Melinda Street, the outside limits of the land that we were looking for, we told the real estate people we had to move and we limited the area—Spadina in the west, Sherburne in the east, Dundas in the north. Now, actually we went just beyond Spadina as you know. The reason for that was that we had to compete under down-town Toronto traffic conditions. It would have been much less expensive to go away the hell out some place, and buy some land much cheaper and build a plant; but we never could have got down town with our papers. It is that important.

Mr. Fortier: What, Mr. Bassett, what basic research resources in investigatory facilities—if you know what I mean—we do not have simultaneous translation today—and up-dating assistance does the Telegram provide generally for its staff?

Mr. Bassett: I don't—I am sorry to make you say it all over again, but...

Mr. Fortier: What basic research resources do you provide for your staff?

Mr. Bassett: Well, we have a very full library, a morgue we call it.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that sort of thing.

Mr. Bassett: We have a library, a very complete library and morgue; and then the staff—that's about it, if they have to go to research—that is about it.

Mr. Perigoe: Well, if the research facilities are not there, they go to another library, or go and talk to somebody or phone on a specific project, or if it is a big project such as "The Canada Seventy" project we go and hire some researchers. Fraser can give you the details but we have hundreds of people working in our research organization. Getting material for us. It depends on the project.

Mr. Kelly: I think in that case, it was not a matter of not having people, but I think it was a matter of hiring a team of sociologists to do some work in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Bassett: Did you see that series?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I did.

Mr. Bassett: Well, this is published by MacLean Stewart, I think this is a terrific undertaking.

Mr. Fortier: Well, on that point, do you feel that you as a publisher have a responsibility to promote national unity?

Mr. Bassett: I certainly do.

Mr. Fortier: Is this with that thought in mind?

Mr. Bassett: Yes. You see I believe we have a responsibility to promote national unity, but I think this we do on our editorial page—it is I guess like we are for motherhood. I mean we are for national unity but where I regard that responsibility to lie is to provide information for our readers so they can then hopefully make up their own mind.

Mr. Fortier: I have often heard it said in Quebec that Toronto papers, the Telegram included, stressed the negative side of the Quebec scene rather than the positive side. Would you comment?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, I think it is wrong.

Mr. Fortier: Think it is wrong. Wrong in the case of your newspaper?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, I think it is wrong in the case of all three Toronto papers. As you know I was brought up in the Province of Quebec, and have many friends there. It upsets people from Quebec quite naturally if a bomb goes off in Montreal, or if there is an unofficial police strike or something; To suggest that Toronto, or any other newspaper—we don't make the news, we print it; and it doesn't do a darned bit of good, in fact I think it does a great deal of harm, simply to lift up the corner of the carpet and shove it under, or not publish it. That does not mean the event didn't happen. Now, on the other hand we must publish, and we make available the columns of our paper to people like Claude Ryan to write—we seek out these kind of articles from people that know more about the subject, we think perhaps than we know ourselves, because they are there daily on the scene. When Mr. Bertrand comes we interview him fully, using both television and the newspaper so that he has pictures of all three Toronto dailies. Bertrand, for instance, would get tremendous coverage on a visit to Toronto—Toronto more than any place.

Mr. Fortier: I certainly cannot disagree with you—it certainly must not be swept under the carpet; but it has been said no news is good news—good news is no news for a newspaper—is that so really?

Mr. Bassett: This of course, in my view is a widely held misconception that people have. There is no question that newspapers stress dramatic events; but particularly in this country, and in the issue of national unity, I think that when there is no news, as you say or good news..

Mr. Fortier: Good news.

Mr. Bassett: Good news has now become in this context in my view, and is reflected in the coverage of the Toronto Telegram, has become big news. It is good news when Mr. Bertrand came, for instance, to Toronto as he did the other day and says he is for a unified Canada, that certainly he wants changes in the Constitution. He wants a greater recognition of what he believes to be the special problems of Quebec; but he says and he uses the phrase "I don't want to have a divorce, and then try to get some kind of new remarriage, I want to make this marriage with the rest of Canada work". His speeches and interviews were on the front page of every Toronto daily paper. And that is good news.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if we could hear from Mr. Kelly on that?

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fortier, I would like to hear from Mr. Kelly, and then with you—you know the time is getting short, and if you would answer that, Fraser and the others perhaps we will go on with some of the other Senators—we'll certainly come back to you.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Kelly: Mr. Fortier, on Quebec coverage Quebec is one of my responsibilities. For example in "Canada 70" material, we had five men working in Quebec for a full two months before they wrote a word—now, that is unprecedented as far as I am concerned in daily journalism. We also worked closely with the staff of Le Devoir. Mr. Ryan co-operated with us because we have not enough French speaking reporters. We have gone out and hired a couple, and have one in Ottawa, the other in Quebec City. Now, in that case, for example, we were able to interview personally, I think the figure was 98 of the members of the Quebec Assembly. We talked to every single mayor of every single community, over 20,000 in the Province of Quebec.

This is not sensational national reporting. Some of the results may appear to people in Quebec, whether they be English Canadians or French-speaking Canadians, as unfortunate or sensational but they were not published without immense research.

Mr. Bassett: I would just point out, to amplify if I may, we deliberately some time ago—deliberately went into the Province of Quebec and hired a French Canadian, Claude Henault to become part of our Ottawa Bureau, because we felt it was important for Ontario readers of the Toronto Telegram, and Toronto readers to have in their newspaper regularly, reporting from the capital of the country by a French Canadian. Having been brought up myself in the Province of Quebec, there are subtle differences. There is a different reaction from—even on the part of a professional reporter.

Mr. Fortier: Vive la différence!

Mr. Bassett: Exactement. C'est pour ça que nous avons engagé Monsieur Henault ici, pour Ottawa tous les deux jours, pour l'expression canadienne-française.

The Chairman: Perhaps this is the time to turn to Senator Bourque, I believe you had a question.

Senator Bourque: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My question was in regard to Paragraph No. 97. Mr. Bassett, you have said "I have twice tried to publish a Sunday paper where no Sunday paper did exist. The cost of production was such that I could not afford the length of time necessary to establish the publication." Now, I was just wondering if that was a thing that was particular to the Anglo Saxon people, or French Canadian people because you see, we used to have the Standard in Montreal. Now, they have been incorporated with the Saturday Star. There is a gentleman in Montreal Mr. Francoeur as you now, who did pretty well with the Dimanche-Matin, I think he sells somewhere near 350,000 weekly papers, and this paper comes out only on Sunday morning, and he gets the news. Now, he has a tremendous sale. Now, of course as you know, he has taken over, along with others the Petit-Journal, Photo-Journal, La Patrie and many of these, and they all seem to be very prosperous, every one of them. So we have now in Montreal only one Sunday paper. What I mean is not a weekly paper—we have no other weekly anyway—but one paper that comes out on Sunday and that is the Sunday Express. I do not know just how long it is going to last. It has been going for about six months, but that is the only English paper that we have.

Now, when you said that you could not make Sunday papers pay, is it due to the difference in nationality? Would the French Canadian be more apt to read the week-end papers than the daily papers—there must be some difference, because we have not only these papers, we have about 30 papers that are published—you know weekly papers in Montreal; and if Toronto has not got many, there must be a difference in the thinking of the people.

The Chairman: Do you care to comment?

Mr. Bassett: Yes. Well, I don't know if I am too qualified. All I can say is that I think it is a question of habit. I am not sure that in the first instance of the Sunday paper which I made—what might be called total immersion, that if I had persisted, if I had been able to sustain the losses which were quite staggering, maybe over a long period of time, a long period of years it might have succeeded; but the losses were staggering, and then we went into it after very careful analysis—I mean we compared markets like Cleveland, Baltimore which we regarded as comparable to the Toronto market—but I was wrong. What happened, of course, on the Toronto market, is that the big Sunday papers in the United States have simply been pushed back a day. Both the Star and the Telegram sell substantially more papers on Saturday which includes a magazine supplement, coloured comics, and special features and so on, than they do Monday to Friday, and many people I know, don't get through the Saturday week-end Telegram on Saturday, it takes them two days. They read it at their leisure because there is so much more material. Therefore I guess the need of a Sunday paper does not exist. The huge week-end supplements in the United States are published on Sunday.

Then, of course, the other factor is that by and large, Mr. Cooper of the Globe, or Mr.

Peters of the Gazette may not agree, but the fact is that generally speaking, unlike England and also unlike the United States in some respects, Canada is an evening paper country. You know the great circulation papers in England were all morning papers; here they are all evening papers; by and large this is an evening paper country. Therefore a Sunday morning paper—I think this perhaps is a factor, sir; but I don't know, I personally would not agree with your analogy. I don't think French Canadians are that much different to English Canadians.

Senator Bourque: I was asking because it seemed strange. In Montreal we have so many Sunday papers.

Mr. Bassett: They are not really Sunday papers in the real sense of newspapers. I mean the Petit-Journal, it is more of a weekend package of features, it is not news oriented.

Senator Bourque: That is right.

Mr. Bassett: This is the difference, it is more of a magazine type.

Senator Bourque: That is right but Dimanche-Matin is strictly a paper with news.

Mr. Bassett: That is right, and not that successful, is it?

Senator Bourque: Dimanche-Matin? Well, it was the foundation of Mr. Francoeur, that is what he started out with.

Mr. Bassett: Well, send him up to Toronto and let him take a crack at my market, I would like to see how it would go.

Senator Bourque: Thank you.

The Chairman: I said Mr. Bassett we would adjourn at 12:30 but this is so interesting. We can only stay until quarter-to-one because we have to attend Royal Assent but would you agree to sitting until then?

Mr. Bassett: Oh, sure.

The Chairman: Thank you. I will turn to Senator Prowse and then Senator McElman.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Bassett, where do you recruit your editorial staff? I do not mean just the editorial writers?

Mr. Bassett: You mean the reporters?

Senator Prowse: Yes?

Mr. Bassett: I am a great believer, Senator, in trying to get people who have done a stint on smaller dailies throughout the Province. First of all that is the kind of training I had, and I suppose you reflect the thing that was good for you will be good for somebody else. The fact is, generally speaking on papers like the Toronto Telegram we do not have the time to train a young reporter. It would be very rare for us to take a man or a woman who had no previous experience, and it is not good for that reporter. You get somebody in who has virtually had no experience, and let us say he got the police beat. Well, he might stay on the police beat for five years before he got a chance to get out. We publish four editions a day under a highly competitive situation, and we do not have the time to take a young man or woman by the hand and say "Now, do a stint on sports"; do a stint here, and so on. Whereas as you know yourself on a paper like the Sherbrooke Record, the Galt paper, the Belleville paper or the Guelph paper, you go in there as a young reporter out of university and spend three or four years—you are liable to cover a woman's tea one day, a hockey game the next, to the Town Council Meeting the next day. You get a good solid broad training and these are the kind of people we are looking for.

Senator Prowse: Do you consider the on-the-job training of that type is more valuable than the school of journalism, per se?

Mr. Bassett: I do.

Senator Prowse: Now, there are a lot of problems in the newspaper business in Canada that we have to address ourselves to—that obviously do not apply to the Toronto area because of the three newspapers you have there. But is there anything that can be done to do two things—one is to provide suitable staff for all of the one newspaper cities in Canada, or some facilities that will give them some training to up-grade that; and secondly, can you suggest how the problem of dissent can be handled in a one-newspaper town as opposed to all of the facilities for dissent that are available in the City of Toronto?

Mr. Bassett: Well, again with my background being so long in publishing, I do not believe that the problem of dissent, serious dissent—you always have problems in communication. For instance, in the last election there were four candidates for mayor. Most everybody thought there were three—so you have a continual problem in Toronto or any place else. The fourth candidate was an attractive young fellow who was running on a Trotsky ticket. Well now, what is the responsibility of a newspaper, or more important even perhaps, because as I say you are under a Government license, and when you are doing a Public Affairs television show to generate interest in a municipal election, what coverage does Mr. Riddell get for instance? Is he entitled to the same coverage as Clarkson, or Margaret Campbell, or Bill Dennison? Is he entitled to the same time?

In other words, just because somebody is a candidate, does this immediately mean that every candidate has to be judged alike? I don't think so.

Senator Prowse: I am not thinking of just that situation. For example, let us take Toronto, you have three big daily newspapers that are covering the news, that are unconnected with each other, that everybody knows are competing. Now, even if the three of them came out with the identical slate, as a reader of the newspapers in Toronto, I come to the conclusion—well, there are three different people who have had a chance to examine these people carefully, and have all come to the same conclusion so this fellow must really have something on the ball.

Mr. Bassett: I should point out to you, I don't mean to interrupt, but that is exactly what happened in the municipal election before the last, and Bill Dennison, who was not on any slate, just beat the pants off the three dailies.

Senator Prowse: Well, that brings up another question, but the situation I am thinking of is that in the one-newspaper towns it seems to me that the reputation of the papers for credibility suffers very, very seriously. Not, I think, that they necessarily deserve to, but because they are the only voice, they are automatically suspect. In other words they cannot come out and run three candidates for mayor. If they come out and say that they are all good guys, then everybody says "What the hell is going on here?", and this I think is a very real problem to the press?

Mr. Bassett: Well, that exists.

Senator Prowse: Now, I do not think that legislation is going to cure this, but I think that one way we may serve on this Committee is to enable people with experience in these things, to make public statements that will then be available to the people who are most concerned?

The Chairman: Well, would you put that as a question, please?

Senator Prowse: Yes. That is the question.

The Chairman: To comment on that?

Senator Prowse: Yes?

Mr. Bassett: Well, I think Senator Prowse if what you say, like a paper like the Edmonton Journal has a problem?

Senator Prowse: Yes?

Mr. Bassett: . . . has a problem of credibility, not that one in particular?

Senator Prowse: No, no, the same as all of them.

Mr. Bassett: Yes. Well, I don't live in Edmonton, I'd be surprised. You know Alberta, and if this is so, there is no question, they have a problem, but I think this is a problem that the publisher of the Edmonton Journal has to examine, and he has to—I have no answer.

Senator Prowse: They ran a page of dissent two or three times a week, and then finally they ran out of writers for it; it got to be the same fellows, and eventually the only people who wrote were the same people that write regularly letters to the editor, so that—this did not solve the problem.

Mr. Bassett: No, I take it that you are looking for something more than the letters to the editor forum.

Senator Prowse: Yes, even if it were a page set up for independent editorials and they were to hire persons to take responsibility for this. Now, these fellows would take responsibility for their own page. In other words almost setting up two editorial departments?

Mr. Bassett: Well, that is of course what happens in Toronto, and particularly in the evening field.

Senator Prowse: Well, you deal with all your different varieties . . .

Mr. Bassett: That is right.

Senator Prowse: But the ordinary small daily in the medium sized, or smaller communities cannot afford that?

Mr. Bassett: That is right. Well, they have a problem but then again I think what has to be examined is what is the function. Basically the function is the same, but in the working out, the function of the Woodstock paper, let us say is not precisely in detail the same function as the Toronto Telegram. I think that it is a different function. And that the Woodstock Sentinel in its community...

The Chairman: It is under review . . .

Senator Prowse: All right, whatever it is, all of your cities until you get away out from Sault Ste. Marie on—but almost as far as Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario, the people do have access to the Toronto dailies on a quick enough time basis. I imagine that I could get today's paper at least by tomorrow. Now, when you get out into Regina—Winnipeg has two papers—but when you get to Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton—Calgary has the extent of two papers but it really does not have—Lethbridge, Medicine Hat. Now, they really do not have access. They have the one paper and there is no way they can have access to things within a reasonable time, or at a possible price. I would think that for the newspaper industry itself, in order to protect their own credibility—some of this problem of credibility comes through from the past, from the depression when we had a line of newspapers in Alberta the same as Huey Long had in Louisiana. You know this was the great game, if you could get the newspaper mad at you, you were elected. Now, it seems to me that people like yourself, and you have had the experience in both the small communities and the metropolitan areas—it seems to me that you could put on the record something that might be of value to these people in trying to solve this very, very serious problem.

Mr. Bassett: Well, at the risk of telling these other publishers how to mind their business, and I have enough trouble minding my own, I would so do if I had an easy solution. It is not that I am unwilling to do so. I believe, though I do not personally know all these editors that you have mentioned, I know a good many of them, and I must say that I have a great admiration for them as I am sure you do.

Senator Prowse: Good papers.

Mr. Bassett: Darned right they are good papers, and they are certainly trying to meet the needs of their community, and it is a difficult problem editorially. I know through discussions with owners, responsible officers of chain newspapers where they have monopoly situation, they are concerned with what you speak about. I think without knowing a great deal about it, it seems to me that it falls down on the other side. I think some of these papers because they are the only editorial voice in the community, do not take perhaps in every instance they don't give the strongest editorial leadership. You see a newspaper can give a strong leadership which I think it should. The readers in as many cases as not reject that leadership. Reject those suggestions. I gave you the example of Bill Dennison in the election before the last; but that does not in my view mean the paper should not continue to express its view anyway.

Senator McElman: I do not know if you apply this locally, but the Canadian Press does provide a service with which they carry each week the editorial opinion from across the country. Certainly on national news those papers should have available to them, for example editorials from Le Devoir and so on.

Senator Prowse: They do that, I am speaking of one like the Journal and the Herald for example. The Lethbridge Herald which I see once in a while and the Journal and the Herald in Calgary; the Medicine Hat paper I do not see as often; but they do carry that on the national issues, this is not a big problem. It is on the question of local issues, you know the size of a garbage can can be a hell of a lot more important than who the next prime minister is going to be unfortunately, and that kind of thing.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse, do you have other questions, because I just want to ask one quick question. The Telegram used to run a campaign, perhaps you still do, that it is the most quoted newspaper in Canada?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, still is.

The Chairman: Does that campaign still run?

Mr. Bassett: Yes, we run it, not a campaign there is an independent organization which counts up the quotes.

The Chairman: Why is the Telegram the most quoted newspaper in Canada?

Mr. Bassett: Because I think it is the best.

The Chairman: That the only reason?

Mr. Bassett: Well, must be.

The Chairman: O.K. I will put that identical question to some other publisher.

Mr. Bassett: Oh, we go to some trouble to make these editorials available.

The Chairman: I was coming to that.

Mr. Bassett: They are readily available, we do not always wait to be invited to send them.

Senator McElman: Firstly I would like to say how deeply my background appreciates a witness who answers straight and frankly. You have done so, sir. As a matter of fact you have ruled out many of the questions I had proposed to ask you, and I will restrict myself to a couple.

The protection of source of information by journalists has been discussed at quite some length. In capsule form, the current situation is that the Court decides whether a journalist should testify in a criminal action. Some journalists suggest they should be able to make that decision themselves, and this should be protected by the law. What is your view?

Mr. Bassett: My view would be if this applied to me as it did, in a famous case many years ago, to my late friend Blair Fraser, I would be prepared to leave that decision to the Courts. Mind you if I felt as strongly about it as Mr. Fraser did at that time, and I am sure journalists have since, I would protect my source, and if I felt strongly enough about it, I would have to pay the penalty, but I would be perfectly prepared to leave that decision with the Courts of this country.

Senator McElman: As it now exists?

Mr. Bassett: Certainly.

Senator McElman: In your brief at Page 6, section 30 you refer to a national newspaper, and say it is not feasible, I take that as financially?

Mr. Bassett: Geographically not feasible, sir. It is not really a question of finance, it is a question of geography. It is not feasible because under existing means of communication you cannot put a newspaper that is time—news is a perishable commodity—and you just cannot put a newspaper into the hands of a reader on a national basis in this country. What has happened because of this, of course, is that as newspapers have developed over the years, the reader looks for and expects, and therefore gets a substantial proportion in his newspaper of local and regional news. In this respect it becomes also a financial problem. That is why the Telegram or the Star cannot really—while their papers are distributed all over Ontario, in most cases I could not give you the percentages, but for instance the Toronto Star and the Toronto Telegram over the years, they both really have given up now, but over the years have literally sunk tens of thousands of dollars into Hamilton, a big thriving, bustling city. It looked like a prime market, but the Hamilton Spectator has got Hamilton locked up. It is a fine newspaper, it serves the needs of its community excellently. It has a first rate publisher, a fellow called Tommy Nichols, he is just great. The Star and Tely sell a few papers, the Globe sell many more because they sell about seventeen or eighteen thousand in the morning, but this is a good example. You could truck papers down to Hamilton out of the Telegram plant probably all afternoon but probably nobody wants them.

So it is a geographical situation, and a regional thing which is reflected in so many aspects of our whole national life.

Senator McElman: On my premise that a national newspaper would be good for the nation, do you foresee technological development of a newspaper, not in the form we now see it, but as one gentleman spoke about a newspaper on your wall perhaps five years from now, do you see a national newspaper in that sense? Do you see a demand sufficient to bring it within that sense?

Mr. Bassett: No, I don't, sir. I don't. There are two good newspapers in Winnipeg as you know, the Free Press and the Tribune; the Free Press particularly has had over the long years, a great tradition of the western political sensitivity. I would think that the readers of the Free Press would not be—I would think that their thirst for national coverage is probably very well satisfied by the Winnipeg Free Press, and that a national newspaper could not hope to compete with the Winnipeg Free Press in the coverage of the news of Winnipeg, or the Manitoba area, and would simply be not financially viable in any way even if you get it there.

Senator Prowse: For free?

Mr. Bassett: They would not want it, I don't think so. Do you?

Senator Prowse: No.

Mr. Bassett: They would not want it in Alberta?

Senator Prowse: I do not think so.

Senator McElman: There was a question a few moments ago, do the Toronto newspapers show a responsibility. With respect and actually to give a testimonial for the Toronto newspapers, where a situation developed in one Province which was highly controversial—a highly controversial program was being instituted . . .

Mr. Bassett: In New Brunswick?

Senator McElman: Exactly, and many people felt that it was not getting the balanced coverage at the local level. I would simply like to say, for the record there are thousands of people in New Brunswick who respected the job that was done by the Toronto newspapers in sending their people into New Brunswick and doing a balanced coverage. And although the newspapers of New Brunswick did not see fit to republish that balanced coverage, it did serve the purpose within Canada that your readers knew what was going on, and in that sense many people deeply appreciated the fact that you do pay attention to the issues that go on outside of Toronto.

The Chairman: Unhappily we must adjourn in a moment or two. However there are two important questions I would like to get on the record. There is one I am going to forego. I would have very liked to have questioned Mr. Kelly about the Press Gallery, but perhaps there will be another opportunity to do that. Mr. Fortier you have one question, could we forego it?

Mr. Fortier: Well, maybe we can get a yes or no answer although this is not the sort of answer I seek. Mr. Bassett for some months now the Telegram has sold a page to a public relations firm . . .

Mr. Bassett: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: . . . which uses it to print stories and photographs about its business clients? This page to me looks like a news page. I know that there is a line identifying it. On the question of ethics, what are your views on this page?

Mr. Bassett: I wish I could sell ten of them. You yourself said that it looked like a news page but you said it was clearly defined as an advertising page.

Mr. Fortier: I know there is a line if you look closely.

Mr. Bassett: Well, you don't have to look closely. Be my guest. It is right at the top, it is clearly designated as an advertisement, and I believe that a newspaper has not only the right, but it has the responsibility to be available to clients who will pay the rates, and buy the advertising as long as the advertising copy is clearly designated as advertising.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

The Chairman: Well, I think I could say in closing the session that the question that I have can be put to television people when they come. The Senators have expressed their gratitude. I think we have all been impressed as I always am with your frankness and we appreciate your bringing your team of people and answering so many questions. There are so many areas which I think we would like to follow up. You said you would send us the information on homosexuality. We mentioned Mr. Bassett, there are several other matters and perhaps we can have an opportunity of talking to you informally and privately. I do not mean before the whole Committee. I will simply say on behalf of us all again we are grateful, and thank you.

I would point out Senators that the next meeting of the Committee will be at ten a.m. on the 20th of January in this room, and we shall be in touch with you.

Mr. Bassett: If I may on behalf of myself and my colleagues say that we have found this useful and we are just delighted that the calibre of you gentlemen are taking this kind of interest, and are going to this kind of trouble to get at some of these problems. Best wishes as well as a Happy Christmas.

The Chairman: Thank you.

THE SENATE

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, January 20, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I might call the session to order, the witness this morning, is Mr. D. H. W. Henry, Q.C., Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Henry, we have received not one but two briefs from you. One is a longer explanatory brief, and there is a shorter brief. The senators received these particular briefs only yesterday. And so, while I think all of us have read the briefs, I cannot say we have studied them in a depth which, I am sure you will agree, they deserve.

I propose you begin with an oral statement, of perhaps about 15 minutes (longer if you wish, of course). In that statement you can summarize the brief, or explain it, or expand upon it. And following that oral statement the senators would like to ask you some questions, perhaps on the contents of your brief and perhaps indeed on other matters.

Now, you have some people with you. Perhaps you could begin by introducing them.

Mr. D. H. W. Henry, Q.C., Director of Investigation and Research, Combines Investigation Act: Thank you, Mr. Chairman and Honourable Senators.

I have with me on my right Mr. R. M. Davidson, who is our Chief Economist, and who is the Director of the Merger and Monopoly Branch of my office. His function, along with his staff, is to do the actual work of the investigation of mergers and monopolies.

On his right is Mr. W. F. Lindsay, who is a Chartered Accountant on the staff of Mr. Davidson.

With Mr. Lindsay is Mrs. Susannah Dolphin, who is also working on this staff, along with other staffs, mainly on research matters. Mrs. Dolphin, incidentally, is the leader of the team which was mentioned by Brigadier Wardell as having undertaken the search of the newspapers in the Maritimes. If any question was raised, Mrs. Dolphin might explain what went on there.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I must apologize for doing what I frequently do; that is, provide a large package of paper at the last minute for people to read. I am sorry about that. I was aiming at getting it to the Committee by last weekend. I got the large one to you by last weekend, but I understand that many were not here and therefore it was delivered yesterday morning.

My short statement, which was much more manageable, also reached you yesterday.

But I think that, if you have no objection, Mr. Chairman, I will just very briefly sketch in some of the important points in the large document—that is, the so-called notes—which might serve to put you in the picture, if you have not had a chance to read that paper, on the basic principles of our Act.

Now, the Act, as it has been described by Chief Justice Duff, that eminent jurist, has as its object the preservation of the public interest in competition. So what we are talking about here is a statute which is the embodiment by Parliament of the competition policy of this country.

This subject is becoming a matter of much more current discussion these days; a great deal more interest in competition with the development of consumer interest and “consumerism” and that sort of thing. But there is an objective behind all this.

The purpose of the Act in protecting the public interest in competition is based on the theory that the competitive marketplace should be the regulator of industry, trade and commerce, and that this will bring about the best type of economic efficiency.

Economic efficiency, therefore, is the main object.

Under this type of arrangement, so the theory goes, the market will determine what goods and services are produced in the economy, at what price, and what kind of a choice will be offered. Of course, it is crucial to a competitive market that a choice be offered to whoever is purchasing the goods and services in that market.

Another way of putting it is that the marketplace will regulate industry under a competitive system. Industry ought not to regulate itself. Market forces do that. And under the spur of market forces industry will make decisions which, in terms of the economic theory concerned, will bring about the best mix of goods and services, the best choices available, and the best prices.

Now, we know, of course, we don't have a system that is working as smoothly or as perfectly as that, because we have in fact a mix of areas which are termed monopolistic, competition, or oligopoly—that is, small numbers of sellers which are themselves quite large individually, some of them quite powerful.

This comes about because we have a small domestic market. Most of our industry is probably domestically oriented in the first place and has grown up as a domestic proposition behind tariff barriers.

We tend to find concentration—or “oligopoly” as the economists call it—throughout industry in Canada, certainly in many areas. It characterizes our economy. It is our small market, our small population—a function of that.

With the idea of competition in addition to the idea of efficiency goes the resulting diffusion of power. And in the context which you are studying this of course is an important matter.

Diffusion of power, which is not normally regarded as the main function of the anti-combines legislation in Canada, nevertheless is a result if the market is working properly. In a social science context, of course, diffusion of power becomes extremely important.

Now, the coverage of this combines legislation; there are just three areas I want to tell you about so you will know the general picture.

First we have the part of the law which prohibits conspiracies in restraint of trade. That is, collusive arrangements which limit the forces of competition. We call those the combines, the conspiracies, which are part of the general conspiracy law handled as a conspiracy matter in the courts, and as the area of our Act which has received the largest amount of enforcement over the years.

That is probably due to the fact that conspiracies, once depicted, are a type of activity with which the criminal courts are familiar. They know how to deal with them; and they have dealt with them in large numbers.

Now, incidentally, the cases in which this type and other types of activity under the Act have appeared in the courts are listed in the back of my annual report on a cumulative basis. You have that report distributed to you. If you want to check on that, the cases are all listed in the back of the report, from the very beginning.

The second area is mergers and monopolies which may operate to the detriment of the public. And the point here is that it is not every merger and every monopoly which is prohibited by the Act, but only those which operate, or may operate, to the detriment of the public.

Really what we are looking at in the merger area is the extent to which competition is limited. What competition remains is the crucial question in our administration of that provision.

As far as monopolies are concerned, it is monopoly that is administered to the detriment of the public. And in short terms we tend to say that it is the abuse of monopoly that the Act prohibits rather than the monopoly itself. It is not an offence to be in monopoly position. It is an offence to undertake certain conduct which abuses that position, tends to perpetuate, tends to squeeze out new competition.

Now, the third area: what we call trade practices, which I am not going to burden you with in detail. These trade practices are a miscellaneous group of activities which have anti-competitive connotations, most of them. These are price discrimination; disproportionate promotional allowances (which I will explain if you want, but not right now); predatory pricing, which is a monopolistic type of tactic; that is, deep price cutting to drive a competitor out of the market; resale price maintenance, which is the practice of a distributor or seller of goods requiring a purchaser to re-sell that product at only a specified price, or not below a minimum price that is specified or agreed—in other words, maintaining prices usually at the retail level.

And the final one coming under this group is misleading advertising, which is, I suppose, not really part of the inquiry here into concentration.

Well, that is the general coverage of the Act, those three main areas. I will come back to the merger provisions shortly.

Another aspect of this Act which must be borne in mind is that it is all criminal law. It is part of the criminal law of Canada.

There are historic reasons behind this; but the very important thing to understand about that is, because it is criminal law, in every case that is taken to the courts the onus is on the Crown to prove an offence, an indictable offence, beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Crown has all the problems that any prosecutor has in a criminal case. "Beyond a reasonable doubt" is sometimes a very difficult onus to discharge when you are dealing with economic concepts, particularly in the field, say, of mergers where, unlike a conspiracy, which once you find the agreement is reasonably clear cut—and that may be very difficult to find because the evidence is not usually readily available—unlike that, when you get into such matters as the operation of a merger or monopoly you are dealing much more with economic concepts and it is much easier for a court to find a reasonable doubt, because what is the right theory of economics is always a matter of judgment. And if there is a reasonable doubt in the mind of the judge he is going to acquit.

So criminal law presents problems to us. We regard it as a very blunt instrument with which to approach a thing like a merger, for example. Because what is the point in fining someone, because big corporations being involved, they have to be fined? For individuals there is a provision for up to two years' imprisonment. But that has never been invoked.

What is the point of fining a corporation? The object of the investigation into a merger that appears to be detrimental to the public is to break it up.

There is a provision which allows it to be broken up. But that is the real remedy. Some kind of economic remedy which changes the structure is what you need to get at, rather than the fine. And therefore the fine does not really constitute the remedy of first importance.

The provision which allows the court to split up the merger (incidentally, no court has done this yet) is to my mind the effective remedy. Another effective remedy is to drop the tariff on the merger and allow international trade to import more competition into the market and so hold it in line through economic forces.

Criminal law, therefore, has presented problems. But there has been a constitutional problem about that, because the courts so far have held that the combines legislation is criminal law, and valid criminal law, but have struck down at least two attempts to import civil proceedings into the whole combines techniques. These have been struck down by the courts, once in 1923 and once in 1935.

And we are posed, therefore, a question here as to whether future attempts to bring in civil law techniques—which I think are absolutely necessary—will indeed pass the constitutional test.

I think this is quite possible. I think there are two or three ways of doing this. But all I want to say to you is one of the reasons why criminal law characterizes the combines legislation up to now is constitutional as well as historical.

One other characterization of this legislation is that there is no power to regulate any industry.

This comes from the fact it is criminal law. Criminal law prohibits things, but it does not give anybody power to regulate. And therefore it is not open to me as the Director under the Act to tell somebody that, if he does thus and so, everything will be all right, there will be no prosecution, or that he will be permitted to continue his course of conduct under certain conditions.

What I am trying to get across is that there is no power in me or any other official to regulate the conduct of a business. Either they are breaking the law or they are not breaking the law.

I adhere very strongly, philosophically as well as in practice, to the principle of the rule of law. And my approach to these problems is, if they are not breaking the law in my judgment, I have no alternative but to leave them alone. That is what the rule of law means. If they are not breaking the law, they are entitled to continue their course of conduct. If they are breaking the law, then the public is entitled to have the law enforced against them.

So, no regulation.

The next point that is very important is that The Combines Act does not apply to what we call pure services, except one or two that are mentioned in the Act.

Now, by "services" I am talking about the pure services like the professions practice, where no goods are produced—sales services of some kind, such as real estate salesmen; all the professions, as I say, barbers and people like that, who are performing a service. These do not come under the Act. The Act is concerned with activities which have some relation to the manufacture or distribution of goods.

Now, to put that one in a nutshell, newspapers, magazines, periodicals, where a thing is produced, come under the Act. But where a thing is not produced, such as in the field of broadcasting, that activity does not come under the anti-combines legislation.

There are one or two services in the Act which are mentioned, such as transportation, rental supply and storage of goods. They have to be of goods, though they are services relating to goods. And the one real aberration is insurance, the price of insurance, which has no relation necessarily to goods. Those are under the Act, but other services are not.

Now, the merger provision, let me say a very brief word about that. The best of whether a merger is unlawful is whether it limits competition to the detriment of the public.

Two key ideas there: one, there must be a limitation of competition; that limitation of competition must be detrimental to the public.

Parliament has not said what is meant by "detriment to the public"; and the courts have been left therefore to put flesh and bones on that idea.

There were only two important cases in the courts, which are mentioned in my paper. One is the beer case involving Canadian Breweries. The other one is the Western sugar case involving the merger of the western sugar refining firms. The B.C. firms acquired the Manitoba firm thereby, in the judgment of our office, creating a monopoly of sugar refining in Western Canada.

The beer case was slightly different. That was a series of mergers which caused Canadian Breweries to dominate the brewing market. But the percentage of domination was not nearly as great, of course, as in the sugar case. It did amount to something on an average of between 60 and 70%, depending on what market you looked at, something in that order.

Both those cases were dealt with by the courts, at the trial level in each case; in one case the Manitoba Court—that is the sugar case—and the other case The Ontario Supreme Court—the beer case. And in both cases an acquittal resulted.

In other words, the mergers were not struck down in either case, with the result that all our jurisprudence is, so to speak, negative. It says why mergers are not unlawful.

In the beer case two important ideas emerged. I regard this case as much more important than the sugar case, which tended to follow in not too clear and orderly a way, the judgment in the beer case.

In the beer case two things emerged: one, that, because the price of beer was regulated by the provincial liquor boards, that took the case out from under The Combines Act.

So you have established a principle which we follow, and feel we have to adhere to, because the Supreme Court of Canada has mentioned it also in other cases as being the valid principle: that where you have provincial regulation under valid laws of an aspect of an industry, to that extent that industry is out from under the Combines Act. So the thought is that the board, or whatever the agency may be, protects the public interest rather than market forces.

Now, sometimes you have two things that work in an industry. You have one aspect that is regulated. For example, in Ontario the Milk Board regulates prices at the producer level. The competition operates below that. Both areas are competing with each other. You have the two principles at work. But when the price is regulated, that part of the operation is taken out from under The Combines Act.

The other point arising in the beer case is that, even if the Judge had not decided that principle, he said he would not have found the degree of concentration—something between 65 and 70 per cent, let me say in broad terms, because it differed in different provinces—he did not find the concentration sufficiently concentrated, or high, to enable him to strike down the mergers.

And in the Western sugar case, notwithstanding that there appeared from our standpoint to be a monopoly of sugar refining in Western Canada as a result of the merger of the two interests involved, the court said that there was some competition of some sort, possibly a threat of competition, possibly some extra competition from the eastern refiners, which saves the situation. And so the merger was not struck down.

Well, we are faced with that jurisprudence.

The limitations, therefore, on the administration of the Act, the limitations to the Act, are set out at page 26 of my notes. And perhaps all I need to do is to draw them to your attention because I have said most of this. But I would like to say this, that one of the things that comes out of it is (b) at the bottom of page 26:

"Thus far, the courts have looked at the effect of the merger on competition, as the statute requires, but have held that competition must be virtually stifled before the merger can be struck down under the law."

Then when you get down to (e):

"The courts have been reluctant to enter into any sophisticated economic analysis of the situation resulting from the merger and have tended in lieu thereof to find a reasonable doubt in the face of evidence of some competition remaining."

Well, the other limitations you might have a look at. In point (f) I say that, if the virtual monopoly test is applied—and I would like to have that upset sometime in the courts, if I can get a case to the Supreme Court of Canada—as long as it does apply, the merger provision as a practical measure, I suggest, is rendered nugatory.

"There is clearly no possibility that it could be used to arrest monopoly in its incipency."; that is, in the early stage, as the Americans do when they can see monopolization growing.

But here we have to wait until concentration has got to such a degree there is not much chance of doing anything about it anyway.

"It could be invoked only in the final stages of monopolization when concentration has proceeded far beyond the degree where competition remains an effective force."

That is my assessment of this legislation. Nevertheless I do proceed against mergers that I think it would be responsible to take before the courts. That is, if I see a merger take place, then the statute requires an investigation by me; I have no alternative—subject, of course, to having resources available, which is always a very awkward practical problem for us, because we do have to assess priorities.

But assuming we find a merger which produces a reasonably high degree of concentration, we will weigh up the question whether it would be regarded as at least a prima facie case by the courts, so that to bring that case forward would be at least regarded as responsible in the light of the jurisprudence.

I will not allow myself to be drawn into or pressured into undertaking inquiries that I consider to be irresponsible because they do not really in my judgment—and, after all, in the statute I am required to judge—unless there is reason to believe there is an offence.

My policy, therefore, is to proceed where I can. I have set that policy out in public, and also in this paper at page 29, in case you want to look at that. In other words, we do have a merger programme going. We have quite a number of them.

Probably in the merger field our programme of compliance has been the really effective force, to the extent we have been effective at all. And I do want to say that I am very modest about this because, looking back over the situation, I feel that through limitations of the law and our own human and physical resources, and limitations of resources in the Department, and the need to spread ourselves pretty thin, I feel that we have not accomplished as much as the statute originally was intended to accomplish. And, of course, this means that what we need is a revision of this legislation which, as you know, has been announced by my Minister in any event.

But the programme of compliance that I was mentioning is this. I am prepared to hear representations, or answer questions put by industrial people as to whether or not if they undertake a certain course of action I would start an inquiry.

Now, under the Act I have an obligation to start an inquiry if I have reason to believe there is an offence. It is as simple as that. It is a statutory obligation which is imposed on me by Parliament.

It is for this reason that the Minister in the House of Commons, or in one of the parliamentary committees, recently referred to the Director under this Act as the watchdog of Parliament and the public in the field of competition policy. Therefore I have an obligation on behalf of the public and Parliament to investigate when I have reason to believe there is an offence.

Now, to assist the businessman in knowing what my action is going to be, I am quite prepared to hear him explain what he wants to do, and then say to him "In my judgment if you do that I would have to start an inquiry." He knows, therefore, what I am going to do before the event.

This has been quite useful in the field of mergers. All I want to say is we have had a number of mergers brought to us in advance of the event, and usually where we say we are going to undertake an inquiry in that event, then the merger does not take place.

It may take place. In fact it happened that way in the case of the Lakehead newspaper merger. We were asked beforehand if we would start an inquiry. And I said yes, we would.

And, as I always encourage people to do, those concerned took legal advice on it. It was well understood they should get independent legal advice. And I must say this is the only proper course, because otherwise they are putting themselves in the hands of a bureaucrat, which I don't agree with.

So they got independent legal advice. The advice was that they should proceed. They quite courteously told me they were doing that. I said "All right, I told you I would start an inquiry." And I did that.

We got that case before the Commission. And the Commission did not agree with my position. The result was the merger was not further opposed.

But I just want to explain to you that is the way the programme of compliance works. It is open to anyone to come and bring a merger that he proposes to undertake and get an assessment of it, which we will do quite rapidly. And we will let him know where he stands as far as the combines office is concerned.

These, incidentally, are reported the merger cases anyway are reported in my annual report in anonymous terms, so that the public can see what cases are being brought before us and generally the circumstances that have caused me and my officials to say we would start an inquiry or would not.

Now, monopoly I have already mentioned is not an offence by itself. It is the abuse of monopoly. And perhaps on that note I might leave that.

I did mention to you a few inquiries that had been undertaken in the past decade. I said there are eight formal inquiries (this is page 35) under The Combines Act into the field of mass media. I should have added this is in the past decade, because there was an inquiry into Famous Players back in the Thirties; but I did not go back that far into history.

Eight formal inquiries roughly in the past decade, which I have listed. I did that to indicate to you that we have been reasonably active in the field of the mass media, because that is quite a number of inquiries in relation to one general area of industry by comparison with other industries.

Some of those are still taking place. But I did refer very briefly to the three newspaper inquiries (starting at page 39) which will give you an idea of how the play goes on the field in the circumstances.

Now, that is, I think, enough on the general notes except to say that I feel that it is important in assessing the state of concentration in one of the media to look at that in the context of the total industry of communications through mass media because of the shifting balance that may be taking place.

I am not prophet. I am certainly no Marshall McLuhan. But I am not quite sure that we would be wise to assume that the present pattern and present balance of usefulness of the various media will continue. I don't know.

In the short paper I hinted that perhaps one thing which may foster further concentration in the newspaper field is the possibility that the younger generation—and perhaps I should be talking not only of my teenage and young teenage children, but perhaps the generation behind them—may become more familiar and more addicted to oral and visual media than to the written word. I don't know. But if that were to be the case, then there would be smaller markets relatively for, say, newspapers, which inevitably will lead to a greater degree of concentration, because a market for a newspaper can only sustain a limited number of newspapers. It is obvious. People may buy two, but they are not going to buy five.

And the result is that once you get a proliferation of newspapers operating in, say, the metropolitan market—because that is where the big volume is, in our metropolitan centres—these newspapers have to divide their circulation among a reasonably fixed market. They can push out as far as they can, it is true. But there are limitations of space and time on that. So the result is you must inevitably have a fairly small number of new papers.

I have tried to say something like that in the short paper, and to point out that what the other media are doing may have a bearing on this.

If the other media are competitive with the newspapers, then you look at the whole competitive circle. If, say, television is fully competitive with newspapers, then you don't look at newspapers alone but newspapers plus television—if they are competing with each other.

Now, in the short paper I have said they are not fully competitive with each other; they are perhaps complimentary: different presentation, different appeal, less news coverage in the television than newspaper, for example. You don't get the mosaic type of coverage—well, you do; you get the mosaic type of coverage in both. But the mosaic type of coverage in the television media and the radio is different, much more pointed, but much more limited than in the newspaper, which can give you a very wide coverage of both local and national news. With the result that they both serve at the moment roughly different markets.

But there are areas where they are competitive with each other. You will notice that as one of the possibilities of holding down concentration or injecting more competition into a concentrated situation—because there are concentrated situations in our metropolitan areas, and there are concentrated situations in towns, because most towns have only one newspaper—if you can inject competition from one of the other media there by making it more directly competitive with the newspaper, shall we say, then the fear of greater concentration becomes less, because the concentrated media will be, so to speak, held in line by the other perhaps becoming-more-powerful media.

And then one must consider also sources of information from the electronic media. I don't know how soon it is we will have the push buttons on the telephone where perhaps you pick up the telephone in the morning, you push the button, you ask the machine at the other end in an ordinary voice whether a report is available on Biafra this morning, and you get it immediately; and that is up to late within a matter of hours of the events happening—less than that, maybe minutes.

Is that the pattern for the future? If it is, what is the effect of that on the other media.

Obviously right now it does not look as though we use the electronic push button type of device for very much more than getting access to data banks. So this might be useful to scholars, to commercial people, statisticians, and so forth, who want to get information of a very specific kind from the data banks. But it is quite obvious that once progress starts in this field the sky is the limit. We don't know where it will end up.

So all I suggest is, Mr. Chairman, that this is a relevant matter to consider in the context of, say, looking at newspapers, which seems to have been up to now the pre-occupation of the Committee.

Now, I do not think, Mr. Chairman, I should read the short paper here.

The Chairman: No.

Mr. Henry: I take it that the members have probably had a chance to look through it.

The Chairman: I think they have probably scanned the short paper, yes.

Mr. Henry: All I do at this stage—because I can go back and fill some of that in—is to draw attention to a few questions which I raise at the end.

These are not all the questions. They may not even be the right questions. And I am not sure that they are all good questions. But they are questions which occurred to me which might well be considered in the course of your study.

The point that I am making on page 8, question number (1) is that what must be determined, I think, is whether the degree of concentration which does exist has gone too far, or is it at this stage not alarming? And that should be looked at in relation to individual markets—individual markets which newspapers serve—Canada as a whole, in a national sense, and the larger market of all communications media.

Then I am suggesting, by asking a question, one means of arresting further concentration may very well be technological change which will make it possible through simple technological devices for newspapers in small towns to print necessary copy for the purpose of circulating this to local citizens which might facilitate new entries to the business.

Now, new entries are terribly important to the vitality of any industry. And one of the big problems in Canada is how to get new people setting up new newspapers. There are some who feel this will not happen anymore, certainly in the metropolitan areas.

But new technological developments may make it possible to print easily and print cheaply and in large quantities. And if that can develop, research can be done to develop that, it may very well provide one of the answers to what appears to be a trend in the direction of further concentration.

Because now, as you will know, there are three chains. And while some people are nervous about that, there are three. They are by and large competing with each other. Where they don't compete with each other, that is the point where one should put the finger and regard it as sensitive.

But there are three. We don't have one at the moment. The question is, will there always remain three? And how can arrangements be made to perpetuate at least some competitive atmosphere among the chains?

So I have made one or two other suggestions. I eliminate direct regulation if at all possible, because I think it would be very dangerous to regulate the press. But the anti-combines laws, the anti-monopolies laws, which have a broad coverage applying to everybody, certainly is a technique, if they were improved, to deal with concentration and with mergers.

Now, I say "If they are improved"; and I mean that. It would have to be done under a new law. But, as you know, the Economic Council of Canada has made a report in which it has recommended revising, among other things, the merger laws, to provide in a civil context rather than criminal that a merger could be screened through a new restrictive practices tribunal, as it is called, in which those who constitute the membership would deal with economic analysis and economic assessment of efficiency versus competition; what is the right balance?

There is no reason whatever why the news media could not be brought into that principle if concentration is of concern to this Committee, or to the public at large.

I have made one or two other suggestions. They are all designed to try to inject more competition into the newspaper field particularly.

In number (4) I simply asked a question, is it possible to allow editors to be more perceptive as to the needs of the community for news coverage and for the distribution of opinion?

My suggestion there is that one thing that might be considered is whether greater interchange between the public and the press corps might bring about a more satisfactory coverage of news from the standpoint of what the public wants to know about and what the public wants to have discussed.

This kind of thing, it seems to me, might sharpen up competition because, as I have said in the paper, competition in the press—and it is the printed press I am talking about now, the newspapers—is not on price. The papers all tend to be about the same price.

This price level actually tends to be the result of a well known economic concept: in an oligopoly situation the price tends to reach the same level.

Competition therefore has to be on service and quality. Therefore, if you can inject competition on quality into newspapers by various incentives, including pressure from the public to discuss more meaningful questions, give better coverage to certain areas, that may bring about the sharpening of competition which, in a state of high concentration, may become sluggish. In other words, it is the old principle: if nobody has to beat the other fellow, why should he try so hard?

The question is, can we inject anything in there to make them want to struggle with each other a bit more intellectually and so bring about a sharper analysis of news and a more meaningful coverage of news, if that were necessary.

Well, Mr. Chairman, that is a very quick review. I am sorry I have been so long about it.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. As you say, it is a quick review, but it is also, as far as we are concerned, a very efficient and useful review.

I know that some of my colleagues on the Committee do have questions. I will turn to them now.

I think perhaps Mr. Fortier would like to ask some questions.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Henry, I listened with much interest to the way you very effectively and succinctly summarized your two written briefs. And would like you to apply your mind, for obvious reasons, exclusively to the mass media.

I would like to start with this question how effective really is the Combines Investigation Act to deal with concentration of ownership in the mass media in Canada?

Mr. Henry: In its present form it is effective, in my view, only to deal with concentr tion when it reaches near monopoly proportions which, as I have said, is too late.

Mr. Fortier: In your assessment, as the Act when speaking of monopoly situations refers to "a monopoly either throughout Canada or within an area thereof", assuming that it was brought to your attention that there was a monopoly situation in a given area, and you undertook an investigation—members of your Department acting under your instructions undertook an investigation under the Act—what would you look at?

You referred to the price of newspapers as really being regulated by the marketplace. And then you spoke of quality and services. Those were your words.

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would you in assessing, in attempting to assess the type of monopoly which existed in a given area of Canada within the newspaper industry, and whether or not it operated to the detriment of the public—would you look at the end product? In other words, would you look at the message? Would you look at the news which was published? Would you look at the news which was not published possibly in that particular area, and which should have been published?

Are these concerns which you can apply, you know, in the concrete?

Mr. Henry: Well, there are several things to discuss there. One is that an existing monopoly would not be attacked by us unless it conducted itself in a manner which I thought gave me reason to believe would contravene the Act. In other words, that is the abuse, you see, is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. Fortier: The question presupposes you have made that original decision.

Mr. Henry: All right. Supposing I am then there investigating; what would I look at?

Well, the kind of monopoly that I would solely look at would have in almost ten instances to one arisen from a merger.

Let us take that. We will take them both, let us take that one: the monopoly produced by a merger.

The questions, or considerations that we look at are set out in my paper. I put down a lot of them here. This is just for reference. Then I will ask Mr. Davidson, who is the economist—because this is an economic exercise, I will ask him to elaborate. At page

Mr. Fortier: On that point I will ask you this question, if I may: do those guidelines, those questions, apply in toto to the newspaper industry?

Mr. Henry: Yes, in an economic sense they would; that is right.

Now, getting to the rest of your question: would I look at the kind of news that was published, the kind of news that was omitted?

Mr. Fortier: Right.

Mr. Henry: Only to the extent that it might be made to appear that because of a monopoly situation the coverage was slanted in any way that was not giving the public the service it deserves. I am not concerned with what kind of opinions are expressed, obviously.

Mr. Fortier: No, no.

Mr. Henry: But if it were made to appear in the course of our inquiry that, because of the existence of the monopoly and no competition (is perhaps the way I should put it) the newspaper concerned—let us say, a single newspaper in a small town—was getting away with burying important public issues because of offending some local figure, or something of that sort, this would be a matter of concern to me. But I would say that is evidence of the lack of competition arising from the monopoly situation.

As I say, the opinions expressed are the editor's opinions. That is free and open to him. But the question that is of importance is, are the public getting a choice, a variety of opinion, a variety of news coverage, so that if one newspaper is missing the important issues, or deliberately avoiding the important issues, or being pretty fence-straddling on important issues, and not putting up to the public something which will stimulate debate, then I think that is the point of concern.

The question is, how in a one-newspaper town can you inject that kind of competition? It is very difficult. And the only salvation at the moment is that the large metropolitan papers at least have the opportunity of entering the one-newspaper town so that you get the benefit of whatever coverage is there. But in most of the towns they do not circulate in very large numbers, as I think the members would probably be aware.

Mr. Fortier: So the selection of news by the newspaper which in my hypothesis you are investigating would be one of the areas which you would consider?

Mr. Henry: Well, only to the extent that... I would not necessarily quarrel with the judgment of the editor because, after all, the editor must select. He cannot put everything in his newspaper. Therefore he selects.

Mr. Fortier: You see, what I was driving at: would you substitute your judgment for that of the news editor?

Mr. Henry: Well, no. But what I am suggesting in my paper is that what the public wants to hear is best expressed by the public. And I simply ask the question whether there is some way that the public could become more articulate vis-à-vis the editorial staff in, so to speak, saying, "Look, we would like to hear this issue discussed. Now, will you write some articles about this, and will you get two or three people with different viewpoints to write articles over the next week?"

Mr. Fortier: What we are really getting at is the quality of the product, is it not, Mr. Henry?

Mr. Henry: Right. It is.

Mr. Fortier: And my basic question is to what extent do you as the Director under the Combines Investigation Act have authority to look into the quality of the product?

For example, in the beer case would you have been authorized to look at the quality of the beer which was sold?

Mr. Henry: Well, to the extent that it presents a choice, yes, because, I mean, in the marketplace for commodities it is very important that the consumer be presented with a choice.

Now, some consumers may want to buy a high-priced, sophisticated product. Let us say it is a television, or a radio—a radio. We know about this. You can get a hi-fi set. You can get it with a tape recorder or phonograph attached. That can be stereo or monaural. You can go down the line until you get to the little pocket one that costs about $16 that the youngsters at school carry back and forth with them. Now, those are products of differing qualities at different prices.

The point is, if you had a rigid price system—let us say we have a level price. Supposing all radios that the public wants in large quantities were priced the same for some reason. Let us say there is a price placed on it by some decree. Then the only opportunity for competition—that is, to provide a choice to the purchaser—is to change the quality. And so the companies will start in a competition situation vying with each other by trying to provide a better quality product.

Sometimes with quality they couple service. And so, as you have seen in some of the smaller automobiles, the networks of distribution which provide excellent service on the European cars will provide a very competitive atmosphere, because the service is important as well as the quality of the product.

So quality and service are two means of competition, particularly when you have sticky price.

Mr. Fortier: But in a given area where you have a monopolistic situation insofar as the availability of a local newspaper is concerned what norm will you use when you consider the quality? What will you compare it against?

Mr. Henry: A very good question.

It is very hard in economic terms to compare quality and say "That is the right quality." We rely on competitive forces to produce the right quality, as I said at the beginning of my statement.

Mr. Davidson: I think one might say that in the newspaper field where, because in any given market there are likely to be very few competing newspapers, one cannot realistically expect competition on price, and therefore as you say, competition has to take the form of competition in quality.

Well, in the newspaper field particularly one of the dimensions of quality which is most important, it seems to me, is the diversity of viewpoints expressed. And therefore it would be concerned if, as a result of merger, the opportunity for diverse points of view to be presented to the public were reduced.

Mr. Fortier: I am also interested in the suppression of news as much as in the diversity of opinions. The editorial content at the moment, at least to my mind, may not be as important as the publication of news: is it the news published that should be published in that particular area?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I would include news coverage and diversity of opinion and diversity of subjects treated, and so on.

Mr. Fortier: I see. So how would you go about analyzing this, whether or not all the news that should be published—should be published really in the opinion of yourself, Mr. Fortier, and your investigators—has in fact been published over a period of time in that area where there is an allegation of a monopoly which is operating to the detriment of the public?

Mr. Davidson: Well, I think you have to take it prima facie; that is, if you have two independent people presenting a selection or collection of news and of opinion, the diversity is likely to be greater than it is if there is only one.

Now, it may be that the economic circumstances are such that two are not viable.

Mr. Fortier: We are with one. We have one. That is a fact. You have one newspaper. Or you have two newspapers controlled by the same person in one area, and you are looking at the news content.

Mr. Davidson: Well, I think though that one could have to distinguish between a monopoly, which is what you are speaking about now, and a merger.

Now, what I had been directing my remarks to particularly had been the merger situation where you are eliminating one existing independent voice.

In a monopoly situation I think that the principles that apply to monopoly at large apply in the newspaper field as well, and that what one is concerned with in a monopoly situation is whether the monopolist is taking any action unnecessary to the efficient conduct of the business to entrench the monopoly or to extend it.

Now, we have an example of that in one of our inquiries in the Sudbury newspaper case where, according to the evidence we got, a new entrant was about to come on the scene and the existing firm took steps, according to the evidence we had, designed to make it difficult for that new entrant to come in.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I have read the report. And to use another one of Mr. Henry's expressions, I will leave the news in a nutshell for the time being. I wish to come back to it.

Mr. Henry: Yes, because there is something relevant to come back to just to finish it off.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I wish you would.

Mr. Henry: I think your question is a very good one. I would not like the Committee or the public to feel that we are some sort of arbiters of the sufficiency, adequacy of newspapers. We are not, any more than we are arbiters of the quality of a pair of boots or shoes.

You see, our job is not to say "You should have a better product" or "Your product is of poor quality", because the market may dictate that poor quality products be produced. That is what the people may be buying.

For example, quality changes. Take boots and shoes, which I pulled out of the air. When I was growing up—and I am sure when a number of Senators present were growing up—you were able to get shoes, good stout walking shoes with thick soles. But tastes have changed, and what you see on the market mainly now are shoes with very thin soles. And, as one retail merchant told me one day, what people want to buy these days is a pair of shoes which, as soon as they wear out, you throw away. It is a different quality.

All right. It is not up to the Combines Branch to say "That is a poor quality product and should not be on the market." What we say is that the public, exercising what is in these days called "consumer sovereignty" will through its purchasing power dictate in a competitive situation what the market will produce.

I say in a sense that is the same in the newspaper field. Where you have a monopoly there is no choice. That is the problem with monopoly. There is no choice.

And there are two things about monopoly. One, it tends to grow sluggish because, if there is nobody competing with it, there is nothing to keep it sharpened up—unless you sharpen up the buyers. Buyers can exercise some influence.

And that is why I suggest perhaps in these situations—I am not suggesting a press council, but if a press council were to be regarded as a useful vehicle for various purposes, one thing it might do would be to form a nexus between the reading public and editors of newspapers across the country by letting them know what the public wants and whether they are satisfied with (A) news coverages, and (B) variety of opinion.

Mr. Fortier: But at the moment this is something which you have to do, is it not?

Mr. Henry: Yes, because there is nobody else.

Mr. Fortier: Exactly.

Mr. Henry: Nobody else.

Mr. Fortier: And is there any other industry in Canada where the Director is called upon to make such a value judgment?

Mr. Henry: Probably not as important as this. I mean, this after all goes to the heart of our whole society. As I put in my paper, not only are the press media the nervous system of our society, but they are a very important part of power in the state.

I mean, the very fact that the press has been called the fourth estate and the connotation that goes with that indicates the importance, you know. And I only need to say it for you to understand the point.

What was it Napoleon said? "I would rather be . . ." Well, how did it go? "I would rather be opposed by 10,000 armed men than by three newspapers." Have I got it right? That is the idea.

Mr. Fortier: When you dispatch, Mr. Henry, members of your "vice squad" to any given area . . .

Mr. Henry: You mean Mrs. Dolphin over there?

Mr. Fortier: I think I will get into the vice habit if Mrs. Dolphin will come to investigate!

But when you dispatch members of your squad do you tell them, for example, let us take an area in time, point A to point B, look at what happened in the community which was of importance, and see whether or not it was published, what prominence it was given in the local newspaper?

Mr. Henry: We have not done that. We have not done that.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel you should?

Mr. Henry: Well, you have certainly raised a very good question as to whether we should. I think we might very well feel we should do that.

Mr. Fortier: There is nothing in the Act which prevents you from doing it?

Mr. Henry: There is nothing at all, no. The question would be, how do you do that? I personally would like to have that information in a monopoly type of situation, because this would give me an opportunity to say whether or not, so to speak, the public is getting the quality and service it deserves.

Now, I do want to make it plain that I do not presume to be a judge as to what the public should get. But at least I can say it should be getting something better than that if you see what I mean.

Look, when I went before the Committee of the House of Commons on Drug Costs and Prices, notwithstanding that it was said with good authority that the prices of drugs in this country and the United States were the highest in the world, I would not allow myself to say to what extent the prices were too high.

All one can say in economic terms, Mr. Chairman, is that with more competition you probably can get better quality in price than you have got. But where that will level off, how effective competition would be, or exactly how competition injected into a non-competitive situation would actually influence the market, you cannot really tell, because there are so many unknowns and imponderables, you will understand.

When you are dealing with a thing like this expression of opinion it is so difficult to state to say: "well, here is what should happen". It is true, I think you can say, "look, here is a newspaper which suppressed items A, B, and D." Why did they suppress it? Well, obviously it was offending the advertisers, obviously it was offending the Government or obviously it was offending somebody else now, those reasons.

On the other hand, perhaps they were suppressed because the editor in his judgment did not think that was important in that community. That is a question of judgment. Because the editor, after all, is the man who decides this, as is well understood.

What I am trying to say is, to answer your question should I investigate to see whether the editor is forming good judgments or bad judgments, I certainly would feel reluctant to do that, or really to pronounce upon it. But I certainly would not be particularly reluctant to find, if it were something that I felt that was empowered to do and could conscientiously do—to find out if in effect it has been a deliberate burying of important news or what might be called unjustifiable so-called reasons.

Mr. Fortier: That answer of yours brings to mind another question. As a lawyer you understand this. Do you take judicial notice of two things when carrying out investigations in alleged newspaper monopoly situations: (A), do you take judicial notice of the owner's other business interests?

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And, (B), do you take judicial notice of the owner's other media interests, for example in the field of broadcasting?

Mr. Henry: Yes. Do you know why? Let us talk about the media. It is very important to know whether a man who has a monopoly of a newspaper is in fact being held in line (going back again to market forces and competitive forces which in this sense are also social forces) by a competing medium.

If in fact there was, let us say, a radio station which all day was broadcasting nothing but news coverage, and in detail, I would say that is quite important, because the monopolistic newspaper owner has to compete with that. That is direct competition. I am talking about there being as wide news coverage theoretically as the newspaper can give.

So the public can say "well, we are not getting news about subjects A, B and C out of the newspaper, but listen to the radio; they have got them". You see. So people know that, and they turn to that, and stop buying the newspaper. All right, that brings economic pressure to bear on the publisher. He says "have got to compete with the other media", and so on.

That is a sort of an ideal situation, because first radio and television stations don't operate that way. They give you some capsule news. You get the highlights. That is all you get. You have to read the newspaper to get all the news. And the same goes for opinions.

Mr. Fortier: You just said something very important—"You have to look to the newspapers to get all the news."

Mr. Henry: Right. Well, I think it is important. That is why I say—and I have said it in this paper here—I think the newspaper is still the most important news medium in this country.

I did ask the question whether it is going to be that way for all time because of developing technology and developing tastes, or changing tastes, on the part of the newer generation, who are less familiar with the printed word, or becoming less familiar with the printed word in the way that Marshall McLuhan and others who are his disciples have explained.

Whether you subscribe to that or not does not matter. The point is changing technology brings about tremendously radical changes in society. And the type of news coverage, the type of news dissemination 50 or 100 years from now for all we know may be just as radical as the changes that have taken place over this half century in radio and television.

But I think that the Committee should be courageous, and try to cope with that, try to be prophets, and see where we are going.

Mr. Fortier: So the business interests of the newspaper owner, the other business interests, would be of concern to you as well as the other media broadcasting interest?

Mr. Henry: Right.

Mr. Fortier: Or absence thereof.

Mr. Henry: I would be concerned to know, if I were looking at newspaper X in metropolitan centre X—let us take that, because in the towns you usually have one newspaper. It is a monopoly. I don't know that you can do much about that, except some of the suggestions I have made. But let us look at the metropolitan area. I think it is very important to know who owns the newspapers.

Now, if you have some competing newspapers, at least you have some competition. But there will be no question about it, if in a large metropolitan area, or in a large market area, suddenly all the newspapers were acquired by one firm or one interest, I would have to move in. I say that flat out now. And there are large metropolitan areas in Canada—there are not too many of them; you can count them up and identify them—where if more acquisitions take place by people who already own the newspapers in that area, I will start an inquiry.

And in case that causes anybody to be nervous, I simply say that under our programme of compliance all an existing newspaper owner need do, if he is contemplating acquiring another newspaper that might cause him to wonder if I am going to investigate it, is to come in and ask about it.

Mr. Fortier: Thomson did it in the Lakehead situation?

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do other owners...

Mr. Henry: Nobody else has in the field of the media. That is the only case that I can recall certainly since I have been in this field. And I really got this programme of compliance underway in 1960. The Lakehead newspaper case is the only one in which I have been approached by a newspaper owner who wished to acquire another newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Your Department has had much more success, as you underline, in prosecuting trade combinations than in prosecuting mergers or monopolies?

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing it was brought to your attention that two large chains owning newspapers in Canada were entering into combinations to, let us say, unduly restrict rates charged for advertising.

The reason why I ask this question flows from the report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, where they said:

"The question arises whether the person even when delivered of the monopoly in the field of advertising in newspapers falls within the Act."

I realize this is not a judicial pronouncement, but still we are faced with this particular statement.

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: But supposing chain X in city A agreed with chain Y in the same city, "We will charge this rate for advertising" and the same two chains in another city will say "Well, let us stop competing; let us charge the same rate"; would this be an offence under the Act, in your opinion?

Mr. Henry: Well, I would think probably not, because advertising as a subject matter is what we call a pure service. And therefore to look for enforcement of the Act against a conspiracy to limit the price you pay for advertising would, I think, be outside our jurisdiction.

Mr. Fortier: I am driven to ask you for a legal opinion at this stage.

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How do you reconcile that statement, which is lifted from the report of the Commission in the Sudbury case, with the report of the Commission in the Pacific Press case where they said, in their conclusions, page 178:

"In the proceedings for such an order"... you will recall the order which was referred to?

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier:

"... a review could be made of the situation with respect to the requirement that general advertising must be placed in both papers, which requirement would consider operates to the detriment of anyone who "desires to place an advertisement in only one paper."

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: This appeared here to be trade practice which was detrimental to the public and which the Commission felt should pass judgment upon, where you do not.

Mr. Henry: Oh, yes. Well, there are two things to be said about that. First of all, the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission is not limited in making its comments to making comments only about offences. I am limited starting an inquiry to determining whether we have "reason to believe"—and I put the phrase in quotes "reason to believe", which is a matter of judgment made on objective grounds—that there is or is likely to be an offence. But the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission under the Act is only required to make comments about the effect of matters brought out in the evidence on the public interest.

Now, they are perfectly at liberty to talk about something which is not covered by the Act. And indeed it is contemplated that in their reports (and this is one of the values of their reports) they may very well say "Here is a situation which is not covered by legislation but in our judgment it is detrimental to the public." This should spur the Government, if they pay attention to that, to change the law.

Now, in the Vancouver newspaper case, of course, we had the combined advertising rate which was there regarded as detrimental to the public. We were in the rather unfortunate position that the companies abandoned the rate or the company, which had then become the owner of the two newspapers under the arrangement made there, abandoned the national advertising combined rate by the time we came to complete the enforcement.

I was in some difficulty to know what to do if we had to go to court with this. And I think I can tell you quite frankly I would put the matter before the court on the theory that this might be regarded as an exercise of monopoly power. But, you see, we would have gone into that case.

Mr. Fortier: It would have been one of the elements?

Mr. Henry: One of the elements—exercise of monopoly power. If I could persuade the court that in exercising your monopoly power, if part of the activity means you place some restraint on a service like advertising—possibly because you are selling an article, but you place some restraint on advertising through a monopolistic control that you have, the court might look at it. And in that case it could be a sort of a breakthrough.

Now, you might ask the same question about a conspiracy. All I can tell you is, if a conspiracy only dealt with advertising, I could not feel that I could investigate that.

The Chairman: You would not?

Mr. Henry: No.

Mr. Fortier: Who could—which agency in Canada?

Mr. Henry: I don't think anybody could in the field of newspapers. Of course, the CRTC can—probably could.

Senator Prowse: Couldn't Justice do it one under the conspiracy sections? It is not a conspiracy merely to do an illegal thing.

Mr. Henry: No. The point there, Senator, is that all the law on combines here—well, the common law—Common law still exists, but I do not think that the common law principles held down at the beginning of the century, or the end of the last century—the Northern Bell case and so forth—would likely catch that kind of thing, because it would probably be regarded as for the protection of the conspiring parties.

Under the old common law this was regarded as an important factor. As long as you were not doing what was called “other detriment to the public” or “other real detriment to another business”...

Senator Prowse: A legal thing in an illegal way, or an illegal thing in a legal way?

Mr. Henry: Yes, that is right. So for practical purposes we look at our Act. And of course it is the Act that I am in the business of enforcing.

I am not sure if that entirely answers your question.

Mr. Fortier: It does, Mr. Henry.

In the Vancouver case I have one other question which came to mind. When F. P. purchased the Cromie interest in Pacific Press did they clear it with the Department?

Mr. Henry: They informed us about it, yes. They, of course, knew about the agreement—the agreement that I mentioned in the paper here—which in essence, from our standpoint, maintained editorial independence.

Now, we could not see at that time that the change of ownership would alter that agreement in any way. If it did, of course, the counsel for the companies, for all parties, had given me an undertaking, which is in one of my annual reports, that this change would not take place without my being notified. And I have never been notified of any change.

In the absence of any complaints about the matter—which I would expect to be made if there was a change—I would rely on the integrity of counsel concerned to inform me.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your opinion that agency agreements as F. P. Publications referred to, such as this agreement in Vancouver—are they a good thing within the newspaper industry; this type of agency agreement between large chains as exists in Vancouver; you know, one publishing company, editorial independence but one publishing company publishing two newspapers.

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Two editorial boards, editorial independence?

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is this what we are coming to in Canada? Is this to be encouraged?

Mr. Henry: Well, whether we are coming to it or not, I don't regard it as a good thing (which is the question you asked me) because certainly in economic experience and in the business in which there is common ownership, while outwardly it may appear to bring reasonable competition, does not in fact, when the chips are down. And that is, of course, when you want to look at it, it is when the chips are down, when things start to go wrong, that it becomes important.

A common owner has too many temptations in this world, if competition is getting rough between his two organs, to allow it to continue.

I put in the small paper, I think it was, at one point that the other thing that has to be looked at is this. You may have what you might call a “benevolent dictator” in the media field today who is carrying on a very good performance of maintaining editorial independence among his newspapers, or television, radio stations, whatever they may be. It is probably good for his business in most cases. But he, of course, is philosophically inclined to do that.

But what will happen when he in due course sells out, or his estate sells out, to someone else? The philosophy of the new owner may be quite different.

Mr. Fortier: And the power is still there?

Mr. Henry: The power is still there. That is the important thing: the power is still there. And the editor, of course, either goes, if that changes—Now, we don't know and I don't know what pressures editors are subject to. No doubt if it become important to know the editors will tell me that, or tell you that, one would hope, because we tend to consider our editors men of integrity.

Now, what is the editor to do? He is told by the common owner "You have got to push a certain line." Well, he has to make up his mind. He either goes along with that, or he resigns.

Well, this is one reason why I think that we should be bringing people along in this field who are top flight editorial material. Hence my little question whether or not you can do something like that by incentives and scholarships and so forth. It is all directed towards that.

But, as you correctly say, the power is there. And of course it is the power—that is the thing which one should be concerned about, not the fact that the power at the moment is being exercised responsibly.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. This is what you have not been able to get across to the courts in the beer and the sugar cases?

Mr. Henry: Yes. And I could not get this across to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission in the Lakehead case. But I still think we were right. I still think our forecast that the two cities would likely merge and the matter would become a problem was right. And I feel that it might have been better if that merger had not taken place.

But I am talking now only, not because I lost the case, so to speak, but because I think that was right, and we took the right ground, and the Commission did not agree with us. That is all right. That is the way the system works.

Mr. Fortier: In your judgment now, in view of the fact Fort William and Port Arthur have become Thunder Bay, do you feel impelled to review the situation?

Mr. Henry: No, because we now have the merger which has taken place a number of years ago. I feel a little reluctant to open something up which I did not pursue at the time—pursue to the courts, that is. I took the case. I took the inquiry. The thing was done properly from my standpoint. We made a point; that is what I am getting at. But we would not want to open that again unless developed that there was an abuse of the monopoly situation there.

If that did develop, then I would go in, just the same as I did in the Sudbury case. Because that was regarded by us as abuse of monopoly on the surface.

It turned out to be perhaps not as important as it might have seemed. But it would be an example of abuse of monopoly. That is where a newcomer was going along and the monopolist took what appeared to be steps to drive out the newcomer so as to preserve his monopoly position. That is the sort of thing we want to attack.

The Chairman: I want to remind the members of the Committee that we have another witness this morning. I am therefore going to turn, Mr. Fortier...

Mr. Fortier: I will pass.

The Chairman: ...to the Senators to see if they have any additional questions.

Mr. Henry informed me before the hearing began this morning he would be willing to return to another session. And it may be that we would like to ask him back. Meanwhile, mindful of the fact there is another witness, are there other questions for Mr. Henry?

Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: I have one or two.

If I gather correctly, on the Beer case that was decided with 60%, or whatever it was, they had, that this did not represent a sufficient degree of concentration to make it an offence, an abuse under the Act.

Now, suppose a theoretical situation that with the 60%—let us put up to 70% which probably still would get the same answer from the court on that area.

Senator Beaubien: Sixty percent only in one province now. Over Canada it is 48

Mr. Henry: Forty-eight or fifty, that is correct, yes.

Senator Prowse: I am not after the brew-ery. I am not even remembering their name. I am just getting a theoretical question to examine the Act, is what I want to find out, is how the damned thing works, if it does.

Let us suppose a situation where you have got 75 % in Ontario, and the situation with that would be that ordinarily a beer parlour would run out of other brands of beer by, say, 4 o'clock in the afternoon, so that there would only be company X's brands available.

Suppose that in going further, if we will assume—I don't know what the figures are for beer, but let us assume the ordinary alcoholic content for beer is 7 % alcohol, and what you found, after this had happened, company X's brand was all 5 % alcohol. Would that other item then give you a chance to come in under either predatory pricing or something else there—it would not be predatory pricing, but one of the other sections of the various prohibitions?

Mr. Henry: I am not quite sure I understand that situation. You mean...

Senator Prowse: The company has now reduced the alcoholic content of the beer so the public was getting something less than it looked like they were getting.

Mr. Henry: Yes. That then becomes a different matter.

Are you suggesting the public are having the 5 % beer sold to them without being aware of it?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Henry: This becomes a species of fraud.

Senator Prowse: Well, nobody tells you how much alcohol is in their beer do they?

Mr. Henry: No. In that case I simply say it is a different quality product. Talking about the Act—whether this breaches some other regulation is a different matter. I mean, the regulations of the Ontario Liquor Commission and the liquor boards across the country may have a bearing on this. I rule all that out. But from the standpoint of our Act this is a lower quality product which is being sold at perhaps the same price.

Now, what the law says is, first of all, that it must not be falsely advertised, which does have something to do with our Act. Secondly, it says that as long as the public is free to choose and knows what it is they are getting through being told the proper story about it, the fact that somebody decides to sell a lower quality product does not have any real implication at all. It is just a form of competition. If the public want to buy it, they buy it. Some people may like that.

Senator Prowse: What would be the situation where a patent medicine company has been selling a certain type of product for a number of years under a certain symbol or a trade name which has become recognized. I don't want to identify it at the moment, but let us say it was product X, and it was called product X. And, having brought product X by that name over a period of time, I had believed that it had a certain commodity in it. I will go so far as to say it had one-eighth of a grain of codeine in it along with aspirin, the product I am interested in at the moment.

And then I go down to the store and buy the same product X in a slightly different packaging but still described as product X, at what looks to me like a hell of a good price for product X—but I have found I can get similar things at different prices in different drugstores. And then I get home and get my glasses on and read it through, and see it no longer has the codeine. And I am particularly interested in the cough suppression effects of the codeine that is in this thing as much as anything else.

What would you think that would be?

Mr. Henry: Well, was this clearly marked on the package? Was it smaller...

Senator Prowse: Product X is two inches high, and the other stuff is in—six point type is small; this is about three point, I would say.

Mr. Henry: Well, Senator, you are into a different field here.

The Chairman: He is into a different committee!

Mr. Henry: But he has a point here. There are two things about it. One is that our Act would only apply to that to the extent that it might be said that the advertising was misleading. If you put that up, we would certainly look at it.

But I think it is of more importance to take a look at the Food and Drug Act regulations, because that is where this thing lies. The Act and regulations will require certain ingredients to be on that package, unless it is a proprietary article, in which case the formula is secret, under the Patent and Proprietary Medicines Act.

So, you see, you are not dealing really directly with a competition matter here. You are dealing with something which may be partly the concern of the administration of the Food and Drug Act which regulates this kind of thing and requires certain information to be on the package. The other aspect of it would involve us, if that were a misleading statement on the package.

The third thing that may be involved; that is the trade mark. I am not sure you are saying somebody else is using the trade mark.

Senator Prowse: It is the same guy.

Mr. Henry: If it is the same fellow, all right, we will leave the Trademark Act out. But you realize, if somebody else tries to use the trademark, then we are into a private matter between the infringer and the owner of the trade mark.

All right, the short answer is—and now I speak as someone having some responsibility in the Department for consumer matters—it is obvious in a situation like that we should take proper steps to see that the labelling is clear.

It is a matter of labelling. And there is already law about that when you have codeine involved, because this must be disclosed, as I understand it, on the face of the package. If you do not see it on there, it is presumably not going to have it.

Senator Prowse: I won't waste the time of the Committee or your time.

The Chairman: I was just going to suggest we...

Senator Prowse: I anticipate the Chairman. But I do have a question that I think is relevant here.

I gather then, if I understand—and I think it was quite clear from your statement—that you cannot move into any combination or merger or prevent a merger unless you can show that there is an abuse. Is that correct?

Mr. Henry: Not quite, Senator. That would be the case with the monopoly.

Senator Prowse: I see.

Mr. Henry: With monopoly—because a monopoly per se is not necessarily illegal. It is an abuse of the monopoly that is illegal. In the merger it is the limitation of competition that is the test.

And the real debate that has taken place between ourselves and the courts in effect has been how much competition has to be eliminated before the Act can be invoked by the courts, or will be invoked by the courts?

Now, the experience thus far has indicated that the courts will tolerate a very severe elimination of competition through the merger route before they will move to strike down a merger.

In fact we have never yet got them to strike down a merger except, I suppose, in the ERCO case, which was decided only last week. It is as current as that. And a merger was only one aspect of the matter.

We proceeded against Electric Reduction Company of Canada Limited. I made a very quick reference to it in the paper here. It was not fundamentally a merger case. It was fundamentally a monopoly case.

But the point is that the company has pleaded guilty to all the charges, including the merger charge, indicating that counsel at least must have advised the companies that they did not have too sound a footing on the merger situation.

That is a very highly concentrated industry, very highly indeed. And it does not take very much to change the pattern of what we have just suggested the courts have laid down.

But in the case of the merger, Senator, it is the effect on competition that is the key to the thing.

Another way we put it is that what you must look at in a merger case is how much competition remains after the merger.

Now, if none remains, then we will unquestionably move in no matter what the industry is.

Senator Prowse: Let us take the newspaper monopoly situation that exists with the newspaper—one newspaper in the small community, and even an isolated community. Let us suppose it has a circulation of 10,000.

Mr. Henry: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And I am very unhappy because I think they are not covering the town council or the city council with the degree of diligence that I think they should be.

So I proceed then to put out a mimeographed sheet which I can get out quite cheaply. And I don't propose to stay in business, but I do this because I am an interested citizen, complaining bitterly. And as a result of that the thing goes to you.

As I understand from the decisions to date, the very fact that I was able to get out the mimeographed sheet to complain and distribute it to the public—say I put out 2500 of them—this destroys my whole case, does it not?

Mr. Henry: Yes. I am not quite sure why it would come to me in those circumstances.

Senator Prowse: Well, it is referred to you. I get six good men and true...

Mr. Henry: By the existing publisher?

Senator Prowse: I get six good men and true to complain to you that this other fellow has a monopoly. This is one of the complaints.

Mr. Henry: Yes. The point is, I would have some ground to move in if you started to get out your competing news sheet and you found he came around and bought it all up or something.

Senator Prowse: No. I get out the sheet just to complain about the fact he is not giving any service.

Mr. Henry: Well, then, in that case you are simply complaining about the monopolist and its conduct.

Senator Prowse: This would not constitute sufficient competition?

Mr. Henry: No. But this is a one-shot effort, if not, you are talking about?

Senator Prowse: Well...

Mr. Henry: You could hire a hall and say the same thing.

Senator Prowse: No. I get these things out and decide I am going to keep putting these things out.

Mr. Henry: That is fine. Then you are running a small newspaper.

Senator Prowse: Depending on how long I read it.

Mr. Henry: Right. If you are able to do this.

Senator Prowse: I have created the competition.

Mr. Henry: I would only become concerned... Certainly I would read your news sheet to see what you have to tell us, because maybe you have something there we could put our finger on. I would always do that. Because the important thing is, first of all, to get the story.

We get all sorts of stories from the press themselves. You would be surprised. I mean, you figure for yourself. We read the press to see if anything comes out of the news items or even commentaries which will deal with a monopolistic situation and put the finger on something which may be of significance to us.

If you are able to publish this document, then we will say all right, more power to you, because you are running a little bit of competition for the local newspaper. And that is what we like to see happen. Because you can then expand that to presenting different points of view. And you can fill in the gaps that the local newspaper who has the monopoly do not touch.

Senator Prowse: Maybe I could do it for three months in order to get something going, but I am not sure I want to get into the business forever.

Mr. Henry: No. That comes back to the economies of the newspaper industry. As I have indicated in the paper, it is very difficult to get into the field because the risk is great, there are very high economies to be achieved from scale.

If it is a large circulation area, the bigger the circulation, the more you can achieve economies of scale. And therefore it means in effect where you have a very large newspaper with a very large circulation it takes a great deal of capital to be able to get in there and match it, because you can only produce at the same cost as he does if you produce on that scale.

The result is people don't go in. And what we can see happening is newspapers changing hands rather than new one entering the field.

Senator Prowse: I was under the impression, listening to you earlier, that you could not move at all unless there was an abuse, but in the merger situation you can move to stop a situation which, in your opinion, or the opinion of the final court (if it went to court) could result in an abuse. Do you have that authority today?

Mr. Henry: Well, the abuse being the limitation of competition, if you want to put it that way.

Senator Prowse: It has to be unduly restrictive?

Mr. Henry: Yes. I used the word "abuse" only in connection with monopoly.

Senator Prowse: Oh, I see.

Mr. Henry: Yes. The test for merger I said was a limitation of competition, or—the other side of the coin—how much competition remains? That is the test for merger.

Senator Prowse: How much difference is there—without opening it in a general way—between the rather rounded teeth in this Act and the provisions of the American anti-combines legislation?

Mr. Henry: Ah, yes. Well, our law, which, incidentally, was enacted—our basic law (that is, the conspiracy law) was enacted one year before the Sherman Act in the United States; is basically the same, is fundamentally the same. There is some slightly different parts here and there, but as far as the conspiracies are concerned that is just about the same. The philosophies are the same, and so on.

And as far as the mergers are concerned, we are at a disadvantage vis-à-vis the United States. They were in the same position that we are now in up to...

Mr. Davidson: 1950.

Mr. Henry: 1950, but before that, though—1916, I think. I have forgotten the date.

They had criminal law. They used the Sherman Act in attacking mergers, which is a criminal statute. But then they found they were not getting successful enforcement of that in merger situations, for what I assume to be much the same reasons as we have experienced, that it is very difficult to ask a court in dealing with an indictable offence to find a person guilty on the basis of conflicting views of economic experts who analyse a situation. So much is a question of judgment, you see. And then the reasonable doubt creeps in.

But they enacted Section 7 of the Clayton Act back around the time of the first war, which made this a civil offence. It was in addition to the Sherman Act, which remains.

Under the Clayton Act it is now possible on the basis of a civil proceeding to attack a merger. And that has been much more successful.

Then they made a further amendment to it in about 1950, which has given them the teeth they need now.

The result is, to put the matter briefly, the difference between civil law and criminal law. And we still have criminal law. They have departed from criminal law—or provided themselves with an additional tool in the form of civil law. And as a result they have been able to attack mergers and concentration in its insipidity, as they say; that is, at a very low degree of concentration which they forecast will increase unless something is done.

So at a time when it is still possible to do something they will strike a merger down.

And this has been a matter of some concern to business people in the United States because of the successes that the administration in the Department of Justice there has had in attacking mergers at an early stage of concentration.

Senator Prowse: And our limitation flows out of 91 and 92 of the B.N.A. Act?

Mr. Henry: Yes, that is right. And then the matter of technique too.

But the Economic Council has recommended, as certainly the Minister of Justice did a number of years ago in public statements, that what we need is to get civil techniques into our Act, or quasi-civil techniques that is, away from the need to prosecute and prove your case beyond a reasonable doubt.

How we are able to do this, I am not too sure. We now have the support of the Economic Council as well as a number of ministers.

Mr. Basford, who is, of course, the Minister responsible now, has indicated that this will have to be very seriously considered. So how we do this constitutionally remains to be seen.

But this is a matter that we are now working on.

Senator Prowse: The thing you really need is a good sympathetic court.

Mr. Henry: Well, that is right. That, Senator, is a very important statement.

The Chairman: Perhaps that might be a good note on which we can terminate this hearing. I apologize to the Senators.

You have one question, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I have two.

The Chairman: Are they short questions?

Senator McElman: Yes, on the basis of what has just been said.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: Which law was used in the States to stop the merger, or the acquisition by I.T.T. of the A.B.C. Network? Was it civil, or criminal? The Justice Department finally moved in.

Mr. Henry: I think that was the Clayton Act, Senator. But if I am wrong about that I will send in a note about that. I am positive it was.

Mr. Fortier: It was.

Senator McElman: The Federal Communications Commission had failed to prevent it; then Justice moved in. But I was just wondering which area.

Mr. Henry: Of course, one has to say in the same breath that there is another difference here. In the United States, where you have a regulatory agency such as the F.C.C., which has initial authority to look at a thing like that, the Department of Justice in the United States have felt free to invoke the antitrust laws if they do not agree with the decision that has been made by the F.C.C. in that case, or whatever it may be.

Now, here, you see, we normally would not regard ourselves as free to challenge a decision made by the C.R.T.C., shall we say.

Now, I have not highlighted this but you do understand that as the Combines Act does not apply to pure services, I would have no business, even in the absence of the C.R.T.C. entering the field of a merger between two radio stations, or the acquisition of a radio or television station by a newspaper, because the newspaper is acquiring a service industry, you see; and that by itself does not let me go on.

But the C.R.T.C., of course, will do that. Now, under our form of government, with the parliamentary arrangements we have, the constitutional arrangements we have, it is not normal for one branch of the government to attack another, attack a decision made by another. It may be we will have to come to this sort of thing.

The nearest we have got at the moment is the new Canadian Transportation Act, where a provision was put in that a merger between two transportation companies—which, I think, as you know, under Section 20 must be referred to the Canadian Transportation Commission—under that provision...

They, incidentally, may say they object to the merger, or they may remain silent. They do not approve it actively. They simply may block it or remain silent—in other words, allow it to go through.

Section 20 requires the C.T.C. to notify me of every such merger. Now, that is in order to enable me to consider, first of all, the application of the Combines Act. In other words, I get direct notification, so I know it is going to take place.

The other thing is, of course, so that I can make representations, if I feel I should, to the C.T.C. on competition policy principles; draw to their attention—and this is the way the thing works in practice... We will look at each of these things and draw to their attention, if we think we should, an anti-competitive situation, or implications that may develop from this. And we work together in that way.

This, I think, is the key to the development of the relationship between ourselves and the C.R.T.C.—more close liaison.

But the Americans, in the case you cited, of course, through their Department of Justice could quite conceivably attack a merger of, say, a bank, which is cleared by the banking authorities—or the Federal Reserve Board, I suppose, clears the mergers in the States of banks, and attack that on anti-competition principles under the anti-trust laws. But we don't do that here.

Senator McElman: Secondly, could you briefly tell us what procedures you use? Let us say that you have decided there should be an inquiry, and, after you have done your initial work, you propose to make contact with the people who are the subject of the inquiry.

In normal situations, do you send them notice that you will be requiring certain information? Or do you send in a group of people who make contact with them directly?

What is the normal procedure?

Mr. Henry: Well, the normal practice is in a case where we consider a search to be necessary to move in without their knowing we are coming.

The very simple reason for that: people are tempted to remove evidence if they know we are coming.

Now, in a monopoly or merger situation that may not be so important.

You see, we have several techniques. The search is the one which normally you undertake where you have a conspiracy case. It is also undertaken in merger cases sometimes. But that is normally the first step.

We also have power to obtain information by return of information, in which case we send out a questionnaire and ask them to respond to that. That is another way of getting information which might come, say, from financial statements, the sort of thing which the company has in its records. And it is more appropriate to ask them to furnish it that way. So we do it both ways.

But in merger cases it has always been my policy to undertake a search either before or after any other communication takes place, because we have always found on the basis of experience it is best to go and look for ourselves rather than ask them to provide documents for us, simply because we then have control of the situation—or have a little bit better control of the situation.

But both techniques are used, and both can be used at the same time.

Senator McElman: That is normal?

Mr. Henry: And indeed it is quite normal to start with a search. That is a usual practice, to start with a search, in which case we pick up documentary evidence. That is very important in conspiracy cases.

Then we will follow by getting background information of one kind or another about, you know, volume of product, volume of sales in various territories, what the markets are, who the distributors are, things like that. This can be easily obtained from the records of the company; we ask them to put in a return.

The third method, which almost invariably takes place, is to call witnesses. Once we have the documents and the basic data—financial and other data about the company—then we will almost inevitably call witnesses. And we will ask them to explain this situation or that. This sometimes gives them an opportunity to correct an impression.

We are only concerned about getting information. All we want is facts. And it often turns out that the facts, once they are on the record, indicate to us there is no longer evidence of an offence. Hence we have a larger number of discontinued inquiries. If I don't think there is an offence, I stop the inquiry, because I should not be pushing the people around any more.

Senator McElman: But you don't break down doors or destroy things in the course of that?

Mr. Henry: We try not to certainly. No. I go in with a formal order.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Henry, it is apparent from the questioning this morning and it is apparent from the fact that the Senators still have questions that we perhaps would like to have you come back.

I have some questions myself. For example, I would like to have you discuss the failing Newspapers Act in the United States, the implications and so on.

I sense the other Senators have questions. So we will accept your offer of a return engagement.

For this morning I will simply say thank you, and thank the members of your staff for coming. We are grateful for having had you here. Thank you for staying overtime.

Honourable Senators, I am going to adjourn the Committee for five minutes. We will reconvene at noon, 12 o'clock, in about six minutes, to receive the brief from the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation.

—Short adjournment.

(Upon resuming at 12 noon)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, we are now going to receive a brief from Dr. Edgar D. Gillespie, who is the Chairman of the Audio-Visual Committee of the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation (Incorporated).

I should perhaps begin by apologizing to Dr. Gillespie. Several of us have done this privately, and I am delighted now to do so publicly.

Apparently he was under the impression—and I must say it is the exception to the rule when our staff become confused; and I really mean that; they do an excellent job—but apparently Dr. Gillespie was under the impression that he was going to appear this morning at 10 o'clock. So we apologize to you. And we are sorry for the inconvenience.

Now, the brief which you forwarded to us more than three weeks in advance, as was requested, Dr. Gillespie, has been circulated to the members of the Committee. And it has been read and studied by them.

I would propose that you begin now with an oral statement in which you can, if you wish, summarize your brief; you can explain it, or expand upon it, and indeed say anything else you may wish to. And following your oral statement—which I suggest be no longer than 15 minutes—the Senators would like to question you on the things you say this morning, on the contents of your brief, and perhaps on other matters which concern them.

Thank you.

Dr. Edgar D. Gillespie, Chairman, Audio-Visual Committee, the Canadian Home and School and Parent-Teacher Federation (Incorporated): Thanks, Senator Davey.

First I would like to express commendation to the powers that be that set up such a study on the mass media. We in Home and School, I think especially appreciate the fact that this is being done. And in case sometimes you might be frustrated and unhappy for goodness sakes don't ever get the idea that in any sense it might be an exercise in futility, Mr. Chairman.

We feel that it is very valuable to undertake a study such as this. So we were very pleased to have the opportunity to present a few viewpoints to your Committee.

Because we knew that you would be getting many presentations from the viewpoint of control of the press and the problems outlined in the suggestions you sent out to all contributing organizations, we thought we might put most of our suggestions in an area where we thought you might not receive other ideas.

The brief to which you have just listened was based on law and interpretations of courts and this sort of thing. Ours on the other hand will be based on the area of ideas and ideals, social factors, and factors in our society affecting young people.

Our Home and School Association, of course, is the largest voluntary organization in Canada representing parents from coast to coast. And at provincial Federation meetings and at our national Federation meetings, year after year we have had expressions of concern about some aspects of the mass media, particularly in regard to television and educational television.

For that reason in our written brief our comments arose almost entirely out of things which have come to us nationally and provincially in the way of statements and briefs, resolutions, concerning the situation.

Behind it all is the belief that the mass media in its broadest sense, and educational television in particular, forms a tremendously important addition to what is happening to our young people.

I have expressed in the brief some of these ideas where we deplore the brutality and vulgarity et cetera in educational television and, as I indicated, we are no longer alone in representing these viewpoints. It seemed for quite some time we were the only voice being raised in which we tried to suggest that our young people deserved something better, in television in particular.

I noticed just on December the 14th, I believe it was, a note in the paper that the National Broadcasting Company in the United States has as their aim, better children's television. Have we seen anything like this expressed by the CBC or CTV? I don't ever remember seeing a positive statement such as this, for example.

I well remember an exchange of correspondence with the President of the CTV network about three years ago where we sent in one of our resolutions deploring the amount of violence on television.

And in his reply to me he remarked "Well, of course we agree with this, but naturally we don't have any shows showing violence on our network."

I had a resolution from one of the provinces where—I don't think it was "Naked City", Mr. Chairman... The programme with Elliott Ness in it.

Senator Sparrow: "The Untouchables."

Dr. Gillespie: "The Untouchables," which was on at 8 o'clock, a prime viewing time for children, you see, on one of the stations.

So this has been a problem with us. And we are hoping as a result of viewpoints which are being expressed before your Committee that we can get some positive action in this regard.

I am not going to enlarge on very many ideas in the brief, but I would like to do that with three of them. And I hope that you will ask questions about other aspects of it.

The first is this: we have been trying for a long time to get some one in Canada interested in research as to what is happening—to what television is doing to children and youth.

We approached this first in 1960 in a very formal way by sending resolutions to the Board of Broadcast Governors, as it was constituted at that time, and to the CBC.

We feel that in our homes across Canada we have opened the door to the T.V. set in our dining rooms, living rooms, recreation rooms, a tremendously important factor which affects the attitudes, moral values, and sets of values of our young people.

And, as I indicated there, it may be good; it may be bad. It may not be having any effect. But we would like to know.

And we by resolution asked the CBC at one time to devote one-tenth of one per cent of their budget to research in this area. This would amount to approximately $60,000 at that time, which does not seem like very much. And I think you well know the way money is spent on research these days.

I have at hand here research on the types of lights there should be on the rear of cars—running lights, or brake lights. Just under $1 million-nine hundred and, I don't see the figure here quickly, but just slightly under $1 million was spent on this research. And we cannot even get $5,000, $10,000, $30,000, in Canada to see what is happening in an area affecting the lives of our young people and our children.

I am suggesting that perhaps we will be able to do this. One of our recommendations to your Committee is that your researchers might initiate a study such as this, or that you might recommend that it be carried on by somebody else. It is just a matter of feeling that we need to know more about what is happening to our youth and young people.

We are not concerned about the type of programmes which are shown late at night. We are concerned about the type of programmes being shown during the times children are usually watching television.

A second thing, which is along the same line, that I wanted to mention, is that so many people say that there is no research showing that T.V. does affect our children.

A few years ago, 1962 or '63, I think it was, there was some research done by Dr. Bandura, who worked with Dr. Schram and his Committee on a book on what television is doing to our children. He carried out some research in which he set up stages of children seeing an adult, seeing other children, watching a film, and then a controlled group; four groups.

In each case there was a large doll and mallets and hammers and things such as this in the playroom. And the youngsters in the three cases watched (a) an adult pounding this doll with a hammer and saying "Sock it to them", hitting them in the nose, and this sort of thing, and then (b) children doing it, who were older and were playing a part, and then (c) someone closer to their own age, there was also the controlled group, who did not see any of this.

The children were then put in a situation with the same materials. And they were then watched through one-way vision glass, for example, to see what happened.

Without exception the children attacked the dolls, showed aggressive behaviour similar to what happened in the television programmes.

This study says it does not necessarily follow that youngsters will do this; but later on when they are frustrated, that they will turn to this type of behaviour more easily.

So there is a considerable amount of information on this line.

I would like to just indicate some other research which was taken from the book "Poison for the Young" published in 1962.

This is stated in very extreme language trying to make a point, I am sure. And I did not include this in the brief as such. But they speak of much of television being a "course in crime."

It says:

"For the most part the children's hour in commercial television is a succession of fast-moving, exciting fantasy. It is extremely violent. Shootings and sluggings follow each other interminably. And more than half of the 100 hours when the survey was made are given over to this sort of thing.

In the 100 hours there were 12 murders, 16 major gunfights, 21 persons shot, 21 others in "violent incidents, 37 hand-to-hand fights, one back-slapping episode with a butcher knife, an attempted murder with a pitchfork, two stranglings, 15 sluggings, four people falling or being pushed over cliffs, two attempts to run people over with cars on the sidewalk, two mob scenes in which one of the men hangs the wrong man. There was generally a great deal of miscellaneous violence."

This was in 100 hours of watching T.V. programmes. This was in a certain section of the United States.

So I am submitting to you, gentlemen, that this is a problem with which we should concerned. Concerned because there is a growing belief (if there really always has not been) that the way children learn is through the totality of their environment.

And to think that we can take such a dramatic effect on their lives as television and say "No, this does not affect them in their attitudes; this does not affect them in the way they think; this does not affect them in the way in which they are going to act" I think is utter nonsense. We cannot isolate one part of the environment when a youngster is learning in totality.

There is only one thing about it; and that is that the youngster soon gets the idea that much on television is phony. And I think this helps in the transaction. After all, this is where parents come in.

Parents can turn off the sets, and they can direct their viewing, of course, and all parents do this to some extent. But many children have the chance to watch television when parents are not there.

So we are submitting this is something over which we should express a great deal of concern and try to find out what actually is happening.

Well, now, this main idea of the necessity for research, necessity for some type of improvement in programmes is most important.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to add just a few other points briefly which I did not include in the general brief. And I can do this in about five minutes.

The Chairman: Fine. Go ahead, yes.

Dr. Gillespie: We may have given an indication here that we are in favour of censorship. I don't think our Home and School Associations across Canada are in favour of censorship as such. We would not want government controls. We would not want that kind of control.

As we indicate in the brief, we are interested in the networks themselves and the mass media in general strengthening their own sets of controls.

We are alarmed when we see another type of writing in the press. I will refer here to an article concerning a play put on television by CBS, which, according to this reviewer, really was a big step forward, where the dialogue of the play was very aggressive.

For example, one says "You are a bloody lousy creep." Still another says "You are a pig"—this kind of language.

We ask if this is a step forward. The answer, he says, it surely is.

The television code, or seal of good practice which has hitherto governed all U.S. television, has such sacred cow guidelines as these: "profanity, obscenity, smut and vulgarity are forbidden, even when likely to be understood only by part of the audience; respect is maintained for the sanctity of marriage and the value of the home; divorce is not treated casually as a solution for marital problems; illicit sexual relations are not treated as commendable; drunkenness should never be presented", and so on. He says all this nonsense has been swept away by our dear friends.

The Chairman: This is a review by Roy Shields in the December 7th, 1967 issue of the Toronto Star?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

It is this sort of thing which makes us wonder. Because who presents a different viewpoint in the mass media? Who does?

Now, we do not see something said contrary to that sort of thing; and this is what alarms us. We are not in favour of censorship, but we feel there should be a better presentation of both sides of issues.

Of course we know that through selection and editorial policy and biases and political viewpoints, political learnings of papers and this sort of thing—that through the very selection of news there is some censorship. We think this is as it should be. It is within reason.

It is not good when there is the type of censorship in which parts of a speech are mutilated or taken out of context, and something entirely different put in the press than what was originally there. We feel that in many cases the mass media are very irresponsible.

I suppose I should have said a positive statement first, that because of the tremendous responsibility that they have, we would praise them very highly. But on the other hand there is a tremendous amount of irresponsibility in the mass media.

I suppose you have heard what happens when T.V. cameras appear where there is a crowd or a mob scene about to start. I have had two people from CBC mention to me—one was doing some taping in the States where T.V. cameras were riding with one of the policemen in the mob, and nothing was happening. The television crew happened to mention this. And they said, "Oh, well, we will have something happen for you so you can get something on film."

They stopped beside a group, got out, and lined them up against a wall and searched them and so on, to get something for the T.V. camera.

Twice I have heard T.V. and radio personnel on panels mentioning the same thing and saying how unfortunate it is that this sort of thing happens when lights are turned on and the cameras are there.

I would suggest perhaps that some of this irresponsibility might be knowing this is going to happen and still having the cameras there which might make the situation worse.

I think that the only other thing I will mention in this connection is our concern, similar to what I mentioned here, about somebody not raising a voice which would speak out for a level of life above what I might call the more undesirable ways in which man lives—and we all know that we do this—speaking out for virtue; speaking out for a concern for others; speaking out for a type of life which has some sets of values, has some aim in life.

It seems to us, as I judge from resolutions to Home and School, that our membership are concerned about this happening. We would like to somehow hope that sometimes we can have a better reporting of some of the finer things that happen in life rather than those having to do with violence, sadism, and that sort of thing.

I think this is one reason why there has developed a credibility gap today with the mass media and much of the public—the idea that you don't believe what you read in the newspapers because so often some of the things are not quite the full story—not necessarily done on purpose—but nevertheless it is a situation which we deplore.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I think that is all I will say at this point.

The Chairman: Thank you, Doctor. I think you have amplified the contents of your report.

I think Senator Sparrow is going to ask a question.

Senator Sparrow: I wonder if the Doctor could elaborate just a bit on your organization for us.

You refer in your brief to your membership of 200,000. One of the questions is, you refer to nine provinces; is this representative of both Catholic and Protestant groups? And I am thinking particularly of provinces with separate school systems. Does your organization represent both?

Dr. Gillespie: In all provinces except the Province of Quebec. And the Province of Quebec has their own provincial federation for their schools.

We have a working relationship with them. We have invited them to sit in with us at our national meetings. But they do not formally belong to a national association.

Newfoundland does not have a provincial federation. I believe they only have three local associations, and there are not enough there yet to have a provincial federation.

National is just a federation of the provincial bodies.

Senator Sparrow: How do you finance your operation?

Dr. Gillespie: We assess ten cents per member from across Canada. The membership is paid provincially, and out of the membership in each province 10 cents per member is forwarded to national.

So thus as our membership drops, as it is doing, then our revenues are going down too. And we cannot conduct the type of studies and this sort of thing that we used to do ten or twelve years ago.

Senator Sparrow: Why is your membership dropping?

Dr. Gillespie: We would like to know. Alberta have made a study. British Columbia have made a study provincially. And their report said that all of the voluntary organizations in Canada are dropping; guides, boy scouts, all that sort of group and women's groups. And ours seems to be going along with the trend.

Senator Sparrow: You refer in your brief starting at the first page in the introduction that your organization has been involved with this new media (referring to T.V.) and "...convinced of its potential in education".

You state as well you have conducted several surveys in connection with educational television.

Would you elaborate more fully on how you have been involved in this media, how you have been "convinced of its potential in education"; and what surveys were undertaken, and the results of those surveys that you have done?

Dr. Gillespie: You want an example of them?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, and what they have shown.

First of all, how have you been involved? How do you mean that statement that you have been involved in T.V.?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, in three ways, and in particular one.

Until the Committee was reorganized just a year ago our Home and School Association was represented on the National Advisory Council to the CBC on school broadcasts. And for quite a number of years I had been the representative of Home and School on that committee.

We served a function of helping to set up the national telecasts for its educational telecasts for use in schools across Canada. We undertook to carry out surveys in each province of how many schools were using the programmes, and an evaluation of the programmes themselves.

In Saskatchewan, where I looked after two specific ones, we evaluated the programmes from the viewpoints of the children in the school, through the assistance of the teachers. And then we encouraged parents to view by circulating complete programmes of broadcasts to all Home and School Associations in the province.

The parents set up listening groups, and we had a special form for their use in evaluating the programmes.

I think that was the most fruitful way in which we were involved in this.

Another way in which we assisted—you know, many of the school boards in the early days were not in favour of putting television sets into the schools because they were afraid they were not being used.

So many of the Home and School Associations provided sets for schools, arranged for them to go into the schools so that the programmes could be viewed by the pupils.

Another way in which we assisted—well, I mentioned it first and I don't want to emphasize it again—was the matter of our contribution on this National Advisory Council, where we thought it important that the viewpoints of parents should be heard when programmes were being planned for across Canada.

Is that sufficient?

Senator Sparrow: I think so, yes.

You refer again in your remarks as well as in your paper to brutality, vulgarity, sex and violence. And you referred to at least two papers of some description. Whether they were really studies or not, I don't know. One you referred to was Dr. Bandura's research in "Poison for the Young."

It seems to be a matter of opinion whether violence on T.V. and so on is in fact as detrimental as you might indicate in your paper. Are you convinced, and is your Association convinced of the fact that it is detrimental to the minds of the young? And have you as an organization through studies in Canada in any way backed up this statement in your paper?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, in essence the answer is—well, first, we have not done any studies. We have been accepting the studies which have come to us from other people.

Now, this is one of our main points of contention. We do not think this is good enough. We do not think that Canada should always be accepting studies done in Britain or the United States. We think that we should start to stand on our own feet and find out what is happening.

It is quite likely that the trends and patterns developed some place else would apply here. But at the present time all we can do is to go to other sources for this sort of study.

Now, secondly, I think it would be a fair statement to say that by and large parents are concerned that television can and may have an adverse effect on their children.

We would hasten to add very quickly that the young people who will be affected most adversely would be those with some problems of maladjustment.

But this is all the more important when we say this because never in the history of this country (and I am sure it must be of others) have we had so many maladjusted young people, as evidenced by what is happening in the drugs and the drug addiction, the alarming rate of juvenile delinquency, the rate, the tremendously rapid rise.

We would never say that these are directly a result of what they see on television. But we would say television must be having some effect, along with other things, on this. And we would like to know to what extent. This is why we are asking again for more research.

Senator Sparrow: As a federation are you not in a position to do this research yourself? Is it because of financing or is it not in your aims and objects as such? Why don't you do this research yourself?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, we could if we had the money. However, I said "We could", but we would have to hire someone who was a trained researcher to do it. This is not a job for amateurs to undertake, not the kind of job we would like to see done.

The Chairman: If I may, Senator—Dr. Gillespie, if I belong to the Parent-Teacher Association at the school in North York which my children attend, am I automatically a member of your federation?

Dr. Gillespie: You are if that local association has joined the Ontario provincial association.

The Chairman: What percentage of them do join the Ontario, in round figures?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, it used to be around 75 per cent.

The Chairman: Nationally—that is a rule of thumb?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes, that is a rule of thumb. But somehow in the last few years—and this is why our Association has weakened so much—so many local associations are saying "Well, why should we spend money outside of our own local schools? It is more important to spend it here."

So they are not supporting anything which the Provincial Federation of Home and School is trying to do.

The Chairman: But if 75 per cent, or even two-thirds, or 60 per cent of the local clubs in the schools across Canada belong to the organization, then would not the organization be ideally suited to conduct this very kind of research that you have in mind?

One of the big expenses involved in research, as I am sure you know, is drawing the sample. You have the sample right here. You could easily study a classroom in Toronto and Regina and Edmonton.

Would it not be a relatively simple thing for you to do this?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes. And we have in correspondence which we have had previously with the former Board of Broadcast Governors offered our services. But we did not have the money to do it.

The Chairman: I don't see it would take that much money. Why could you not do it?

Senator Prowse: Could they not do it voluntarily?

The Chairman: I don't see it would take that much money. Where would the cost be involved?

If I wanted to find out what a group of 12-year-old schoolchildren in Vancouver thought about something and contrast that, for example, with what a group of 12-year-old schoolchildren in Halifax thought about something, I would think the ideal person to go to get that information would be you.

Senator Sparrow: You are really the only people dealing directly with that group of people, the parents and the children.

The Chairman: I just think you are seen naturally to do this.

Dr. Gillespie: We considered we were for the surveys of how effective is television in the classroom; how it is being used in schools across Canada. And this is something that we have done, as I indicated before.

But to get into the realm of the influence of television on children as part of the community, influences which impinge on every youngster, then we have not felt that our organization had the skills to go into that.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: In referring again to the brutality, violence and so on on T.V., can you be specific in the type of programme that you are referring to—particular programmes, if you wish, that are giving this adverse effect that you were referring to?

I particularly ask this in regard to number of so-called informational programmes on sex and on drugs and so on that you do hear complaints from parents about although they are meant to be informational programmes.

But including those and any other types of programmes you might refer to.

Dr. Gillespie: We have not had one adverse criticism come to us about information programmes on sex or drugs or that sort of thing. If there has been a protest to the Provincial Federation, it has not been forwarded on to the national level.

So at the moment I can say we have just not had one.

The types of programmes that were criticized were the ones we mentioned a moment ago: "The Untouchables", and some of the films that were shown on television.

At the moment I cannot give the names of them because so often a resolution comes into being with just a general criticism of too many programmes showing the sort of violence that implicated in there—the beatings, and instead of just shooting a man once, then just standing and pumping bullets into him. This sort of thing is what riles.

Senator Prowse: But surely the other ones didn't hurt.

The Chairman: Do they object to cartoons, for example?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes, some of these that the CBC has been showing. We had verbal viewpoints on this at our last annual meeting.

The Chairman: Do you know which ones, Senator Sparrow has asked?

Dr. Gillespie: No. I don't watch them, and therefore I don't know. These are the Saturday morning ones, and I have not been free.

Senator Sparrow: It is difficult for us to try and analyze your recommendations without being able to review specific criticisms you might have. This is our problem.

The Chairman: Do they object to fighting in hockey games?

Dr. Gillespie: I have not heard it, if they do.

The Chairman: You have not heard them object to that?

Dr. Gillespie: No. I mean, I might object personally.

The Chairman: You have not heard them object because the kids watch hockey games?

Dr. Gillespie: I stopped doing to a series of junior hockey games because the game was spoiled as far as I was concerned by so much fighting, and this sort of thing. I like to watch skillful hockey. But this is a personal thing.

The Chairman: But you have not heard them?

Dr. Gillespie: I have not heard that, no. It is just the type of thing where they think the youngsters are getting a course in crime, watching how to do things, or watching people commit crimes. And this comes in various films, does it not, in various programmes?

The Chairman: What about live violence? What about the war in Vietnam? Or what about the association of President Kennedy, which was shown over and over again. Or the assassination of Oswald, which was shown over and over again? Are they objecting to these things as well?

Dr. Gillespie: The only objection that I had in this connection was the report of the fact that when President Kennedy was killed that children in the classrooms cheered—that some children in some classrooms cheered.

Senator Sparrow: In the States or in Canada?

Dr. Gillespie: In the States.

Senator Prowse: This was presumably in Dallas. I only saw the story once, and I don't know that that was ever substantiated. It is supposed to have happened in the city of Dallas.

Dr. Gillespie: In the city of Dallas; this is right.

The Chairman: Have you received objections about the newscasts of the war in Vietnam?

Dr. Gillespie: No.

The Chairman: It is fictionalized violence mostly?

Dr. Gillespie: It is fictionalized violence which they complain about. No, I don't think that they would say that there should be a curtailment of reporting of the news where violence is involved?

Senator Prowse: Of course, "Jack and the Beanstalk" was pretty violent too, you know.

Dr. Gillespie: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: I beg your pardon?

Senator Prowse: "Jack and the Beanstalk" was pretty violent too.

Dr. Gillespie: But the fairytales...

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow has some more questions.

Senator Prowse: So are cartoons.

Dr. Gillespie: So are cartoons. And what about most of our fairytales?

We feel as long as the youngsters know they are fictional, it is not going to really affect them. It is where it appears to be real when they see it.

The Chairman: But you have made the point yourself in your comments that children are soon able to discern that it is fictional.

Senator Prowse: Isn't the reason we need research to find out whether this in fact does what you and I at our age think it may do, because this may not be the reason at all? And if we have come to a wrong conclusion because of a bad guess, this could be worse than the stuff itself.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes, this is right. I believe that they learn early to differentiate.

The story about the two 4-year-olds who were watching the television set and one said, "My daddy said he is going to have to get our set fixed."

And the other lad said, "Why? What is wrong?"

And he said, "I don't know, but maybe they are going to have to clean out all the dead cowboys in it."

The Chairman: Well, on that note, we will let Senator Sparrow finish with his questions.

Senator Sparrow: You refer in your brief to self-imposed controls only referring directly to the media themselves as far as standards of decency and so on are concerned.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: And you refer to the alternative then that if they are not going to do it then there should be some regulatory body do it, such as government. Are you suggesting that?

You are not.

What type of regulatory body are you suggesting then if the media won't do it themselves?

Dr. Gillespie: I have just said it might come to that. We are not advocating it.

As you know, the networks in the United States after the assassination of President Kennedy decided on their own to reduce the amount of violence in their programmes. And I think this has been done.

I think there is far less violence on the American television networks these last two years than certainly previously. And I think they are using a self-regulatory code here in regard to violence. And I think this is the way we would like to see it done.

I was just saying that it may be, if the networks don't do this, that there might arise an attempt—not that we want to do it.

And we would not like to see government censorship. I am sure of this from various meetings I have attended with our Association. But we are just saying that it might happen. And Mr. Honderich in the talk that he gave warned the meeting that he was speaking to, that they were really laying themselves open to this sort of thing unless they improved the quality of what was being done on the mass media.

The Chairman: Just to return to your other statement: there is far less violence on American television now than two years ago—can it be possible that there is far less violence on American television now than two years ago but that is not equally true in Canada?

Dr. Gillespie: I believe that it is also true in Canada, that there is less.

Senator Sparrow: Because of American programmes?

Dr. Gillespie: No. Well, I suppose a large part of what we had here before was the American programmes which came in on our networks; and to that extent, yes. But I really believe that our two Canadian networks now are more conscious of this.

Senator Sparrow: I just have a couple more questions and then I will pass it on.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Sparrow: On page 6 number 5 you refer to the fact "that government financial assistance be made available for the expansion of educational facilities at all levels."

What are you referring to here? Are you talking generally education? Or what are you specifically suggesting?

Dr. Gillespie: This was educational television I was talking about there—ETV.

Senator Sparrow: Right. Okay.

Dr. Gillespie: We were concerned there that the Federal government in Canada as opposed to, say, the Federal government in the United States has really done very little to help establish educational facilities in our country. Really about the only thing which has been done (I guess it is the only thing) is that every time they set up the school broadcast branch of the CBC. And they have done a tremendous job. And I would hope that any other television enterprise does as good a job as the CBC did in those telecasts.

But there are far too few of them. And those were not used, chiefly because of administrative details of timetabling. When the programme comes on at 10 o'clock, if it is at math and your math break is at 10 o'clock, what do the teachers do? They don't catch it.

I know that when the video tape recorders come out, the VTR's and the new EVR's, the electronic video recorders come out, this will make a difference. But this equipment is costly. And I think that it is a way in which the Federal Government could contribute—we will call it "Federal aid to education"—on a national basis which would not in any way interfere with the provincial prerogatives in education.

So we are suggesting here that money is needed for more fully developing educational television across Canada. And it could be a logical contribution from federal funds, not commercial at all.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Well, isn't the money that is needed in ETV for programme production, which is tremendously expensive? This is where you really need the money, is it not?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, in the past as you may know, the arrangement with the CBC has been that the CBC provides the facilities, the personnel, the directors, the cameramen, the studios; and the provincial governments, the departments of education, provincially have provided the material, the sets, the teachers, and this sort of thing. And there has been a division in each province whether it has been done provincially or regionally. And this has worked out quite well.

But with the impending withdrawal of the CBC from school broadcasting entirely...

Senator Prowse: You need somebody to take up that slack; that is what you are talking about there?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes, that is what I am talking about.

Senator Prowse: Another thing is this: your membership is 200,000?

Dr. Gillespie: Approximately, yes.

Senator Prowse: How many parents with children of school age would there be in Canada, roughly? Do you know how many children there are in schools?

Dr. Gillespie: No. It is so long since I have seen the figure.

Senator Prowse: I have been making a small estimate and trying to make a guess here. And there must be about 10,000,000. About half of our population must be in that area.

Dr. Gillespie: It would be less than that.

Senator Prowse: May be not. May be it is 25 per cent, let us say. So that gives us 5,000,000. And with an average family of two point something, this would be, say, two in school. So there would be two and a half million parents at least in Canada.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And only 200,000 of them in an organization which is supposed to bridge the gap between the home and the school.

Dr. Gillespie: Only in the organizations which are federated with our National Home and School.

Senator Prowse: Which would be roughly 75 per cent. So let us give you a better deal and take you up to 300,000. So we are getting about one parent in ten, in a rough way.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Showing enough interest.

Dr. Gillespie: I would think most home and school associations do not have 50 per cent of the parents in the area interested enough to really support the home and school association.

Senator Prowse: I would say from the figures you give us that the average home and school association does not have 10 per cent of the parents in the organization. Period. Is that not pretty close? It must be close to it.

Dr. Gillespie: I would say, of course, there are the areas which don't affiliate, and they are 100 per cent there.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: So that the parents themselves are not showing any interest?

Dr. Gillespie: They are not showing the sort of interest one would expect parents to show.

Senator Prowse: Which might be the reason the children presumably are getting...

The Chairman: I am not sure that is a fair conclusion. If you want to carry on, do so; I am not sure that is a fair conclusion, though.

Senator Prowse: All right. It is a thought anyway.

The Chairman: It is an indictment of all the parents of Canada who don't belong to the Parent-Teacher Federation. I think that is unfair.

Senator Prowse: I don't mind letting that indictment stand, Mr. Chairman. The Committee does not have to associate itself with it.

The Chairman: It is your indictment, not mine. Carry on.

Senator Prowse: You are interested in the media. Your whole proposal here is that you think this Committee should make a recommendation to the appropriate authorities regarding, one, the financing of proper ETV programmes; and, two, the provision of channels that will be available to people; that is, the VHF channels rather than the UHF, which are only on the newer sets.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And that is substantially what you are saying to us today?

Dr. Gillespie: For this part of it, yes.

Senator Prowse: Yes. Okay, thank you.

The Chairman: I would just like to ask two questions. One, you say that—and I am quoting from your brief...

"In December, 1969, the Chairman of the United States Federal Communications Commission stated that obscenity on television may have to be controlled by Government action."

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you believe that in Canada obscenity on television should be controlled by government action?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, I would say that, if the situation arises where enough people were opposed to it, I would say yes.

Just as a personal feeling, I have not been too happy with the increase in profanity we have had on panels and this sort of thing in the last two years. I would certainly hope it does not develop any more.

The Chairman: There is perhaps a difference between profanity and obscenity.

Dr. Gillespie: Well, yes. I was using profanity as an example.

The Chairman: Yes.

Dr. Gillespie: Now, what I referred to there was TV obscenity control—the threat of obscenity on television may have to be controlled by a special body.

The Chairman: Yes, but I am saying, do you think that is true in Canada?

Dr. Gillespie: Not the TV as I see it at the moment in Canada.

The Chairman: Is it a potential?

Dr. Gillespie: It is a potential, yes.

The Chairman: When they start showing "I am Curious (Yellow)" on the late show?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes. Well, if they showed it at a time it would ordinarily be viewed by children.

The Chairman: What if they showed it at 11 o'clock at night?

Dr. Gillespie: I don't think our association would say anything.

Senator Prowse: I was going to say I think obscenity is in two forms. One is what we normally obscene words which get into things, as opposed to profanity. The difference is, I think, well known to everybody.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And then the obscenity is the type of shows that they might show.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Which does that refer to, do you know? Are they thinking about something like film censors to TV programmes?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes, right—censorship to TV programmes, and the same with films. That is the reference there.

And of course we have the situation in Canada naturally of the censorship of films. But they are coming into television. I don't know how many of you have noticed recently we are getting shows at 8 o'clock,

Thursday and Friday evening, which formerly were restricted adult programmes in theatres.

The Chairman: You mean, movies?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes, movies which are shown.

The Chairman: Yes.

Dr. Gillespie: And I am sure at our next convention we will have resolutions in this connection, because it is a very recent development. Those until very recently were left until the late shows.

The Chairman: Dr. Gillespie, I would like to ask you one other question.

One thing about your brief which disappointed me (and perhaps you can express yourself on my disappointment) was that you tend to dismiss or not to pay particular attention to the influence of the print media, and particularly newspapers, on children.

One of the things which I find encouraging is one of the schools which certain of my children attend is that there are teachers here—this is in grade school—who are making a conscientious attempt to encourage the children to read the newspapers. I think that is a very healthy development.

I am curious why you tend to dismiss the influence of newspapers on children. Is this not something which should be encouraged?

Dr. Gillespie: I suppose we did because we have no quarrel with that; and we strongly commend this.

We are most happy with the way most schools now are using the newspapers in the school, not only in current events but as a background in individualized instruction which is going on in our schools more and more. And I would strongly support this.

The Chairman: You have made reference in your brief to the more permissive (if I may use that word) trend in the electronic media. Do you not discern the same permissiveness in the print media?

Dr. Gillespie: In other than the newspapers, yes. I don't think we quarrel with the newspapers as much. But certainly, well, the pornography—

Our Association in years past have tried to tackle this problem of, rather than stressing the negative, to stress the positive approach of providing better books, better libraries, to let what they might buy on the newsstands.

Our membership is concerned about the type of written material that is available. But on the other hand never in our history have we had so many good books for children as we now have.

The Chairman: I think Senator Sparrow has a question.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, and it follows through with this particular one.

Are you familiar with the subject of pornography addiction, or pornographic addiction, as such? And are you familiar with any of the studies on it?

The next question would be: do you think the Canadian TV programming is contributing to this?

I refer to this because there are studies being made and some of them refer to the fact that this addiction is every bit as dangerous and as important a subject as the other addictions we are concerned about.

Are you familiar with this?

Dr. Gillespie: I am not familiar with the studies, no. But I certainly would feel that there is an addiction there for certain types of youngsters. I would say I would not think it would be an addiction which I would say all children would be subjected to in the same way.

Senator Sparrow: Our programming is contributing, are you suggesting, to this?

Dr. Gillespie: I am suggesting if it continued excessively it would, yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Dr. Gillespie, I am perplexed here. As you have recognized, there is violence in the world; there is pornographic material; there is undue exploitation of sex in every day life.

Are you suggesting that we should insulate our Canadian children from reality, in your brief and in your verbal presentation?

Dr. Gillespie: No. We cannot do this. What we are suggesting is that we insulate them, separate them in their early years.

Mr. Fortier: Where would you draw the line?

Dr. Gillespie: I would think from most elementary school children, if we could.

Mr. Fortier: And how would you draw the line?

Dr. Gillespie: By first in commercial television programmes not having the type of film to which we object at the times they ordinarily view TV; secondly, making sure that we continue to have our films labelled in the theatres as they now are.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing I am a mature man and my work schedule is such that I like to see my films in the afternoon on television, or I like to see my programmes in the afternoon. Are you suggesting that I should be restricted in the choice of programmes which I may have because children may be turning on television at that particular hour?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, this is certainly the view of our Federation of Home and School.

Mr. Fortier: And when they reach a certain magic age let us expose them to life?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, it is not that simple, as you well know.

Mr. Fortier: You agree it is not that simple?

Dr. Gillespie: It is not that simple. What we want to do is reduce the quantity to which they are exposed just as much as we can. They will see all kinds of violence, and they will read stories involving violence.

Our concern is really based on the fact that, according to reports of people in mental health, psychiatrists, that we are having a problem and it will be increasingly difficult if we do not do a better job in helping in the emotional maturity of our young people. And we feel this is strongly associated with their maturing and growing up with positive emotional aspects of the growth.

Mr. Fortier: What do you think about this statement here—and I quote:

"The bulk of research concludes that TV by itself is not really a cause of crime or aggression. It may be a contributing factor but only in the case of a child who is already disturbed."

The Chairman: From where are you quoting?

Mr. Fortier: I am quoting from an article in Time Magazine, January 26th, 1968.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes. That is almost a direct quotation from two different studies that I know.

The question there is this matter of "disturbed", and to what extent. I think I suggested a little while ago that there is the feeling today that more and more youngsters are having a feeling of insecurity. Their emotional ties are not as strong as they used to be. And that therefore there are more people who are likely to be influenced by violence, sadism, whatever else one calls it, on television than there used to be.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if that would not happen even without television.

Dr. Gillespie: It has always happened to some extent. But it is just the amount of this to which they are being subjected which worries us.

Mr. Fortier: The comic books of 15, 20 years ago, as I recall them, were just as prone to accentuating violence and crime as I believe the television programmes which you alluded to.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes. I think in every province we have had groups in Home and School and provincial federations go to the provincial government in regard to the types of comic books available and try to bring about some change.

So there is a concern for it, yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier would be well advised to go to a local newsstand and buy some comic books and compare them to the comic books of 20 years ago. I think he might be surprised.

Mr. Fortier: Do you do that very often, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: I will take you over there in the afternoon.

Are there are other questions that the Senators have?

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I think Dr. Gillespie referred to a weakening of emotional ties. Would it not be a weakening of family ties you are referring to?

Dr. Gillespie: Well, they are related very strongly. We are finding more and more youngsters in our schools who are trying to get their need for security, their need for affection and love, met in the school rather than in many of the homes. Strangely enough, this does not apply only to low socio-economic levels; it is applying in some of our good districts, high socio-economic level districts in some of our big cities.

Senator Beaubien: More mothers working

Dr. Gillespie: Or busy, or having maids look after the youngsters, taking them off to skating, to ballet, on the move all the time. And again it is hard to assess, but I know it exists, because of my visitations in schools and talking with teachers about problems.

Senator McElman: I am concerned with the falling off in your membership. Do you believe, or have you studied in any sense whether the trite phrase "generation gap" has anything to do with this—the generation gap of those at the upper levels in your Association, for instance, as between men and children of school age, the mind that can be imprinted upon?

Dr. Gillespie: No. I would say that about 30 per cent of it is the fact that associations are deciding not to affiliate with provincial federations and therefore with national.

Senator Davey mentioned a moment ago, I believe, or alluded to this idea that there is still a tremendous number of people, far more than our membership, who belong to so-called home and school associations, to parent groups; but they are not in our Federation.

But I am still firmly convinced that parents are very interested in their children, and by and large they do support what the school is doing. But they don't show up in our membership.

I know in one city that at the present time out of 42 associations (this was last year) only of them have joined our provincial federation. And this is one reason why our figures have been down.

But this does not mean there are not parents in Home and School Associations. They could not be using the term because we are incorporated, but they are still using it. They could be calling them "parent groups."

Senator McElman: The reason I asked about the generation gap, when you and I were growing up it was not only that the four-letter word was unacceptable in our then society, but the three-letter word "S-E-X" was not even used.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator McElman: There is a great change in values. And I am, as Senator Sparrow obviously was, trying to find out what is the basis for the references to all of the dreadful things on television? What code? Where is the code? Is there a code for the young and a code for the medium age group and a code for the older? Who establishes the code?

For instance, could I suggest that perhaps your Association could be helpful to this inquiry if your Association at its national or federated level were to put together for us a suggested code of what would be proper and improper to be dealt with on television and in newspapers, and so on?

Could you undertake such a thing for us? This should not be too difficult. I think your opinion as a national organization would be useful to us.

Dr. Gillespie: Well, I presume it could be done.

Senator McElman: Would you undertake such?

Dr. Gillespie: I am wondering, are you asking for the opinions of our people, as what they think?

Senator McElman: What they believe should be in a code that could be recognized by the media. And be selective in the media—what you think should be in television, because you obviously feel this has the greatest impact on the clean slate of the young mind.

Dr. Gillespie: Yes.

Senator McElman: What should be in radio; what should be in the print; media.

You gave us a little story a while ago. Let me give you one to illustrate the difference. A little boy and a little girl were playing on the beach. They were from neighbouring families; they were not brother and sister. And quite innocently they decided to take off their bathing suits. And the little boy said "Wow, I didn't realize there was so much difference between a Catholic and a Protestant."

Now, you and I in our age group, we would have just said "Wow!"

Let us try to do something constructive. And perhaps you might even consider through your facilities running a survey at, let us say, the high school level—I am sure it could be done very cheaply—as to what the high school students believe should be embodied in a code of ethics for television separately, radio separately, print. Could you undertake such a thing for us?

Dr. Gillespie: I think this would be a very valuable thing to undertake.

Senator McElman: A sampling.

Dr. Gillespie: I would prefer this more than seeing what the parents want.

Senator McElman: Well, let us do both. Let us find out where society is moving.

Senator Prowse: The comparison might be interesting.

Senator McElman: Could you undertake it?

Dr. Gillespie: I will make a note of that and see if we can do that.

Senator McElman: Could you let us know?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes. I would be happy to furnish you with the results of it.

Senator McElman: Very good. Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien?

Senator Beaubien: Dr. Gillespie, could you let us know what your total revenue of your national association was in 1960? Do you get any funds at all except those from membership?

Dr. Gillespie: Just from membership. I don't know. 1960 would have been more. But I believe all the money we had to work with last year was under $20,000 because of this drop in membership at the national level.

Senator Beaubien: Under 20 for everything?

Dr. Gillespie: For everything.

Senator Beaubien: Would that be way down in 1960?

Dr. Gillespie: It would be more in 1960 because our membership then was about 350,000 at that time.

Senator Beaubien: So it would be $35,000?

Dr. Gillespie: Yes, $37,500 in 1960.

Senator Beaubien: And $20,000 last year?

Dr. Gillespie: You see, we look at it this way. Some churches in our area have budgets much beyond that, and we have been trying to operate...

Now, you know, it is strange, but every provincial federation which has raised their fee—Ontario about six years ago raised their affiliation fee from 50 cents to a dollar to join the provincial federation, and the local associations who do not affiliate the next year dropped by half. Well, it was a 100 per cent change. Fifteen cents, the price of a package of cigarettes. We cannot understand it. But it has happened.

Senator Prowse: If a thing is too cheap it is not given any value.

Dr. Gillespie: Well, that must be.

The Chairman: Well, Dr. Gillespie, on behalf of the members of the Committee—certainly on my behalf—I thank you. Again apologize for the delay, but I think it has been a worth while discussion.

The Committee adjourned.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, January 21, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this morning we are going to receive a series of briefs from The London Free Press, CFPL Broadcasting Limited Television and CFPL Radio, at least in part.

Sitting on my immediate right is the Chairman of CFPL Broadcasting Limited and resident and publisher of The London Free Press, Mr. Walter J. Blackburn.

Now, Mr. Blackburn, the briefs you were in due time enough to send us three weeks in advance have been circulated to the senators and presumably have been studied. I know you are going to make an oral statement which I hope you might confine to about fifteen minutes, and then the senators will proceed to question you on the contents certainly of your oral statement and on the contents of the briefs and other matters which may interest them.

It might be helpful, Mr. Blackburn, if you could perhaps, first of all, introduce the people who are here with you this morning.

Mr. Walter J. Blackburn, Chairman, CFPL Broadcasting Limited, President and Publisher, The London Free Press: Yes. Honourable senators, it is a great pleasure to be in Ottawa on this ear-tingling morning. We have heard a great deal about Ottawa weather and this is the weather we expect of our capital city at this time of the year. It is a beautiful morning.

I would like to introduce the men who will be working with me on my presentation, which is the overall corporate presentation. Mr. Murray Brown, president and general manager of CFPL Broadcasting Limited; Mr. William Carradine, vice-president and general manager of The London Free Press; and Mr. Everly Lanning, vice-president, finance, and treasurer of the company.

Mr. Carradine will introduce his colleagues later on.

My brief is quite lengthy and I believe clear and I do not think it would be useful at this time to use up your time with a further formal statement about the overall content of the brief itself. I would like simply to highlight a few of the more important points made in the brief and to comment in more detail on the estate tax problem in which you have demonstrated considerable interest.

In the first place, as the brief makes clear, our media position in London today is not the result of some aggressive and deliberate policy to drive out or stifle competition, but has developed in quite different circumstances.

The London Free Press newspaper has been continuously published for over 120 years and for nearly 35 years has been the only daily newspaper published in London. It would be surprising, in today's circumstances, if in a city the size of London, which has roughly 208,000 population now, there were more than one.

The fact that it is the Free Press is the result, no doubt, of good luck but also, I think it fair to say, of good management, which has enabled us to survive the vicissitudes of time and to continue to serve our community and trading area.

Our interest in broadcasting arose naturally out of our involvement in newspaper publishing and this too was characteristic of the early stages of broadcasting in many communities in Canada and the United States.

We are proud of the fact our radio station was the third radio station to broadcast in the whole of Canada and that we were pioneers in the broadcasting field; we are proud of the fact that, largely as a result of our efforts, London was one of the first communities in Canada to receive regular radio broadcasting in the early 1920's and, also to receive regular FM and television broadcasting when these technologies became available in more recent times, of course.

But here again, our broadcasting activities were not the result of actively seeking out a monopolistic position in the communications field in our community. Rather was it the case that we were the only people in the area who were prepared to undertake the risks and to put up the capital which had to be invested if a responsible and effective radio and television service were to be provided to the people of London and to the surrounding area.

It is not accurate to say that we constitute a "monopoly" of the media in the London area. I have endeavoured in the brief to describe in some detail the many alternative sources of communication which are available in our market area, and I have also indicated the likelihood that these will be multiplied by the technological innovations, including cable television, which are likely to be developed and exploited in the future.

We did not oppose the granting of additional radio licences in our area, nor will we oppose the granting of additional television licences if, as and when applicants are able to overcome the technical and other difficulties of providing additional television service and when these applications, if any, come forward to the licensing authority for the necessary permission.

We have been fully conscious, throughout our history, of the duty which we have to the people of our area to provide an impartial and responsible communications service in both the newspaper and broadcasting fields. Our broadcasting stations are operated independently of each other and of the newspaper. Each unit is competitive with each other in terms of news advertising and sales and our policies in these fields are applied strictly without discrimination or favour of any kind.

In both radio and television, our stations have from the beginning been affiliated with the CBC networks and it has been part of our work to ensure the availability of the CBC national programming service to listeners and viewers in London and Southwestern Ontario.

I have set forth my views about press councils at some length in the brief—Chapter D, pages 59 to 63, paragraphs 224 to 228, inclusive. I have favoured the formation of an Ontario Press Council for some time.

I believe that governments should have nothing to do with press councils, if and when formed. I believe that a newspaper's participation in a press council should be voluntary.

I believe that a regional or provincial press council would be better than the community press council suggested by Mr. Mark Farre of the Windsor Star, but that community councils would be better than nothing at all.

I do not see any advantage to the public or the press in the formation of a series of councils, community, regional, provincial and possibly, national, each with an appeal to the higher council(s), if any, in a manner similar to our courts. And I speak of this because there was an indication one of the senators had a view that this was what we meant when we were talking about multiplicity of more than one press council, and this is not the case, in my opinion.

This would be confusing to the public and unnecessarily time-consuming to all concerned. This would be confusing to the public if there was more than one applicable to any one newspaper.

One level of council, preferably, however above the community level, would do the job in my opinion. If a start must be made at community or regional level, these councils in my view, should disband if a council at provincial level should be formed.

All of this development should occur within a province, in my opinion (unless any council in the maritime and prairie provinces should wish to join forces), until a national press council, an unlikely possibility, is formed.

A press council should serve three primary and equal purposes. First, to act as a "court of appeal" to a citizen, a group of citizens, an organization, a company, etc., who consider himself or itself aggrieved by a newspaper and, having tried, has not received satisfaction from the newspaper's editor or publisher.

Second, to interpret newspapers, their role in the community, their responsibilities (and the responsibilities which they should not be expected to assume) to the public, and to express and interpret public views about newspapers to the newspapers.

Third, to play an active part in maintaining and preserving the free flow of information which is basic to what we have come to call freedom of the press and a citizen's right to know. In this latter role, the press council, more often than not, would be representing the participating newspapers.

So on our interpretation, the press council is a two-way street, as it were, serving the public and the newspapers and interpreting one to the other and supporting the newspapers when necessary in the event that the freedom of the press should be threatened in any way.

One of your guideline questions asked my opinion about the effect of prevailing economic forces on "the present degree of concentration of ownership." I made some general comment in the brief on page 55, paragraphs 207 to 211, inclusive.

I would like to take a few minutes to elaborate on these comments.

It is my view that one of the main obstacles in the way of continued local or family ownership of individual newspapers, or for that matter any family-owned business, lies in the tax field. I believe that one of the main reasons for the sale of such businesses is to provide the owners with the necessary liquidity so that estate taxes on death can be paid.

In some cases the business will be sold well in advance of the death of the owner, but these sales often simply represent a reasonable attempt by a prudent businessman to prepare for the eventual liability for death taxes. This factor may not be the only one involved in such sales but I would suggest that it is probably the one which tipped the scales heavily in favour of a sale.

This is particularly true since the Estate Tax changes adopted in 1968 which impose tax at 50 per cent of the value of an estate passing to the next generation in excess of $50,000.

It would be easy for me to suggest to you that the way to assist in continued individual ownership of newspapers would be to exclude the ownership of shares of such companies from estate tax; and as an alternative I could suggest that liability for estate tax on ownership of individual papers should be recognized but that a deferral of payment of such tax be granted until a sale of the shares takes place. Interest might or might not be payable on the deferred tax during the period of deferral.

These suggestions, if implemented, would be powerful incentives to encourage continued individual or family ownership of newspapers.

I do not wish, however, to suggest an exemption from estate tax for newspaper shares because this would be singling the industry out for special and favourable estate tax treatment.

I suggest, therefore, certain special concessions which would be consistent, for example, with the special concessions which the present Income Tax Act grants to the extractive industries.

My suggestions are as follows:

(1) A special method should be authorized under the Estate Tax Act for the valuation of the shares of a company the principal business of which is the ownership of an individual newspaper.

The same method of valuation could be used in the case of a proprietor or partner of an individual paper.

(2) A special tax should be imposed on the subsequent sale of shares or proprietorship or partnership interest to persons or companies other than the family if the special method of valuation under (1) had been applied.

I would like to deal with these suggestions in more detail. In the case of the first point the special method of valuation involved would be based upon a special value for tax purposes of the assets of the company which would not take into account any values derived from goodwill or from other factors which are properly taken into account if valuation is being determined on a "fair market value" basis.

As an example of the basis to be used for determining the tax value of the assets, fixed assets such as buildings or equipment would be valued at undepreciated capital cost rather than at their present of "fair market value." This is a concept which appears to have been brought forward in the White Paper in connection with the valuation of closely-held companies for capital gains tax purposes so that this suggestion should not entail additional administrative problems for the Department of National Revenue, if the White Paper is implemented in this respect.

The same method of valuation would be used whether the newspaper was an incorporated or unincorporated business.

The special method of valuation could be on an election basis so that if a particular estate did not wish to apply the provisions it would not be required to do so. In my opinion, the use of such a basis of valuation would go a long way to ease the estate tax burden on the death of the owner or owners of a family-owned business such as an individual newspaper.

Tax would be paid on the working assets of the business valued on a tax basis and this would appear to be reasonable in the particular circumstances, in order to achieve the objective of carrying the newspaper on within the family ownership.

One of the problems which has been encountered in the past in settling the value of an individual newspaper with the estate tax officials has been that the officials have tended to base their values on the actual sale price of the shares of individual papers sold to the chains. These sale prices are frequently considerably in excess of book value, so that one must conclude that a generous allowance has been made for goodwill.

This may well be reasonable in the case of such a sale as the potential earning power the newspaper based on chain methods of operation could produce a capitalized earnings value well above book value. However, it seems unfair to force the estate of an owner of a family-owned business, such as an individual newspaper, to pay estate tax on this basis as the profits of such a newspaper may well not compare favourably with those of a chain operation and in any case the estate generally has no method of realizing tangible value for the implied goodwill without selling at least a portion of the business.

The option to use such a special method of valuation for family-owned newspapers would provide some newspaper owners with an advantage not available to taxpayers in Canada generally. As an offset, therefore, I would propose as point 2 that if the heirs subsequently sell a newspaper or the shares of a company which owns such a newspaper that a special tax be applicable. The tax would apply to the excess of the selling price over the tax value of the individual assets.

Thus the special tax would apply to the goodwill which would have escaped the estate tax under my first point. The special tax could be levied at progressively lower rates over a 20-year period.

Since families can run out of family and other factors other than estate tax can dictate the sale of family newspapers, this special method of valuation and recapture of tax system could and should be developed to permit the sale of a newspaper by one individual newspaper owner or family ownership to another individual owner or family ownership on the condition that the new owner or owners would carry the newspaper on as an individual or family enterprise.

My suggestions are therefore that special estate tax exemptions should not be granted to the estate of owners of family businesses such as individual newspapers. Rather, a method of taxation should be adopted which would be tailored to the needs and objectives of government policy representing the public interest, which, in my opinion, should be to strengthen the incentives for individual or family ownership of newspapers.

There are other examples of special methods of taxation adopted to meet the needs of a specific industry. In the case of the extractive industry special incentives in the form of depletion and accelerated write-offs are granted. Indeed S12A of the Income Tax Act of Canada is an example of the adoption of special provisions in a taxing statute to carry out government policy for the newspaper and periodical industries.

I have not dealt with the White Paper proposals for changes in the taxation system. Certain of these proposals if implemented will bear heavily on the news media industry. The problems encountered, however, will not be peculiar to the news media industry and accordingly I do not feel that I should burden the Committee with my views in this regard. It is the estate tax problem which is the villain in the continuing ownership of individual newspapers and accordingly every emphasis must be made in this area.

Succession duties in a province such as Ontario are also a problem but it is my understanding that the Province of Ontario intends to vacate this field in the next few years. Accordingly, over the long haul these taxes may not be a problem to residents of Ontario.

The London Free Press and CFPL Broadcasting are proud of the quality of the respective staffs (as am I) and of the fact that many of our staff members have been chosen from time to time by election and selection to serve the newspaper and broadcasting industries in various capacities. We are pleased that we can afford to allow them to provide this service to the industries.

To save time, I will not read the details of these services which are in my opening statement, but will appreciate it, Mr. Chairman, you will order them included in the record.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Blackburn: Our newspaper Managing Editor, Mr. Ivor Williams, has already appeared before you in his capacity as President, Canadian Managing Editors Association. Mr. Charles Fenn, our newspaper Marketing Manager, is serving as chairman of the Ethnic Committee of the International Newspaper Advertising Executives Association.

Mr. Morley Hutchison, our Circulation Manager, is a past president of the Canadian Circulation Managers Association. Mr. Robert Turnbull, our newspaper Production Manager, is a member of the Production Management Committee of the American Newspaper Publishers Association.

Our Editorial Page Editor, Mr. T. W. Haney, was a founder and president for five years of the Press Institute of Canada and was chairman of the Newspaper Critique session of the National Conference of Editorial Writers. Mr. James O'Neill, our City Editor, is president of the Press Institute of Canada.

In broadcasting, Mr. Murray Brown has served as President, Canadian Association of Broadcasters and of the Central Canada Broadcasters Association. He has served on several committees established by CBC affiliates, for the purpose of working out programming and business matters with the CBC. Mr. W. C. Wingrove, Manager, CFPL-TV, is a member of the CBC-TV Network Advisory Committee and chairman of the CBC-TV Network Rate Committee.

Mr. C. N. Knight, Manager, CFPL Radio, was a lecturer at the Ryerson Institute of Technology and was Vice-chairman of the BC English radio CBC affiliates Committee.

Mr. G. A. J. Robitaille is chairman, Videotape Recording Committee, Canadian Standards Association, a member of the American National Standards Committee (Videotape) and holds other industry positions.

Mr. J. A. Plant, Program Director, CFPL-TV, is supervising television producer, Continuing Medical Education, the University of Western Ontario, a member London Council for Adult Education, Television Study Committee. Last year Mr. Plant was consultant, Ontario Medical Association, Committee on Educational Television.

Mr. Hugh Bremner, Editor, CFPL Radio, was one of the founders of the Radio-Television News Directors Association of Canada and served on its board of directors for several years. He lectured in Radio Journalism for several years at the University of Western Ontario.

Mr. Roy Jewell, Farm Director, CFPL Radio, is Canadian Vice-President, National Association of Farm Broadcasters, a director of Quality Swine of Western Ontario and past president, West Elgin Agricultural Society.

Mr. Ron Laidlaw, News Director, CFPL-TV, is Editor of the Newsletter of the Radio-Television News Directors Association of Canada, represents the Canadian Association of Broadcasters on the Film Standards Committee of the Canadian Standards Association, is a past chairman of the Radio-Television News Directors Association of Canada and a director of the RTNDA Foundation, which has the objective of providing endowed scholarships in broadcasting news education.

This completes my statement. My team and I are ready for your questions.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Blackburn. I would simply point out to the senators that we are dealing this morning really with two presentations. One is the corporate presentation referred to by Mr. Blackburn, and then, secondly, the presentation of The London Free Press. This is not a presentation either from CFPL Radio or CFPL Television. I would suggest that questions about CFPL Radio and CFPL Television should relate primarily to the corporate relationship they have to this entire structure. CFPL, for example, will be returning to these hearings later on when we come to deal with broadcasting outlets.

Aside from that I would only say, Mr. Blackburn, if there are any of the questions which you or your colleagues feel are of a confidential nature and you would prefer to answer privately, by all means please do so.

Mr. Blackburn: Thank you.

The Chairman: Having said that, I think that this morning we will begin with Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, is it the intention of Mr. Carradine also to give his opening statement at this time so we can deal with the two statements?

The Chairman: Mr. Carradine has an opening statement as well. Mr. Blackburn, would you like Mr. Carradine to make his statement now?

Mr. Blackburn: We are in your hands, Mr. Chairman. It was our view it would be less confusing for you if we were to deal with my opening statement first and then after your questions are completed on my statement and my brief, that Mr. Carradine would then take over and present the newspaper portion of the presentation.

The Chairman: What is the wish of the Committee in this regard?

Senator McElman: I would suggest from my own viewpoint it would be more confusing if we waited and then went back through the whole ball of wax again. The two are closely allied.

The Chairman: You would prefer Mr. Carradine's statement now?

Senator McElman: I would.

The Chairman: Is that the feeling of the Committee?

That would appear to be the wish. If Mr. Blackburn has no objection, it might be a sensible procedure.

Mr. Blackburn: I have no objection, if that is your wish, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Mr. Carradine is the vice-president and general manager of The London Free Press.

Mr. William Carradine, Vice-President and General Manager, The London Free Press: Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, ladies and gentlemen: I believe first of all I would like to introduce the people who are appearing here today for The London Free Press.

You have already met Mr. Blackburn and Mr. Lanning, and on my right is Mr. Williams, the managing editor. Beside him is Mr. Haney, editorial page editor. Beside him, Mr. Heine, the editor, and then Mr. Turnbull, our production manager; and Mr. Fenn, our marketing manager.

First of all, I would also like to say I have no intention of answering all of your questions today. These gentlemen whom I have just introduced have more combined years of newspaper experience than I shall ever hope to see on this good earth. I have absolute confidence in them. They are completely competent to answer any questions which I believe you may wish to pose to them in their respective areas of responsibility, so I would ask you to feel free to question them directly on any subject.

We are pleased today to tell our story before this Senate Committee. We believe The London Free Press is providing a high-quality news service to people in London and South-western Ontario and we believe our credibility and acceptability are high in the area we serve.

We hold no sympathy for the view-point that what the mass media in this country are doing is their own business and that they should be left alone and not bothered by this committee.

We believe that the people of Canada, the mass media, and all levels of government have a common interest in strengthening and expanding communications amongst themselves and we therefore support any efforts to evaluate and to try to improve general knowledge of the role and function of the mass media in Canada.

You have asked us to comment on freedom of the press and the function and role of a newspaper in the community. We have discussed both these points at great length in our written brief, but we would like to comment further on them in these introductory remarks, because we believe they are vital to a proper understanding of the impact and influence of a newspaper on the Canadian public.

We believe that freedom of the press must be protected and encouraged because it deals with a vital part of the public's business—the right to know. Freedom of the press in Canada assures for each citizen his right to information and opinions which will permit him to be properly informed on national and international events, and which will make him capable of passing judgment on the affairs of state which surround him.

On this continent there are a great many cities similar to London, Ontario, which are served by only one newspaper. It is perhaps worth examining for a moment why the number of competitive newspaper situations has diminished during the last generation.

Newspaper readers demand a great deal more of their paper than their parents or their grandparents would have demanded fifty or even twenty-five years ago. They have come to regard instant news from the four corners of the world, and even from overseas, as very ordinary and commonplace.

Further, they would probably be disappointed if the initial news dispatches were not followed by a substantial quantity of well-informed comment and interpretation to what is likely to happen next.

The net result of this is that the complete daily newspaper of today must be backed up by substantial resources. It must operate from a strong economic base and this in turn means that the essential base will be destroyed if the available market is fragmented.

One of the largest cities in the world, New York, today supports only three daily newspapers, which means one paper for every three million inhabitants. To the best of our knowledge, nowhere on this continent in more than forty years has anybody successfully launched a competitive newspaper in a large metropolitan area. It is our conclusion that the chances of doing this successfully become poorer, not better, as the years go by.

A strong ethic of responsibility has come to be accepted by editors and publishers of newspapers in single newspaper cities such as London. At The London Free Press we have developed a self-discipline to ensure that this responsibility is adequately carried out.

Since we are involved to an extent in dispensing criticism of others, we have learned to welcome, consider and publish criticism of our own performance and we are constantly re-examining our role and our effectiveness in the light of changing circumstances.

Perhaps most difficult of all, we have learned we must carry out this program without ever falling into the easy trap of seeking popularity for its own sake. We do not try to avoid criticism by never giving offence to anyone. We have recognized long ago that we must not abandon our essential role of watchdog, helping to safeguard the liberties of the individual by exposing abuses, by the police, by business, by governments, and by the omnipresent arms of executive authority. A responsible press must never be equated with bland, unenterprising, fence-sitting press.

Regarding the role of a newspaper in a community—which is one of the questions you have asked—such as London, there is no doubt in our minds that newspapers have a great deal to do, probably more than any other one medium of communication, with the process of forming and moulding public opinion.

However, it should be clearly recognized that in a free society operating on democratic principles, the real role of a newspaper is not to try to mould public opinion according to the desires of the newspaper publisher or editor and it is not to try to manipulate the feelings of the public, nor to try to mastermind the way in which the public votes.

The function of a newspaper, rather, is to see that the public gets all the essential facts, and to do what it can to ensure, firstly, that the public is informed and, secondly, that the public is encouraged to discuss matters of public importance. The prime purpose of newspaper editorial opinion, we believe, is to stimulate discussion.

Like many other newspapers in Canada, we at The London Free Press believe we have a sense of mission—and I say that in not a trite sense—but we do not envisage that mission as using whatever influence this newspaper has to re-shape the community or the country to suit our own preferences.

Our mission is to generate public discussion, because, we believe that if a free people of goodwill, given all the facts, discuss a subject long enough, they will eventually come up with something very close to the correct answer.

The answer might not necessarily be the one which the newspaper would like to see them come up with, but that does not mean that it is an incorrect answer.

If a newspaper is dedicated to the philosophy I have just outlined, as we are at The London Free Press, then we see our function to be, firstly, to present the facts with all the objectivity possible within the limits of human fallibility, and, secondly, to comment upon events, by way of stimulating discussion rather than by way of telling people what they ought to think.

It follows from this that the primary duty of the press is to the facts. It is under an inescapable obligation to get its facts as straight as it possibly can, and to keep its reporting of the facts devoid of personal bias. With the best of intentions, this is not easy.

Every single news report which appears in every single newspaper in the world is a subjective exercise, influenced by the personality of the reporter, of the editors who handle the copy, and of the senior editor to whom they are responsible.

If there are two hundred news stories in an average paper on an average day, this means that two hundred reporters in all parts of the world exercised personal judgment about the facts they would put in and the facts that they would leave out; that a group of editors exercised two hundred personal decisions when handling the copy, perhaps when making the story shorter than it was in the original, and two hundred more personal judgments were made in selecting the particular fact which was to be covered by the headline and in selecting the words to be used in the headline. Under these circumstances, it really is not too surprising that errors of judgment sometimes occur, even in the best of newspapers.

You have also indicated an interest in how we ensure that conflicting opinions and information on which dissent may be based are made available to our readers.

The editors and reporters of The London Free Press accept as a responsibility the requirement that events and views of interests and all shades of known opinion are impartially reported in our newspaper. New ideas are solicited and given prominence in our news columns.

At our newspaper we recognize the right of reply and we have a standing rule that anyone who is accused or criticized in a controversial situation be given the opportunity to comment before publication. This newspaper actively seeks and reports dissenting points of view and the responsibility to do this is taken seriously by this newspaper, its senior officers and its staff.

Readers are encouraged to express their views as letters to the editor, and opinions contrary to editorial positions taken by The London Free Press are sought actively from individuals known to have such views. All letters to the editor critical of The London Free Press, of its accuracy, objectivity or opinion, are displayed prominently on the editorial page. All letters to the editor are published by The London Free Press subject only to the usual rules of libel and slander, etc.

Because it is the only daily newspaper published in London, The London Free Press has a responsibility to be a forum for dissent and conflicting opinions wherever these might exist in the community. We accept and we believe we carry out effectively and properly that responsibility.

The London Free Press has had a long history of responsible and effective service to its community of readers. Our hope is to continue to merit the support of our subscribers so that we may maintain uninterrupted that history.

At this time we welcome any questions which any member of this Committee may have.

The Chairman: Thank you. I appreciate the co-operation of Mr. Carradine and Mr. Blackburn in dealing with both of these opening statements as requested by Senator McElman.

Now, I think we can proceed with the questioning, and I would suggest that we might proceed with questioning Mr. Blackburn, and then, following that, go to the Free Press. It may be as we proceed that there will be questions you wish to have Mr. Carradine or some of the others answer, and by all means do so.

Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: May I have your indulgence first for two quick questions to Mr. Carradine?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator McElman: And then move to Mr. Blackburn.

You referred to the two hundred stories and the two hundred reporters and so on and the personal judgments and personal decisions that ought to be made in the course of a day's publication.

Do you have a test computer which can in fact edit the news stories to the bare, hard fact and take out the over-burden?

Mr. Carradine: Do we have a computer, senator?

Senator McElman: Do you have such a computer on test or do you know of such type of computer?

Mr. Carradine: The American Newspaper Publishers Association Research Institute has developed a program which is called ANPA. It is a program whereby a news story can be fed into a computer and be fed in a variety of controls or suggestions to the computer. The computer will then shorten the story to the particular length which you may desire.

We do not have this program. We are not currently testing it. It is available, I might add.

Senator McElman: Would you consider—

Mr. Blackburn: I might add, Senator McElman, that the program will shorten the story but it doesn't appear to edit it at present in the sense that you consider editing to be.

Senator McElman: Then you do not consider this development a real danger to personal involvement or human involvement at the current time?

Mr. Carradine: No, sir.

Mr. Blackburn: May I correct one piece of information? We have a copy of this program in The London Free Press. We are not using it.

Mr. Carradine: I believe Senator McElman's question was, are we using it; was it not Senator McElman: Yes, that is correct.

At page 3, Section 10, Mr. Carradine, you say:

"We have recognized long ago that we must not abandon our essential role of watchdog, helping to safeguard the liberties of the individual by exposing abuses, by the police, by business, by governments, and by the omnipresent arms of executive authority."

Would you add to that "media"?

Mr. Carradine: Yes, I certainly would.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

Mr. Blackburn, you have attended these committee hearings, I believe, from the outset?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator McElman: I have seen you about quite a bit. You have heard the discussion and the views and opinions concerning most of the important aspects of mass media communications in this nation, as have the members of the Committee.

In my opinion, you and your associates have presented an excellent brief in these matters which you have covered. It contains a tremendous volume of useful statistical data, clear views and opinions, but all of this indicates a tremendous amount of research and a corporate capability to assess things as they really exist.

You, like others, have dealt with those things which you expect of the state to help preserve, the independence and freedom of the press, but you have dealt in far less detail and depth with those things that the state might properly expect of the media owners towards the same end.

Now, with your knowledge, capability and experience in this field and your knowledge of the testimony taken thus far, I would like to get straight away down to the nitty-gritty of what this inquiry is all about, if I may, and I suggest it is ownership and control, concentration and monopoly. In the field of mass communications these spell power; raw, naked, unadulterated power. It may be used either for the immense benefit of a nation and the people or to their detriment.

The power potential—and I stress the word "potential"...

The Chairman: May I remind the senator he is asking a question and not making a speech.

Senator McElman: I am laying the groundwork.

The Chairman: I appreciate that.

Senator McElman: The principal point at issue is, to what extent should the people through the second state, the collective parliament, permit this potential and great power to become concentrated in the hands of a few people or a few corporations?

Now, I come to what I would hope you would do for us. I believe it would be of very real assistance to this Committee to have from you, your clearly-stated and frank opinion as to the extent to which such concentration of ownership and control should be permitted in the public interest; and whether any concentrations have already reached or passed acceptable limits in the areas of ownership or control of one segment of the media, such as the newspapers, multi-media ownership, national, regional, provincial, or local, or media ownership by conglomerates, whose other major interests are in conflict with responsible media management and who truly constitute a threat to the freedom of the press.

The Chairman: Would you like him to repeat the question, Mr. Blackburn?

Mr. Blackburn: I think I need some assistance, Mr. Chairman, as we go through. There is quite a bit of ground to be covered. I think I should say at the outset, Senator McElman, that in throwing the ball to you, to a degree Government must make up its mind what it intends to do with respect to making it possible for newspapers still under individual ownership to remain under individual ownership.

The policies of the Government up to the present time—those referred to in my opening remarks—the Estate Tax policies—have mitigated against this possibility, and in fact have been, in my judgment, the prime reason for the sale of individually-owned newspapers to the chains or to the conglomerates, as the case may be; so the first ingredient necessary to the solution of this problem is a determination of government policy, so that the ball is really in your hands; not mine.

The raw, naked, unadulterated power about which you speak, I can frankly scarcely agree with that. I would go back to Douglas Fisher in one statement he made when he was appearing before you; that the sense of fairness of the public is a nerve-end very near the surface, and it is my opinion if the power to which you are referring were used in the manner suggested, or inferred by you, that the public would not put up with it. I find in our area at any rate no such feeling on the part of the public.

However, I believe that there are other points of view with respect to other areas.

I think that it is ideal to have newspapers owned by individual proprietors and companies, based on local ownership within the community in which they are established. This was the case in the good old days, as it were. This is not the case now for reasons which I have previously drawn to your attention.

With respect to the ownership by chains, in my observation of chain operation in Canada newspapers for the most part do not suffer as a result of being involved in chain ownership and in fact benefits can be derived by an individual newspaper through its relationship with the chain, in possibly better management, in the help which a chain can provide in budgeting, budgetary control and other management tools, and in the future possibility with respect to the provision of a computer service which any small individual paper cannot afford, and such services of that kind.

With respect to conglomerates I would like to say that The London Free Press has no equity interest in any other companies than those of our own media. We have investments which are in bonds but we hold no equity shares in any other company, so we are not a conglomerate, even a small one.

I personally do not favour ownership of newspapers by conglomerates. I think that even if the interests of the conglomerates were declared publicly, that it is possible that its non-media interests could have some effect on the operation of the newspaper and my personal preference is for non-ownership of newspapers by conglomerates.

I see no objection to chain ownership of newspapers by chains who are not conglomerates.

Multi-media—am I correct in understanding that by "multi-media" you mean a situation such as in London where a newspaper and broadcasting stations are owned jointly?

Senator McElman: And cable television.

Mr. Blackburn: I suppose I am biased in this matter, but I find that I cannot see any basic objection to such multi-media ownership, and particularly in the case of London where there are competing media in the same fields. In television there is a competing television station in Kitchener. Of course, the cable systems bring in many American stations which compete with us for audience, and one of the great competitive factors in the multi-media or among media is for the time and attention of audiences and the audiences are the same people. They do not change particularly. So with respect to the radio in London, as I pointed out, there are three other radio stations, two in the community itself and one in St. Thomas. There are other stations coming into the London area.

With respect to the newspaper in the morning field there is a great deal of competition as I pointed out in my brief. In the evening field there is minimal competition in the newspapers but always present in my opinion—and the members of my staff have heard me say this many times—is the phantom newspaper which can and will be developed in a community such as London, at any rate, if the proprietor and publisher of a newspaper does not do a job. The phantom newspaper is always there.

Senator Everett: Would you enlarge on that?

Mr. Blackburn: The phantom newspaper is the newspaper which somebody with the desire, with the finances, is prepared to start if a vacuum develops which needs to be filled in a market vacuum.

Senator Everett: Mr. Carradine made a remark in his report that this has not happened in forty years in a major community.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: Would that vary your thinking at all, Mr. Blackburn?

Mr. Blackburn: No. The phantom newspaper is there.

Senator McElman: Are there any instances where it has occurred in Canada in recent times?

Mr. Blackburn: In terms of weeklies developing into dailies...

Mr. Carradine: Wallaceburg.

Mr. Blackburn: Well, that was not a competitive situation. Weeklies are developing from time to time into dailies, or five days a week, or three days a week in market areas.

which are also covered by newspapers, and the normal way for a daily to develop is through the development of a weekly initially, and into a daily.

I cannot recall any instances offhand; I am sorry.

Senator McElman: Well, Mr. Blackburn, you have dealt with what your view is with respect to conglomerates in the media field, and you have told us what your own situation is indeed for you in London, but, with respect, you have skirted around my question. What I asked about was your opinion...

Mr. Blackburn: Not intentionally.

Senator McElman: ...your view as to what would be acceptable limits, and when I say "acceptable" I mean from the standpoint of public interest, Canadian interest—what would be acceptable limits for concentration of one of the media (newspapers), and what is acceptable limits for multi-media ownership; national, regional, provincial, or local?

Mr. Blackburn: In each case you are referring to newspapers?

Senator McElman: You deal with it as you wish.

The Chairman: There are two questions. Why don't we take them one at a time? The first question, as I understand it, is, what would be acceptable limits of concentration in newspapers?

Senator McElman: May I say, sir, I am not trying to embarrass you?

Mr. Blackburn: No, I am sure you are not.

Senator McElman: I have great respect for the London Free Press. I think it does a very fine job. Your name is one of the most respected in journalism and publishing in the nation.

I believe that if you can give us a view on the limits that it will be very useful. You are respected not only by the public but by your confreres in the industry. I think your view would carry weight.

Now, obviously concentration to the degree of one or two controlling all dailies in Canada is not desirable, so what are the limits?

Mr. Carradine: If I might suggest, I think you are asking a hypothetical question which is impossible to answer. You give us a practical situation and we will say, "Yes, we think that is acceptable" or "No, that is not acceptable."

Is it acceptable that one chain owns all the newspapers in Canada? Is it acceptable that four chains own all the newspapers in Canada? Is it acceptable that we own all the newspapers in Western Ontario?

I think these are practical questions, but when you ask it on a hypothetical basis...

The Chairman: I don't think, Mr. Carradine, that it is hypothetical. I don't think you are being quite fair to Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Mr. Carradine and Mr. Chairman, with respect, I would like to have Mr. Blackburn, within his vast experience, give us an answer.

Mr. Blackburn: I think first we will talk about the individual community and the service area of a newspaper. I see no harm whatsoever in the public interest if one owner publishes in both the morning and evening fields. By its nature and the difficulty and the time taken to transport newspapers from its centre of publication to the surrounding area, such as in the case of our morning newspaper, you have to publish it in the morning in order to serve the public that same day.

With respect to an evening newspaper, an evening newspaper tends in Canada to be distributed only within its community of publication and to a minor degree in the area surrounding that.

For the most part this is the case, so a morning and evening publication can, if the community can support it, provide better service to the community and surrounding area than one paper, either in the morning-only or evening-only field; and that is the manner in which the London Free Press developed, and there are other newspapers in Canada with a similar set-up.

I would not consider it to be in the public interest if the same owner owned a second newspaper in the same community or area in either the morning or evening field. It would be better in the public interest that there should be competition if the community can in fact support it.

Does that answer your question on the local basis?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Blackburn: One thing I intended to mention earlier was with respect to cable television vis-a-vis what I call the traditional system of television broadcasting; namely, sending Hertzian waves out through the air. It is the policy of the CRTC, which was established in the John Bassett case in Toronto, not to permit a television broadcaster which has a station in the community also to own an interest in a cable system.

Senator McElman: There was a second case of that in Saint John, New Brunswick, as well.

Mr. Blackburn: With respect to the ownership of newspapers in communities which are not related one to another geographically, I see no harm in the public interest and in fact there could be some benefit in the ownership of this newspapers by one owner. These are called chains. I think, however, it is better to have three chains, as we have in Canada, than one.

Whether I could say that four would be better than three, frankly that is a matter of judgment. Possibly four would be better than three if you do not get to the point where you had so many chains, if this were possible, that the benefit of chain ownership would be lost.

I think it would be undesirable to have one newspaper chain in Canada. It is better to have two and better again to have three. I frankly do not know just what to say as the ideal. We have three now and the service seems to be reasonably good in most respects.

Insofar as the number of newspapers which any one chain might desirably own in aggregate, to a degree in Canada at the moment, it would depend on your decision with respect to how many chains you might wish to see in operation.

Within the limits, which I stated earlier, I do not think there should be single ownership or chain ownership of more than one newspaper in any one market area or community. I cannot see any need for any limitation on the number of newspapers which any one chain might own in the nation in non-geographically-associated communities, provided we do not get down to one chain.

I would prefer not to get down to even two, although we have only two chains in broadcasting at the moment, one of which is the CBC, and the services to the public in broadcasting provided by the two chains is reasonably competitive and reasonably good.

Senator McElman: Is CTV a chain or an affiliation?

Mr. Blackburn: It was an affiliation but there is a possibility, I understand now, that one—I am sorry; you are right. It is basically an affiliation, but it is possible for more than one station affiliated with the CTV to be owned by one owner. It was not possible before.

Am I correct in that?

Mr. Murray Brown, President and General Manager, CFPL Broadcasting Limited: Well, there are a lot of types of chain ownership other than broadcasting stations.

Mr. Blackburn: CTV is not a chain.

Mr. Brown: No; it is really a mutually owned network. The affiliate stations own shares of the CTV network but there are other types of chain ownership of broadcasting stations. They are not network, but they are group ownerships in this country, several of which I am sure Senator Davey and the Committee is familiar.

Senator Prowse: It provides services on a co-operative basis for the participating stations; is that it?

Mr. Brown: That is correct.

Mr. Blackburn: With respect to conglomerates, Senator McElman, I think I have stated my view. I do not think it is in the public interest. I think it is better in the public interest that the media ownership or comparison or overall corporation, the chain corporation as the case may be, which is involved in the operation of media not be involved in other operations. I hope I have answered your question. I am not endeavouring in any way to avoid answering it.

Senator McElman: Well, I might say, since you have gone much further than many others have gone.

The Chairman: Are you leaving this point Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: No, not entirely.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: The society that we now enjoy and have for some time operates largely on the foundation of competition in the marketplace, and we have in fact legislation to try to enforce and maintain competition and I have heard a few expressions quite a bit of late that in the field of media ownership and control the marketplace is not operating effectively. It is concentrated, and in this regard we had as a witness Mr. Henry, the Director of the Combines...

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, I heard him yesterday.

Senator McElman: And there are a couple of passages here I would like to quote, if I may. They are very short.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: I would perhaps ask your opinion on them as to whether they indicate that we are moving in a bad direction with respect to media. The first quote is on page 4.

Mr. Blackburn: Which of his two statements, sir?

Senator McElman: This is the longer of the two, the brief itself, about halfway down the page. He says:

"It is also true to say that another important objective of competition policy, although it is not one that has been emphasized in Canada, has been the diffusion of economic power whereby it is sought to avoid concentration of too much power in too few hands."

He goes on:

"...in relation to the field of communications where concentration of power has not only very important economic consequences but even more important social consequences."

Then on page 15 he expresses the view:

"...that the problems of competition, concentration and monopoly are of very great relevance to the entire communications industry. Because the media of communications are, in effect, the nervous system of society, there is no field in which excessive concentration or anti-competitive practices can be of greater concern to society."

Now, before I take the next one, which is at page 6, there seems to be a feeling with the media that there are some stone tablets going to come down from the Mount through this Committee. I do not think we have access to the source of solutions, but there is some handwriting on the wall in this next quotation that I have:

"The industry, therefore, which seeks to achieve monopoly power and to preserve it, may in the long run become a candidate for state regulation."

Now, with the trend towards gobbling up all the independents by the chains, do you foresee any danger to the media industry in the light of these comments?

Mr. Blackburn: I think if, Senator McElman, a situation were to develop which we spoke about earlier, where one chain owned all of the newspapers in Canada, I should think that would certainly be an invitation of necessity to the state to intervene. I would agree. So I feel we have rather covered that situation.

The Chairman: Mr. Blackburn, may I just ask you one question on Senator McElman's point? What would be wrong with one chain owning all the newspapers in Canada?

Mr. Blackburn: There is not necessarily anything wrong insofar as the operations are concerned, depending on who the chain operator happened to be, and what policies were followed, but I do not think it would be possible to prove to the public that this was not an undesirable thing, so I think the public would move in, whether it was desirable or not. I think we have to expect that.

Senator McElman: By the "public" do you mean the "public" or the "state," or "Parliament"?

Mr. Blackburn: I think the state representing the public, or possibly on the demand of the public, public opinion.

Senator McElman: Then, short of one chain owning all, do you see any point where the state might feel obligated in the public interest to move in? The very thing that is feared and properly, I say, state intervention, the very thing that is feared by the industry—do you see any point short of total ownership for this kind of thing to happen?

Mr. Blackburn: It would be my opinion that the state would intervene before that point, and it would be my view that it would not be desirable to have fewer than three chains in the country, as I have inferred before, and possibly better to have four, but again this is a matter of opinion.

It is a very difficult opinion to get at definitively. I think that we need more than one chain, and certainly ideally more than two. I would not suggest that the state should be concerned about the present situation as it now exists.

Senator McElman: The reason, Mr. Chairman, I am following so hard on this line of questioning, if I may explain, is that there are so many people now not just believing but commenting that the situation in the United States has already reached the point... I spoke of the potential of power. There is a strong body of opinion that believes it has been displayed in very recent times that on occasion the power of the media might equate or even surpass the power of government.

Mr. Blackburn: I don't believe that.

Senator McElman: I cannot prove that.

Mr. Blackburn: I do not believe that.

Senator McElman: I am saying this is a growing body of opinion. I share their concern about it and that is why I am pursuing it so strongly.

Mr. Blackburn: It is not possible, in my opinion, Senator McElman, for the power of the media to exceed that of government. It just is not possible because modern government has the power to intercede, if it chooses.

Senator McElman: The power of pressure, of lobby?

Mr. Blackburn: Well, relative power is always in terms of relative power. The supreme power is always, in our democratic society, bound to be in the hands of the people through government.

The Chairman: Pursuant to Senator McElman's point—unless you are going to ask about the Failing Newspapers Act...?

Senator McElman: No; you go ahead.

The Chairman: Are you familiar with the Failing Newspapers Act in the United States?

Mr. Blackburn: No, I am not.

The Chairman: You are not at all?

Mr. Blackburn: No.

The Chairman: Because I think that might have been what Senator McElman was referring to.

Senator McElman: Would you refer to it because you are more familiar with it than I am?

The Chairman: There is great pressure, as I understand it, in the United States to specifically exempt newspapers from combine legislation, and the American media industry is able to bring enormous pressure on the United States Senate in this connection.

I hope we may hear more about this in the course of our hearings. However, if you are not familiar with it, then we cannot talk about it.

Senator McElman: May I correct you? You said "is able." Is it not "has already done"?

The Chairman: Yes. In view of the fact Mr. Blackburn is not familiar with the legislation and what is happening, I did not want to go any further.

Mr. Blackburn: Insofar as I am concerned in principle I have suggested in my written statement as a newspaperman it is not in the interests of the public or in the interests of the newspapers to have any special laws that are applicable to newspapers only, and newspapermen generally do not want this. Insofar as they might confer some special consideration on newspapers, newspapermen know that a special favour conferred can be withdrawn by government, and they just do not wish to have them or to put themselves in the position of having them withdrawn for political reasons, or some other reasons, so we do not want special favours from government normally.

Now, a certain newspaper—I know you are considering the possibility of assisting certain newspapers to continue to publish. In these individual cases I think one would have to judge them on their own merits and it might well be better for the Government to provide some assistance to the newspaper rather than let it fail.

In the case of postal rates, I would consider any assistance provided in this manner, which might assist the newspaper to remain in publication, is not really assistance to the newspaper but rather to its readers, who might otherwise be denied the privilege of receiving the newspaper at a price they can afford; and if you would like to get into the postal rates—

Senator McElman: I think we will get into that a little later, sir.

The Chairman: May I interrupt you just for one second? I have a note from one of the senators, gentlemen, asking if, while the questioning was going on, he could submit your advertising rate cards for The Free Press, CFPL-TV and CFPL-FM.

May I have a copy of those? Do you have them. Mr. Fenn?

Mr. Charles Fenn, Marketing Manager, The London Free Press: I have the newspaper advertising rates.

The Chairman: Do we have the radio and television advertising rate card?

Mr. Brown: No, I do not.

The Chairman: We have one in our office across the road, do we not? Can we get it?

Well, if you could give the newspaper rate card to Senator Everett...

Carry on, Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: There are other areas I wish to move into, but I suspect some of the senators perhaps have supplementaries in this area.

Just before I vacate to them, I would like to ask in this same connection if there is some unwritten code of ethics or principle through which the publishers or owners refrain from commenting editorially about a situation in the nation which has proceeded to such a degree of concentration or monopoly that on the surface appears dangerous?

Is there any code of ethics which says that they shall not editorialize about this?

Mr. Blackburn: None whatsoever to my knowledge; certainly not in my newspaper. Insofar as I observe coverage of the situation to which you may refer, the New Brunswick situation, the evidence given at this hearing was carried quite extensively in the newspapers of Canada.

Senator McElman: Carried but not editorialized upon. I am talking now about the health of your own industry. If you see a situation develop which perhaps some might consider a threat to the good health, reputation, or name of journalism and the industry, would they editorialize on it or do they stay free of commenting upon their brethren?

Mr. Blackburn: Not as a matter of policy, insofar as I am aware.

Senator McElman: Let me go further. If it was not known before it certainly is known now in consequence of the questions at least that have been put here, not in consequence of the answers that have been received from those engaged in the industry.

It is certainly well-known what the New Brunswick situation is, and the gentlemen involved appeared here as witnesses and they displayed, I think, quite fully what the situation was.

To the best of my knowledge one major newspaper in Canada commented editorially and the outcome of that was that the publisher of the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, and Evening Times-Globe, who was also the general manager of the company that runs the whole ball of wax, wrote a letter to the editor of the Toronto Star disputing the editorial, but he did not run in his own papers, in any of them, and they total five in New Brunswick of the dailies, he did not run the editorial of the Star nor his letter.

Now, would you not find it strange that only one of the major newspapers in Canada would comment editorially on such a situation, or is it not a threat? Is this sort of thing acceptable?

Mr. Blackburn: I do not find it strange because of the way in which the situation seems to have been developed. There seems to be politics involved in the situation, insofar as we can observe, to a degree, which politics, frankly, I do not understand, I must confess.

I would be hesitant to comment on the situation without understanding it more thoroughly than I presently do. Perhaps we should make, and no doubt we should make, an effort to understand it more thoroughly.

Senator McElman: The basis for your statement is the testimony and editorials of the members of that chain, I suggest. It is not necessarily fact.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, sir.

Senator McElman: I can say that at no time since these hearings have begun or before has any representative of your newspaper, for instance, or any of the other major newspapers—since there are supposed to be politics involved—has asked me, as I am involved, any direct question about politics being involved.

Mr. Carradine: Has the Canadian Press ever directed any questions to you on this?

Senator McElman: No.

Mr. Carradine: I think the situation is—

Mr. Blackburn: We will correct our oversight.

Senator McElman: I would just like to say additionally that I have been associated with the public affairs of New Brunswick—I will cut this off very quickly—

The Chairman: Well, I will be delighted, Senator McElman, because we are talking about London today.

Senator McElman: All right. We are talking about mass media, control, ownership concentration. That is what we are talking about.

The Chairman: I take your point. Carry on.

Senator McElman: I have been involved in the public affairs in New Brunswick for a good number of years, and I will stake my reputation for honesty of purpose in the interests of New Brunswick, not any political party, the interests of New Brunswick in what I have done, with that of the reputation of any publisher or owner or newspapers in the Province of New Brunswick.

I felt compelled to say this because of what you said.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator McElman: That there is politics involved. I come back again to the question. Is there something of a sub-conscious nature even which prevents editors from dealing with a potentially dangerous situation of this kind, potentially dangerous to their own industry and potentially dangerous in the sense of forcing government intervention, which is something you do not want and we do not want?

The Chairman: Well, I think that Mr. Blackburn has probably dealt with that question.

Senator McElman: I do not think he has.

The Chairman: Do you want to add anything else on it?

Mr. Blackburn: Insofar as The London Free Press is concerned (I can speak only for my own newspaper) we have not consciously and deliberately overlooked looking into the New Brunswick situation directly and discussing it with you. We just have not thought of doing this but we would be very pleased to.

Mr. Carradine: I should point out, senator, we have carried in our news column the stories coming to us from the Canadian Press which originated in New Brunswick concerning this particular problem. These have been carried in our newspaper and to the best of my knowledge—I would have to check with these gentlemen—we have carried all the stories which have come to us on this particular subject. We have not tried to skirt the issue.

Your question as to whether or not we should editorialize on the subject is a much more difficult one because as Mr. Blackburn pointed out we are editorializing on a subject about which we do not really have all the facts. We have the facts that were given to us by the Canadian Press. We do not necessarily believe that is sufficient basis on which to write a particular editorial, taking one side of the other.

Mr. Blackburn: I might say that with respect to the Province of Quebec, and in the interests of national unity, we do avoid making editorial comment which our friend in the Province of Quebec might consider to be none of our business.

The Chairman: If I might suggest, Mr. Blackburn, Senator McElman, honourable senators, and ladies and gentlemen, that we now adjourn for five minutes for the benefit of the reporter.

We will reconvene in exactly five minutes from now.

...Short Recess (11.30-11.35 a.m.)

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I am wondering if I might ask everyone to sit down so we can begin.

Senator McElman: May I just ask one more question?

The Chairman: Yes. Honourable senators and gentlemen from London, we are now ready to reconvene. I think that Senator McElman has more questions, and I gather he is going for the time being to defer to others of us who wish to ask questions, and we will return to him later. I think he does have one question before he does yield; is that correct?

Senator McElman: Yes. I just wish to elaborate on something that was not finished.

The Chairman: I am sorry.

Senator McElman: That was the only reason, Mr. Blackburn, I made reference to the fact I had not been interviewed by you people or anyone else was to balance out the assumption that you had drawn from one side of the picture. Let me say immediately I do not give a damn for personal publicity. I am not seeking interviews. I am not elected.

The Chairman: All right. Mr. Blackburn, I would like to ask you a few questions, if I may, or some of the people who are here with you.

I would like to discuss very briefly this question of whether or not The London Free Press enjoys a monopoly. You took me to task in your brief (not too severely; very gently, I might say, which I appreciate) and suggested I was wrong in the Senate when I described the situation as a monopoly.

If I were to concede the point that The London Free Press does not enjoy a monopoly, would you agree with me that it enjoys an overwhelmingly dominant position in the London market; would that be a fair statement?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, that is a fair statement.

The Chairman: An overwhelmingly dominant position.

Mr. Blackburn: I do not care for the adjective "overwhelmingly." We are not overwhelming anybody.

The Chairman: Would you call it a blanket domination?

Mr. Blackburn: No, I wouldn't call it that. We have a dominant position.

The Chairman: You would not say it is overwhelming, and you would not describe it as blanket coverage?

Mr. Blackburn: We have coverage in the city of London itself of over 90% of the occupied dwellings. That is good coverage.

The Chairman: I think it is excellent coverage. I am wondering why in your brief, if I may refer to page 7, Section 25, where you say: "One of the cities, London, has a population of 194,416."

I looked below and I see that that is a 1966 census. That intrigued me, so I phoned the municipal offices in London and found the population is 9% higher. It is 211,000.

I am not being critical of your use of this figure but I think it is important to realize that in analyzing some of the statistics you have presented us with, that these are old figures, or at least—I shouldn't say all of them—but some of them are obviously old figures, including this population statistic, because the city municipal offices told me the correct day it is 211,756.

Mr. Carradine: I believe the reason we used that, Senator Davey, is that that is the last official census figure which is available.

Mr. Blackburn: When you are writing briefs, Senator Davey, you have to adopt some basis. I adopted known figures; the last census. I had no intention whatsoever of reporting a population of 194,000 deliberately below...

The Chairman: I accept that.

Mr. Blackburn: ...what it now is.

Mr. Carradine: I think, if I may interject, perhaps another reason is that those are the figures that ABC are presently using in their report.

The Chairman: I can accept that as well. I am certain there is nothing deliberate here.

Mr. Blackburn: I am delighted that the city is growing as quickly as it is, although it is keeping us busy to keep up with it.

The Chairman: Well, now, you go on from there and you talk a great deal about the multiplicity of media voices which are available to people living in London, and the next page, page 8, you say St. Thomas has a daily newspaper, one AM radio station, and a cable system. Sarnia has a daily newspaper, a weekly newspaper, two AM radio stations, and a cable TV system. I will not read them all. But you describe similarly in Chatham, in Woodstock, in Stratford, and there is a total—I have added them up and I think somewhere you have, too—of six daily newspapers, and I think seven radio stations. Is it not a fact that in none of those other cities is there a joint ownership of a newspaper and radio station?

Mr. Blackburn: Insofar as I am aware, that is correct.

The Chairman: Is it not equally true there is no joint ownership of any of the newspapers and radio stations in any of those cities as with each other, so in each one of those radio stations and newspapers is a total independent operation as opposed—I do not say all of them; one or two—the St. Mary's Journal, for example, is a Thomson paper...

Mr. Blackburn: And Chatham.

The Chairman: And Chatham.

Mr. Blackburn: And Sarnia.

The Chairman: But most of these are independent.

Mr. Blackburn: And Woodstock.

The Chairman: I mentioned Woodstock; but the radio stations, for example, are all independent.

Mr. Blackburn: I believe so, as far as I am aware. I have no access to radio ownership information.

The Chairman: Let me go on just a little further. You then list all of the weeklies. You go on further in your presentation and you talk about all of the additional media voices which are available in the London market. And then on page 91 you say:

"Summarizing Mr. Fenn's analysis, I draw to your attention the following facts. Circulation within the City of London."

This is page 23, No. 91. You say:

"The London Free Press reaches 54,793 homes."

We have agreed that this is, you say, dominant coverage, and I say overwhelmingly dominant coverage. There are not more than fifty-five, fifty-six, or fifty-seven thousand homes in London, you know, roughly.

Mr. Carradine: That is about 95 per cent.

The Chairman: Yes. Then as an indication of the other media newspaper voices available in that community, you list the other daily newspapers which are sold in London and which have a total circulation of 6,459.

I must say I am surprised. You even list the University of Western Ontario's Gazette with 10,000 readers. The Weekend Magazine with...

Mr. Blackburn: It is a good weekly newspaper during the academic season.

The Chairman: There is a point, of course, I am going to make. Let us take the other daily newspapers coming into London; for example, the Toronto Telegram or the Toronto Star, or some of the others which you list—I think the Brantford Expositor was one, or the news magazines which you list, or the weekend magazines.

Do they in any way, shape or sense compete with The London Free Press in terms of local news coverage?

Mr. Blackburn: In terms of local news coverage, it depends how you define "Local news coverage." The Globe and Mail does cover the London news which it considers to be of interest to its readers.

The Chairman: Surely it does not cover the London news which the citizens of London consider of interest.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, some of it.

The Chairman: Does the Globe and Mail cover every meeting of the London City Council?

Mr. Blackburn: No.

The Chairman: Your paper does, and in depth.

Mr. Blackburn: The Globe would cover only that part of the City Council meeting which might be of general interest.

The Chairman: Mr. Blackburn, I take the point in your brief that I went too far in the Senate in describing The Free Press as enjoying a monopoly. You correctly pointed out there are a multiplicity of other media voices but I would suggest to you with great respect, sir, that The London Free Press does enjoy a monopoly when it comes to substantive local news coverage, and indeed when it comes to local newspaper advertising.

Mr. Blackburn: With respect to advertising I suppose generally speaking you might be right, but here are the last two issues of the University Gazette. There is local advertising in them.

The Chairman: Is there coverage of local London area developments?

Mr. Blackburn: I think there has been on occasion. In those issues I would say that...

The Chairman: Here is the issue of January 17th. The headline is "Faculty asks 17 per cent raise." I think that is a local issue.

The sub-stories are "Library problems just beginning, says report." The main story of the January 16th issue is "Nixon is dumb."

I do not know whether you are nodding your head in agreement or not.

Mr. Blackburn: No.

The Chairman: You asked me to look at local advertising, so let us do it. There "Evelyn Wood Reading Dynamics Institute" "Career Assessment Limited"—here are some car dealers.

We have people from the student press coming before our Committee I think in March, and as I recall from the briefs we have seen on the student press one of their great complaints is that they are unable to attract any degree of national advertising, and much of this advertising is, you know, at the expense of the London Free Press.

Mr. Blackburn: I do not know whether it is or not, frankly.

The Chairman: May I keep these?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Carradine: We also have, Senator, have, competition as far as local news coverage is concerned from the three radio stations and one television station.

The Chairman: I am glad you brought that up because I had intended to. Let us talk about that. Do you believe, as a newspaper executive, that radio news is as satisfactory, is as comprehensive, is as complete, is as detailed, is as informative, as are the newspapers in the London Free Press?

Mr. Carradine: As a newspaper executive I would have to say absolutely not. Nonetheless they do cover City Council; they do cover most of the other important local news going on in the community. They have their own news-gathering staffs. They cover all the news which we cover as far as the City Council is concerned and they are directly competitive with us in this area.

The Chairman: So if I am a concerned citizen of London who is interested in municipal affairs and in local activities, who really wants to know what is going on in the city and who wants a meaningful understanding of municipal affairs in London, I do not have to buy the Free Press.

Mr. Carradine: I would suggest if you want news in depth of what we consider to be meaningful coverage of the events at City Hall, you should buy the London Free Press.

The Chairman: I agree with you.

Mr. Carradine: But I am not suggesting that you can obtain it only in The London Free Press. I believe the broadcasting people will say they give very good coverage of the events at City Hall.

The Chairman: Well, all right. We can leave it at that. You know, I agree with your first statement. I think radio just does not give the kind of in-depth news coverage which many citizens want.

Mr. Blackburn: Not in-depth coverage, but actually good highlight coverage. Depending on how you identify "in-depth." But the radio stations of London will record interviews with the mayor or other members of the municipal government and going into the story of interest in greater depth than just stating "such-and-such occurred." This is to a degree in-depth coverage.

The Chairman: You mentioned, just speaking of news on the radio, on page 29, paragraph 118:

"The London Free Press publishes morning and evening editions and is scalped by three radio stations which compete with CFPL."

By that do you mean they read the morning Free Press and list things out of it and use it in their own newscast?

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, we do notice an amazing similarity at times between some of the stories in our morning edition and some of the stories carried on the other radio stations.

The Chairman: Is this same practice carried on by CFPL?

Mr. Blackburn: Well, The London Free Press provides copies of its local news and stories to CFPL.

The Chairman: So the CFPL people do not have to do this?

Mr. Carradine: No; I beg to disagree. CFPL also has their own news-gathering staff which are doing basically the same thing as the other radio stations.

As to whether or not they have to scalp, not necessarily.

Mr. William Heine, Editor, The London Free Press: Mr. Carradine, the scalping process is not restricted to the radio stations. Most of the afternoon dailies in the area do a very thorough-going job of clipping the Free Press.

The Chairman: I am sure you look at the editions of those newspapers to see what they are saying. I think that is fair game.

Mr. Heine: That is right.

Mr. Carradine: They even make the same mistakes we do, the same day.

Mr. Heine: We try to put a mistake in deliberately once in a while.

The Chairman: The Free Press has presumably a series of local stringers, local reporters, out in the small municipalities adjacent to London; Dorchester and further out, I am sure. Do these same stringers work at the same time for CFPL?

Mr. Ivor Williams, Managing Editor, The London Free Press: Only insofar as the copies of the material that come into the newsroom are available to the radio stations, but they do not work for CFPL directly, usually.

The Chairman: But that is a great advantage which CFPL enjoys—I do not say this critically—it is a great advantage that CFPL enjoys over other radio stations in London.

Mr. Williams: Sometimes they do not seem to think so.

Mr. Blackburn: We find that they are very acute in monitoring our news broadcasts and they do not lag behind us very long.

The Chairman: You say that the total daily circulation of other daily newspapers sold in London is 6,459.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

The Chairman: Which is approximately 12 per cent of that of The London Free Press.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

The Chairman: What is the circulation of The London Free Press in those communities which have the newspapers comprising this 6,459?

Mr. Blackburn: Almost zero.

Mr. Carradine: The great majority of that, Senator Davey, is the Globe and Mail and The London Free Press has virtually nil circulation in the City of Toronto.

The Chairman: Yes, but you list in this total 6,459 and, as I recall—it is in the back of your brief, I know. Let us take a look.

Mr. Carradine: If you will turn to Exhibit G...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Carradine: The second page or the first page after the title page should be "Analysis of print media circulation in the County of Middlesex," where you will see that in the City of London 5,185 of that is Globe and Mail circulation. The rest is made up of the Toronto Star, the Telegram, the Windsor Star and the St. Thomas Times Journal, et cetera.

The Chairman: I think my point stands that in total you would sell more papers in the communities listed in that column than they sell in London; notwithstanding the fact that you sell very few newspapers in Toronto. For example, the St. Thomas Times Journal sell 62 papers in your city and you sell 3,000 in theirs.

Mr. Blackburn: Your statement is accurate, Senator Davey, with the exception of the City of Toronto, and the City of Windsor.

The Chairman: Well, please believe me, Mr. Blackburn; I do not want to chew this point endlessly to death, but you have made the point that you do not enjoy a monopoly and would suggest, in my opinion at least, that you have an overwhelmingly dominant position. I purposely...

Mr. Blackburn: We have a dominant position.

The Chairman: Let me quote from some material which you ran. This is an advertisement which appeared in the trade paper "Marketing." I would ask you whether or not this is not an overwhelmingly dominant position.

It says:

"Get the big plus, London plus Southwestern Ontario. There is really no media that gives you this plus coverage."

And then I quote:

"The London Free Press covers the market like a blanket."

Mr. Blackburn: That is right.

The Chairman: It says:

"The London Free Press covers the market like blanket. We reach over 90 per cent of all the householders in London. In our home County of Middlesex we reach over 91 per cent of all householders."

So perhaps in describing it as an absolute monopoly I went too far, but I think certainly you are in an enviable position.

Mr. Blackburn: I hope we will remain that way, sir.

The Chairman: Senators, I apologize for taking so long. I have only one other series of questions that I would like to ask, and then I will defer to the senators.

One is a very incidental question. I was interested on page 24, paragraph 95, you say:

"In addition, 98,396 copies of weekend magazines are distributed free. The Canadian is considered a part of The London Free Press but the newspaper has nothing to do with the Canadian's editorial or advertising policies."

Does that statement stand? I find it rather astounding that you have nothing to do with the Canadian's editorial or advertising policies.

Mr. Blackburn: In decision-making terms, we have nothing to do with it. I suppose I have gone maybe a bit too far. We do meet annually with the Canadian to discuss the magazine, and the publisher of the Canadian comes from time to time ask us what we think of the publication, so I think I would withdraw that paragraph 95 and substitute for it that The London Free Press has relatively little to do with the Canadian's editorial or advertising policies.

The Chairman: As I say, I am not trying to embarrass you. I just find this a startling statement. That is why I brought it up.

I would like to turn to the other question of radio coverage.

You talk about...

Mr. Blackburn: I am sorry. To explain that; he speaks in relative terms at times. We are not accustomed to being on the stand in this way.

The Chairman: You are not on the stand.

Mr. Blackburn: When I wrote it I considered it to be accurate because it happens relatively seldom and the end result of all this we really do not know particularly.

Sometimes they will carry stories that we suggest but in terms that I would think of, of influencing the editorial or advertising policy of a publication, we do not really.

The Chairman: Well, I was less interested in that as it relates to the Free Press than it does to the weekend papers themselves to whom we will be talking.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

The Chairman: Radio coverage: again I said in the Senate you have minimal competition and you suggest that you have substantial competition.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

The Chairman: I think we are hung up on semantics. I still think it is minimal and I am sure you think it is substantial.

I would like you to look at page 27, Section 106. You list the weekly reaches of the station CFPL as 135,100. CKSL, 65,200. CHLO, 51,000. CJOE, 41,000. And CKLW, 20,000.

Then in the next section you begin to add these reaches and compare them to London, which I would suggest to you is a little like adding apples and oranges because this is a device I used to employ when I sold radio advertising. I think that is a very questionable procedure.

Does not BBM also provide in its studies...

Senator McElman: You mean you used questionable practices?

The Chairman: Yes, yes, with limited success. Does not the BBM also provide daily reach statistics? Does it not also provide average audience reached at a particular time of the day and give the cost per thousand?

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, I would ask Mr. Brown to answer that question.

Mr. Brown: Yes, Mr. Chairman. We used weekly reaches, only one method again to be consistent there. BBM measures in various ways. It measures by each quarter-hour. Actually, if we were to show you quarter-hour comparisons throughout the day competition even becomes more dramatic at times because we are not the dominant station in many time periods, but in total reach we are.

The Chairman: When during the day do you have your biggest audience?

Mr. Brown: From seven in the morning till about ten-thirty.

The Chairman: Is that not true of most radio stations right across Canada?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

The Chairman: So the big, blue-ribbon, premium time, the time the agencies want to buy, the really sort of dominant time period in broadcasting, is eight o'clock; I suppose the eight o'clock news?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

The Chairman: May I quote your BBM at eight o'clock in London and London area stations? In 1969, October I believe it was, CFPL had 55,000 listeners; CKSL had 20,000; CJOE has only 4,800; and your FM station has 6,000, which is 1,200 more than CJOE has. And I would suggest those are the kind of figures, Mr. Brown, that can be added.

You find that CFPL plus the FM station has more than twice as many listeners at eight o'clock than all the other competitors put together.

Mr. Brown: That is correct, Mr. Chairman, and you are doing a magnificent selling job.

The Chairman: That is right. I realize I am. I would suggest that that is minimal competition.

Mr. Blackburn: I would like to note, Mr. Chairman, that on FM in the 8 a.m. news period we are carrying the CBC news, which is the eight o'clock news.

Mr. Carradine: The World at Eight.

The Chairman: Is that on your station or CFPL-FM?

Mr. Carradine: On FM.

The Chairman: The World at Eight on FM at London has 1,200 more listeners than the third radio station, CJOE.

Senator Beaubien, you take note of that.

Mr. Brown: That is true. I would simply like to add that I think this is to the radio station's credit. After all, there are four other stations in the market. They all have relatively the same power. They all have the same opportunity to attract an audience. I think this is to CFPL's credit that it is the number one station.

The Chairman: What is the power of the station?

Mr. Brown: They are all 10,000 watts except CHLO which is now moving to ten thousand.

The Chairman: I did not even deal with CHLO.

Mr. Brown: Well, it is a very strong contender because it appeals to the youth market.

The Chairman: Well, they are all 10,000 watts. What are their dial positions?

Mr. Brown: Well, one is 1410 and the next is 1290, and we are 980, and CHLO is 680.

The Chairman: I see. Of the three London stations, that is CJOE, CKSL and CFPL, is not 980 the more desirable position on the dial technically?

Mr. Brown: By very little. I would say we are very restricted in our nighttime coverage. Our daytime is slightly better than the other two stations.

The Chairman: How long has CFPL been on the air?

Mr. Brown: Forty-three years.

The Chairman: How long has CJOE been on the air?

Mr. Brown: Three years.

The Chairman: And CKSL?

Mr. Brown: About twelve or thirteen.

The Chairman: The only point I am making again is that I think that the competition is minimal.

Let me put it this way. I will go this far. Perhaps the competition is not minimal but certainly do not think it is substantial, Mr. Blackburn, as you suggest in the brief.

Mr. Blackburn: I must disagree with you Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Please do.

Mr. Blackburn: We each have our own views.

The Chairman: I have some other question but I have taken much too long. I would like to turn to some of the senators.

Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Mr. Blackburn, what company owns CFPL?

Mr. Blackburn: CFPL Broadcasting Limited.

Senator Everett: And it owns the radio and the television station?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: And the FM station?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: What company owns The London Free Press?

Mr. Blackburn: The London Free Press Printing Company Limited.

Senator Everett: And is The London Free Press its only substantial asset?

Mr. Blackburn: It is its only asset really, except...

Mr. Beverly E. Lanning, Vice-President, Finance, and Treasurer, The London Free Press: Apart from short-term investments.

Senator Everett: Right. Now, how many common shares are there of The London Free Press Printing Company Limited?

Mr. Lanning: There are 1,200 common shares.

Senator Everett: How many shares of CFPL Broadcasting Limited?

Mr. Lanning: The same number.

Senator Everett: Who owns the 1,200 shares? Who are the shareholders of the 1,200 shares in each of those companies?

Mr. Lanning: The ownership of the common shares is set out in the chart for you in Exhibit F of the brief. You can see from that, 25 per cent of them are owned by The Southam Press and remainder by The London Free Press Holdings Ltd.

Senator Everett: Twenty-five per cent are held by Southam Press?

Mr. Lanning: Yes.

Senator Everett: And the remainder by The London Free Press Holdings Limited?

Mr. Lanning: Yes.

Senator Everett: That would be 300 shares held by Southam Press, in each of the two companies?

Mr. Lanning: Yes.

Senator Everett: Would it be 900 shares...

Mr. Lanning: I am sorry; I am confusing you. If we are talking strictly common shares—all of the common shares are owned by The London Free Press Holdings Limited.

Senator Everett: Oh, yes; of both companies?

Mr. Lanning: Of both companies; and of The London Free Press Holdings company, Southam Press owns 25 per cent, and the Blackburn family owns 75 per cent.

Senator Everett: The Blackburn family. Do they own that in a corporate structure?

Mr. Lanning: Yes.

Senator Everett: Could I have the name of that, please?

Mr. Blackburn: It is called Blackburn Holdings Limited.

Senator Everett: Blackburn Holdings Limited. How many shares of London Free Press Holdings Limited does Blackburn Holdings Limited own?

Mr. Lanning: 74.8, to be precise.

Senator Everett: The number of shares; not the percentage now.

Mr. Lanning: 99.6, I think it is, or 99.8. Whatever 74.08 per cent is.

Senator Everett: Would it be 889 shares?

Mr. Lanning: Yes, that is right.

Senator Everett: What about the other eleven shares; where are they?

Mr. Lanning: They are owned by Mrs. Lester.

Senator Everett: Who is Mrs. Lester?

Mr. Lanning: Her history is given in the brief.

Mr. Blackburn: Mrs. Lester is the granddaughter of one of the original newspaper shareholders, and her interest evolved by succession from her grandfather.

Senator Everett: Where does Mrs. Lester live?

Mr. Blackburn: North Madison, Ohio.

Senator Everett: Now, The London Free Press Holdings Limited has only common shares outstanding, 1,200 common shares; no other class of shares?

Mr. Lanning: That is right.

Senator Everett: And CFPL Broadcasting Limited, does it have any other class of shares?

Mr. Lanning: It has two other classes, two types of preferred shares.

Senator Everett: How many of those preferred shares are there? What type of preferred shares are they?

Mr. Lanning: One is voting preferred shares and the other is not. Both of them bear interest rates of normal preferred shares except one is voting and one is not.

Senator Everett: Let us deal with the voting shares. How many voting preferred shares, are there?

Mr. Lanning: In the company are you talking about?

Senator Everett: Let us deal with CFPL Broadcasting Limited.

Mr. Lanning: There are 120,000 less about eleven shares, I think; or in that order. I am sorry; I do not have the figures with me.

Senator Everett: Would it be 1,100 shares?

Mr. Lanning: Eleven hundred, yes.

Senator Everett: It would be 118,900 preferred?

Mr. Lanning: Yes, that is right.

Senator Everett: And those are the voting shares?

Mr. Lanning: And those are voting shares.

Senator Everett: Can you tell me how they are distributed?

Mr. Lanning: In the same ratio really as the common, the same ratio as the ownership of the common shares.

In other words, Southam has 25 per cent and Mr. Blackburn has just under 75 per cent, and Mrs. Lester—no, I am sorry; in Broadcasting, that is it.

Senator Everett: So Southam would have thirty thousand of the capital B preferred voting?

Mr. Lanning: Yes.

Senator Everett: There is a difference, is there not, because Blackburn—I may have the name incorrectly—Blackburn Holdings Limited does own 889 of the common shares. Are you a shareholder in Blackburn Holdings?

Mr. Blackburn: No, I am not.

Senator Everett: Would it be true to say that your children are?

Mr. Blackburn: Quite true.

Senator Everett: Now, of the B preferred, are those held personally by you, Mr. Blackburn?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: So through the 88,900 B preferred, you have complete control, or effective control?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, effective control.

Senator Everett: Actual control.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: But the equity is distributed between yourself or your children—

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: To Blackburn Holding and Southam.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes; and Mrs. Lester.

Senator Everett: With eleven shares.

Mr. Blackburn: With a small holding, yes.

Senator Everett: In The London Free Press Limited does the same situation exist there?

Mr. Lanning: Yes. The only variation, senator, is in Mrs. Lester's holdings. If you would like, I can go into that.

Senator Everett: I understand she has 1,100 of the B preferred but substantially, then, you control through the B preferred The London Free Press Limited and CFPL Broad-Casting Limited.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: But you have frozen your assets because your net worth cannot increase on account of these preferred. Any increase in your net worth then accrues to The London Free Press Holdings, in which you do not have any shares? They are held by Southam...

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, in effect.

Mr. Lanning: That is right.

Senator Everett: Coming to the Estate Tax problem, this concept that you have that the Estate Tax Department would value your shares or value the newspaper on the basis of ignoring goodwill and also valuing the assets on undepreciated capital cost. Is that right?

Mr. Blackburn: Correct.

Senator Everett: Would it be true to say that what you are suggesting is that the Department value a newspaper's assets on the basis of its tangible net worth?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes. It is a book value basis.

Senator Everett: In other words, a straight book value.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: In reading that I could not determine whether you were suggesting this to be confined to newspapers only or whether you are suggesting this be available to other businesses or indeed to all businesses; at one point in your brief you talk about private business, and then in another you talk about newspapers.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes. Well, one wonders how far one should go before this Senate Committee, because you are interested in mass media. My personal preference would be to extend this same principle to other businesses of a similar nature but not the media business.

Senator Everett: Other businesses?

Mr. Blackburn: Of a similar nature, owned by individuals or individual families.

Senator Everett: In the media business.

Mr. Blackburn: Outside of the media business, to answer your question.

Senator Everett: So you are saying this rule would apply to all private business?

Mr. Blackburn: In my opinion, yes.

Senator Everett: That all private business, if there is a devolution, the value of the company should be on the basis of book value?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, when they are the kind of business which is in the public interest to see continue, such as a family or individual holdings.

I have seen in London, Senator Everett, several old businesses—one of them for example, is Gorman-Eckert, which is a spice company owned by the Gorman family. It was sold several years ago to McCormick United at Philadelphia, I think, or wherever they are; and I know the Estate Tax problem was the basic problem in this particular sale. So there is an old London firm being bought by an American company because of this Estate Tax problem.

Senator Everett: Yes. I think I understand the problem.

Mr. Blackburn: There are other businesses. This is not unusual.

Senator Everett: I think I understand the problem but what I am more seeking was a definition of a company that should continue as a private company because it is in the public interest.

Mr. Blackburn: I was afraid you would ask me that, and I have to leave it to the legislators to determine what in their opinion is in the public interest in this respect. I think the interest will go beyond newspapers or the media.

Senator Everett: Would you think a car dealership was in the public interest?

Mr. Blackburn: I would leave that for you, Senator Everett, but I would be inclined to answer "Yes."

Senator Everett: Just for the moment I would like to deal with this question of postal rates. Were you affected by the Department's action on postal rates?

Mr. Blackburn: We were, Senator Everett; and Mr. Carradine will deal with that.

Mr. Carradine: Yes. To answer your question directly, we were affected. We had 18,000 mail subscribers at the time the post office department brought the increased mail rates into effect and as of the present date we have lost—ten thousand of those have refused to renew their subscriptions at the higher price.

We are concerned about this because what this means is that 10,000 families in our market area are unable to receive a newspaper. They are unable to receive the news which we believe they need to know unless they are prepared to pay a much higher price.

Senator Sparrow: What is the difference in price?

Mr. Carradine: It went from $22 to $44, which will be the end result. There was a three-stage package. It was implemented over—it was a three-tier increase. The final price would be $44.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, ten thousand was the gross loss. Some of that has come back in other ways since that time through dealerships and in other ways.

Senator Everett: Do you think the rate increase was unfair?

Mr. Blackburn: The postal rate increase?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Blackburn: Unfair to the rural subscribers of newspapers, yes.

Senator Everett: You are not concerned about it being unfair to The London Free Press?

Mr. Blackburn: It was not unfair to us in that sense. Really I felt it was too great for any sensible increase. It was 300 per cent.

Mr. Carradine: It was 224 per cent.

Senator Everett: The postal department made the point they did not feel they should have to subsidize a newspaper company.

Mr. Carradine: Mr. Kierans said...

Mr. Blackburn: In fact, Senator Everett, the postal department was not subsidizing The London Free Press or to my knowledge any other newspaper in Canada. It was subsidizing, and I guess unknowingly or knowingly, as the case may be, the rural reader.

Senator Everett: Fair enough.

Mr. Blackburn: ...or the reader who receives his newspaper by mail, which in our case was the rural reader; not necessarily Le Devoir.

Senator Everett: Do you believe the reader was being subsidized by the post office department prior to the rate increase?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, I think he was. He did not know it either but he must have been.

Mr. Carradine: He was subsidized to the extent our rural rate was lower in the rural area than it was in the City of London, for example.

Senator Everett: Do you believe that he should be subsidized?

Mr. Blackburn: I think it would be in the public interest to do this, yes.

Apparently the rural reader, at least in our experience, is unable or unwilling to pay the price which he must pay if the rate for that circulation is to be equitably established with respect to our other rates and that there should be no subsidies therefore for him through our other subscribers or through our advertisers.

Senator Everett: Well, then, looking at your view on that...

Mr. Blackburn: We are unable to subsidize out of profits. The figure is too gross.

Senator Everett: Looking at your view on that and your view on the Estate Tax Act, do you think that newspapers have a special status, a special position in society, that can give rise to that sort of special consideration?

Mr. Blackburn: I think the public thinks we have. They depend on us for information to a substantial degree. As for a special position, I would have to know more specifically what you mean by that.

Senator Everett: It is a very general question.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes. And I think there are other very special...

Senator Everett: I am trying to establish in my own mind whether as Mr. McCabe says—"Look here, you are just dealing with an ordinary corporation. We are no different than anybody else"—or whether in fact we are dealing with something that is really quite special and that no matter how we make like to treat everybody the same, we are going to have to consider in the interests of the newspapers and in the interests of the public, special benefits and special rules, such as estate tax provisions and postal rates.

Would you agree that is a fair statement?

Mr. Blackburn: I agree that is a fair statement.

Senator Everett: I am going to ask you a nasty question. Your national rate on your newspapers is fifty cents per agate line. It is a flat rate. Out of that, I believe, you pay the agency a commission of fifteen per cent which would mean that your net rate would be 42½ cents a line.

Your local rate runs from a low of twenty-seven for two million lines on a contract to a transient rate of forty-four.

Your average projected for this year would be 31.6 cents per agate line from national advertising. I think I am correct in that it has that from your own people.

Mr. Carradine: 31.6 for local advertising.

Senator Everett: That is retail advertising, that is right.

Mr. Carradine: Projected for 1969.

Senator Everett: So that your average retail advertising is 31.6 per agate line and the average for national advertising is 42½ cents per agate line. That is as large a difference as I have ever seen between national and local, although I could be corrected on that.

It seems to be a very, very large difference. Do you have a policy to force national advertising onto your television station?

Mr. Blackburn: Heavens, no.

Senator Everett: Do you use a high national rate in your newspaper to do that?

Mr. Blackburn: No, sir, no, sir; not whatsoever.

Mr. Carradine: Just for information: I have had advertising people say they find it extremely difficult to buy time on our television station simply because it is booked up. Therefore, it would be illogical for us to try and force more national advertising on television.

Senator Everett: Indeed it would, that is right.

Mr. Blackburn: And from a competitive standpoint I would have no desire to do that whatsoever.

Senator Everett: I have one last question. I am sorry; did you have something else to say?

Mr. Blackburn: I was asking Mr. Carradine, and possibly Mr. Fenn knows, what our mill rate national rate is relative to other newspapers in Canada.

Mr. Carradine: It is not out of line.

Mr. Fenn: It is well in line with the major markets across Canada; in fact, lower than some and higher than some. I would say that on the average our mill line rate is sound and equitable in comparison with any other newspapers across Canada.

Mr. Blackburn: We would be glad to file that information with you in that respect. I am feeling an inference here that our national advertising rates are high relative to other newspapers in Canada. I do not believe this to be so.

Mr. Fenn: No, absolutely not.

Senator Everett: No. There was no inference meant in that direction. The inference was that the difference between the local rate and the national rate of roughly 11 cents a line seemed to me to be inordinately high.

Mr. Carradine: You have to keep in mind the circulation of our morning newspaper and the circulation of our afternoon newspaper. This is the basic difference which we have from most other newspapers in Canada, Senator Everett, where we have very wide circulation of our morning newspaper throughout Southwestern Ontario, which our national advertisers can take advantage of.

Senator Everett: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Carradine: ...and we have circulation of our afternoon edition only in the City of London basically, which our local advertisers, to a large extent, take advantage of. This is the reason for it.

Senator Everett: Are these rates that you charge for both newspapers?

Mr. Carradine: Yes; total circulation.

Senator Everett: So that for 50 cents a line you get morning and evening as one?

Mr. Fenn: That is right.

Senator Everett: And you feel the difference is justified by the fact your morning newspaper has such a wide coverage outside the City of London?

Mr. Carradine: We feel it is justified; for example, the Coca Cola advertising takes advantage of our total circulation.

Senator Everett: Right, yes. Indeed. One last question. Are you doing anything to improve the standards; are you investing any money in improving the standards of your editorial writers? Is schooling being done?

Mr. Blackburn: I would like Mr. Honey to answer that, if you would like.

Mr. Honey: I think our best investment in this regard is the freedom that the editorial staff of this newspaper has to hire good people. We employ reporters. I think twenty-one of our eighty-five editorial staff are university graduates. We hire the best people we can find and we pay them salaries which—I must say some of us feel our neck a bit because the personnel department keeps pointing out that in comparison with similar newspapers we are paying people more than appears to be the case elsewhere.

This is because we are hiring good people. This is an investment, the best investment any newspaper can have.

In addition we are putting money into scholarship programs at the University of Western Ontario. The details are all in the brief.

Senator Everett: Can you tell me how much?

Mr. Honey: We pay three or four people per year $250 towards their tuition and we undertake to provide them with employment throughout the summer months at a minimum of $1,000 a year, and it is usually quite a bit more with higher salary rates now.

We do not hesitate to spend money to educate our staff on the available courses in the United States. A.P.A. and other such seminars, where we send people down to New York for two or three weeks at a time. We are training and spending money on people constantly, and I feel no financial inhibition whatever in spending that money to train people.

Senator Everett: So if you have a raw reporter, he gets more than just on-the-job training. You have a program for the formal training of that reporter.

Mr. Honey: No, but he tends to get on-the-job training as a raw reporter, but increasingly raw reporters come in at the smaller papers and we are hiring increasingly better-trained people, people who have had considerable experience in the media, and university graduates.

Senator Everett: Do you feel an obligation to hire raw reporters and have a training program for them?

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Williams might wish to answer that.

Mr. Williams: Yes. No, I do not feel we have an obligation except for our own product, and so our training is inherent all the time to improve our own product, so that means the marketability of the individual as well; so by improving him we are apt to lose him.

Senator Everett: I am sorry; I do not follow that.

Mr. Williams: By making him more saleable in the profession. We train people and they are just as apt to go to another newspaper, more desirable for another newspaper.

Senator Everett: Is that an argument against training?

Mr. Williams: No, we are doing it all the time knowing this may help them to go somewhere else.

Mr. Carradine: Keeping good staff, sir, is a function of both training and good wages. We have both.

Mr. Blackburn: I think to answer your specific question, Senator Everett, yes, we do feel a responsibility for training our people and in fact exercise such responsibility. They are trained.

Mr. Williams: But we do not run a school for other newspapers.

Senator Everett: No, I understand that. One of the great problems in the newspaper business is new talent on the editorial side.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Everett: Your approach would be to let the small newspapers hire them and give them their initial training and then when they had made it through there, you will hire them?

Mr. Blackburn: None of the university graduates. The others, yes, for the most part.

Mr. Carradine: With our scholarship program we have eight to ten journalism students in the newspaper every summer working with us.

Senator Everett: Do they tend to stay with you.

Mr. Carradine: When we can get them to yes, they do.

Senator Everett: They do.

Mr. Williams: We take one or two. There are not always an opening. Our staff turnover is very low. I think in the last two years we have lost no more than half a dozen, seven or eight good people. It used to be a dozen year some years ago.

Mr. Carradine: We are keeping the good ones, and we have got a reverse flow, as the brief mentions. People are coming back who used to work for us and have developed skill in other areas, and remember what the working conditions are, and they came back, sometimes for less money.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, may I draw to the attention of the members of the Committee that present today are 18 students from the School of Journalism of the University of Western Ontario and two professors. They are sitting on my right.

It might be that the senators would wish, if that happy hour comes when our evidence has been completed, to speak with them in the hall.

The Chairman: Perhaps this is a good time for me to make a comment about the happy hour. Before I do that I should say that the Dean of Journalism at the University of Western Ontario is going to appear as a witness before the Committee. I believe it is next Wednesday night that we will be welcoming him.

Mr. Williams: Before you do that, I gather you are about to adjourn?

The Chairman: No, I am not.

Mr. Williams: May I speak to that point?

The Chairman: It is apparent there are many other questions. I have had notes from senators indicating they would like to pursue particularly the second document, Mr. Carradine's document, which we really have not had a chance to talk about.

We had planned on giving the senators a night off this evening, but we have polled the senators and found that they would be more than willing—in fact, they would like to return here this evening at seven-thirty and meet you again.

We hate to lean on you, Mr. Blackburn, but you have much to contribute.

Mr. Blackburn: Your wish is our command, s.

The Chairman: We would be very grateful.

Mr. Carradine: I believe Air Canada would be most unhappy with you, Senator Davey.

The Chairman: Well, I have been unhappy with them on countless occasions.

I was going to say to the senators, please remember we will adjourn presently. We are meeting the Brantford Expositor at two-thirty and we have Le Droit at three-thirty, and then we will meet this evening at eight o'clock and we will ask the Free Press people, as many as you can bring—if there are some that must get back, we would certainly understand.

Mr. Blackburn: Our editorial man, sir, has planned to return.

The Chairman: That is fine.

Mr. Honey: We will be here.

The Chairman: As many as you can bring. I know there are a lot of other publishers in the room. I hasten to assure them that this is not a precedent. It is simply that we are terribly interested in the presentation and there are many other questions which we have not asked.

Therefore, the night off is cancelled, and so we will meet at eight o'clock tonight. For now, I think we can adjourn.

The Committee adjourned.

(Upon resuming at 2.35 p.m.)

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I might call this meeting to order.

This afternoon we are going to receive two briefs. The first is from The Brantford Expositor, Brantford, Ontario. Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Jack Preston, the President, Publisher, and General Manager of The Expositor.

On my immediate left is Mr. Peter Preston, the Vice-President, Publisher, and Executive Editor.

Sitting on Mr. Jack Preston's right is Mr. Pollard, who is a director of the company.

Now, Mr. Preston, pursuant to our request we received a number of weeks in advance, copies of the brief which you were kind enough to prepare. The brief has been circulated to the senators. Presumably it has been read and studied.

In keeping with the procedure we have followed at these meetings we are now able to receive an oral report from you, which you perhaps could take ten, fifteen minutes, if you wish. You certainly do not have to, but in the time you can amplify upon, explain, or expand upon your brief; or indeed say anything else which may be in your mind. Or, if you would prefer, we can proceed right to the questions.

Mr. Jack Preston, President, Publisher, and General Manager, The Brantford Expositor: Well, Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, there are one or two points I would like to add to our brief.

The Chairman: My all means.

Mr. J. Preston: I am only going to be very brief.

I am sure that from these hearings will come a better understanding of the complexities newspapers face in providing that flow of information and comment that is vital to a democratic society and thus to the freedom of all Canadians.

It is crucial to that freedom that Canadians not only speak their minds but have the means to spread their views and inform themselves of the views of others. There is no more effective way for them to exercise this freedom than through the printed word.

Only through that medium can they be adequately informed of what is going on in their own and other countries. Newspapers are the public's prime source of information. A typical news broadcast on radio or television rarely exceeds 1,200 words, which equals no more than one newspaper column, whereas most daily newspapers print seventy-five to a hundred and twenty or more columns of news each day.

Only in the newspapers can the public find a wide range of reports of public meetings and of the proceedings of legislatures and other public bodies. And besides serving the public's right to know more fully than any other media, newspapers provide, through letters to the editors, an unrivalled channel for the expression of public opinion.

Do you realize that as we meet here this afternoon, almost all the type used in today's The Expositor has been dumped and that we are now setting out the forms for tomorrow's newspaper?

I know of no other business where once the product has been manufactured the staff immediately start to dismantle their handiwork and throw it all into the hell box. We are crazy.

None of us in this room can accurately forecast what will be the main news stories tomorrow. No daily newspaper will be certain of that until the pages are ready for the press. Even then at the last minute we may have to re-plan one or two pages for a late-breaking story that must be included that day.

One witness before the Committee said that many newspapers in single markets just fill their columns with Canadian Press material and forget about the rest of the local news.

Between now and tomorrow's deadline Canadian Press will send us about 45 columns of news. How this would fill our 120 columns that witness did not explain. Even if we used all of the 45 columns of CP news, which we almost never do, we would still have 75 columns to be filled by our own staff; reporter, editorial, and photographic.

As you will have found when travelling outside Canada the coverage of Canadian news by foreign newspapers, even some of the most respected, is next to negligible. Even a Canadian federal election gets scant coverage across the border.

And during Stanley Cup playoff time just try to find the results of the games in American newspapers, unless the city in which you are staying happens to be involved. There, there might be a short story.

I am unable to count the number of Brantford citizens who on returning from trips outside Canada have said how glad they are to get back to a good newspaper that gives them such excellent coverage of events around the world. I am sure this applies to every newspaper in Canada and every newspaperman could make the same statement most sincerely.

In emphasizing the role and performance of the press in relation to freedom of information I have particularly in mind a question asked by your Committee at earlier sittings. This was whether there should be a council to control advertising rates in single newspaper markets.

The Expositor wishes to be recorded as opposed to any such control. In our view would open to the way to government control of the press and pose a threat to both press and individual freedom of expression, nor should it be overlooked that any control of rates would compel control of wages and other operating costs.

There is no need for any controlling body regulate advertising rates of newspapers. Even in a one-newspaper city we face strong competition for the advertising dollar from radio, TV, and even throw-aways distributed either by the Post Office or by distributing agencies. All these take advertising dollars from us, and if an advertiser thinks our rates are exorbitant he has recourse to the other means.

Mr. Chairman, those are our comments.

The Chairman: Mr. Preston, thank you.

Mr. J. Preston: We are ready to file questions.

The Chairman: Good. Thank you so much. I think that the questioning this afternoon will begin with Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: In reference, Mr. Preston, to your written brief, in it you refer to taxes and particularly succession duties. And this appears in a number of briefs.

Have you a recommendation, particularly on succession duties? Are you inferring there that there should not be succession duties? You don't state it. Or should they be on a different basis, on a different percentage basis? Should there be special provisions for newspapers or family-owned newspapers in regards to succession duties in comparison to other industries?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, Senator Sparrow, our feeling at The Expositor is that we in the newspaper business feel that we should have no special privileges that any other citizen does not have.

Now, I know one of the problems you are facing is the change of ownership of independent papers, but we do not feel that we would like to recommend any particular form of legislation that would be beneficial to the Preston family, for sake of argument.

Senator Sparrow: Succession duties as such, when, are a bad policy for all industries? You're comparing them all together?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes. I think any small company, sir, is faced with the same problem, trying to keep it under the control of the family, if it is a family corporation.

Senator Sparrow: Right.

This is a second question really, but it might tie in. You get four—I think the statement was four or five requests per year for the purchase of your newspaper. And you inferred that some of them you felt were American offers from American companies.

Could you tell us why you are suspicious that it is American companies? Maybe at the same time you could answer us, if you in fact know that some of them are American companies, some of them Canadian companies? And are the existing Canadian chains making offers to you to purchase it?

I suppose a reason for this question is really to determine if the chains are actively trying to increase their holdings?

Mr. J. Preston: I think you have asked two questions. If I may try to answer the first one...

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. J. Preston: We are quite certain some of the offers could be American, because they come from American buyers—I mean, firms that represent themselves as representing buyers. And I am thinking of a firm, John L. Parks, in North Carolina. He writes us every year, wants to entertain us whenever I am in Chicago for inland press meetings. I am assuming he is representing American interests. He may be representing Canadian interests.

We get the odd enquiry from a legal firm in the States. I am assuming that they know the control on advertising that exists. But we have to interpret it that they may be representing American interests. We don't know.

As far as the local chains (you are using the word; they don't like it; they like to call themselves "groups"), if we were to hold up our hand and say, "We are for sale," we would be trampled to death by three, and another one who is not in the chain business at the moment. But I know quite frankly that we only have to indicate that we would be for sale, and I am quite confident that all three chains would be nibbling.

And there is one other independent paper that has told me that, "If you are ever going to sell, let us know."

Does that answer your question?

Senator Sparrow: Yes, I think so.

Mr. Fortier: On that same point, if I may, Mr. Chairman...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Excuse me, sir.

Have the groups up to now ever made open approaches to you?

Mr. J. Preston: One very definitely.

Mr. Fortier: When was that?

Mr. J. Preston: Three days after my father died.

Mr. Fortier: Twenty years ago?

Mr. J. Preston: 1946.

Mr. Fortier: Any since?

Mr. J. Preston: No, there have been no firm offers. It has been a casual conversation. You know, you are sitting around having a drink. And I think it is half kidding and half not, quite seriously—"Well, when are you for sale?" and "Don't forget us."

Mr. Fortier: The same group?

Mr. J. Preston: All three.

Mr. Fortier: All three?

Mr. J. Preston: In one form or another.

Senator Sparrow: You would suggest, then, that they are actually endeavouring to increase their holdings?

Mr. J. Preston: I think so.

Senator Sparrow: You refer to the publishing of the list of the owners of your newspaper. And you refer that you feel it is not necessary because the subscribers in your area are familiar with the ownership, I believe you said, of your paper, as well as the radio stations, or whatever the case was.

Mr. J. Preston: Right.

Senator Sparrow: I think the question that was asked in the guidelines was really, I suppose, whether this was a wise move generally. Should newspapers publish their ownership on their mastheads?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, I can only speak personally. We feel in Brantford it would not mean very much. Your other papers carry various information on their mastheads: who owns it, who the publishers are, who the editors are.

I would suggest that in Toronto a list of the people that own the Toronto Star would be meaningless to the average citizen in Toronto.

Senator Sparrow: Even in your newspaper would you not suggest there are times when your newspaper goes outside of your given area, as an example, that readers may not know? Is there any reason why they should know, or should not know?

Mr. J. Preston: There is no reason why they should not know, as far as we are concerned. We have no objection to it in that sense. It is owned by the Preston family. Period. We make no bones about it. And most people know that in our area that have any interest in it.

Mr. Peter Preston, Vice-President, Publisher, and Executive Editor, The Brantford Expositor: It is in our masthead every day anyway.

Senator Sparrow: Is it?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes. We carry that the publishers are J. C. and P. M. Preston; it is in there every day—not as owners as such, but we are listed there as publishers.

Senator Sparrow: Going back to the chains just for a moment again, in your particular newspaper would there be any advantage to you news-wise or profit-wise to be connected with a chain? Would you find that you could in fact have a better newspaper if it was connected in some way?

Mr. J. Preston: I can't answer that, quite frankly, because we don't know. I could assume that, if we were owned by one of the groups, they would run it much more efficiently than we do, because there are things because of associations with people that we close our eyes to, for personnel and things like that, because it is a family concern. There was a time when we used to refer to it as "The Expositor Family."

And I know there are economies that any person who bought it would put into effect.

For instance, we feel that we must maintain staff in the building 24 hours a day for protection of the building. We know of other places that, when the last guy finishes his job he goes out and closes the door, and some personnel comes in the next morning; everybody has keys. We don't feel that way. And it is a rather expensive operation to maintain staff around the clock, over holidays and weekends and things like that. And I am quite sure that in some cases this would be curtailed.

But as far as producing a better newspaper as far as the news content is concerned, we like to feel that we are publishing as good a newspaper as can be published.

Senator Sparrow: Do you feel there is danger at the present time of chains increasing their holdings in Canada? Do you think that the trend is that way, and there is danger?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes, very definitely.

Senator Sparrow: Would you suggest that there is an area where some type of control may be necessary; now or in the near future?

Mr. J. Preston: This gets down to becoming a political problem really again, as was pointed out this morning.

I would hate to see every newspaper in Canada owned by the three chains. But I think in the long run something like that is going to be inevitable, unless there is something done to curtail it. And I have nothing to recommend what that should be.

Senator Sparrow: Thanks.

I pass for the moment, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Do you foresee the day, Mr. President, in the immediate or not-too-distant future, where the Preston family may have to accept to be trampled by one of the groups?

Mr. J. Preston: We have thought about it, yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Have you thought about it because you have become increasingly aware of the impact of succession duties?

Mr. J. Preston: Very definitely. I would say that up to three years ago we had no thought of ever selling The Expositor. Our thinking is settling along the line that we will eventually have to sell it.

Mr. Fortier: Have you so indicated to...

Mr. J. Preston: We have not. It is not on the market, please!

Mr. Fortier: No, no. You have made that very clear.

Senator Beaubien: We will start a rumour about you, if you like.

Mr. J. Preston: Just hold those horses in the back, will you?

Mr. Fortier: What has happened in the last three years that has brought about this change in the policy and outlook?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, the suggested succession duty problem is much heavier than Peter and I at the moment can contend with. Frankly, anything that we have is in the shares of The Expositor. We have no capital. So therefore if we are faced with a heavy succession duty something has to give.

Mr. Fortier: Would you see the advent of ownership by one of the groups in Brantford as a good thing or a bad thing for the community in Brantford? I am sure you have considered this.

Mr. J. Preston: I think we can do a better job for the City of Brantford privately-owned.

Have I answered the question?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I think you can. This is a bit of a nasty question, but I will ask it anyway...

Mr. J. Preston: Shoot.

Mr. Fortier: In deciding eventually whether you will sell or not, will you think exclusively of your heirs, or will you think of your reading public in Brantford?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, if we were going to sell, sir, we would be selling because we would feel that we could not pass it on, or we could not retain it for our heirs. Peter has two sons and I have got one son, and we have each got a daughter as well.

Mr. Fortier: Would you approach the sale of your newspaper in the same way as you would approach the sale of any business concern? Or would you view it differently?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, we have talked about this a little bit.

Mr. Fortier: We would love to have your views.

Mr. J. Preston: Well, I think Peter agrees with me on this, that if The Expositor goes up for sale, as far as we are concerned it will go up for grabs and the highest bidder can have it. And neither of us will continue to work.

Mr. Fortier: And does your brother feel the same way?

Mr. P. Preston: Yes, I do.

Mr. Fortier: The highest bidder will get the paper?

Mr. P. Preston: I would think so, yes.

Mr. J. Preston: Depending on the terms of the highest bidder. You can have a high bid that is not very satisfactory financially.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever considered the possibility of selling your newspaper to the community? This is a view which we had expressed before Christmas by Mr. Ryan of Le Devoir.

Mr. J. Preston: No, we have not, to answer it very quickly.

Mr. Fortier: As I mention this to you, how do you react?

Mr. J. Preston: Are you suggesting that it go public?

Mr. Fortier: In a way, yes, in a way—public insofar as the Brantford community is concerned. In other words, that interested citizens...

Mr. J. Preston: If they wanted to buy it from us on that basis, I don't think we would object to that any more than we would object to any other buyer.

Mr. Fortier: You would not object to it, but would you conceivably make it a condition of sale that, rather than being farmed out to one of the groups, it continue to be locally-owned—not by the Preston family, but rather by Brantford citizens; you know, all money being equal?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, if the money were equal, this would be fine. But what guarantee have we got, if you say it must be owned by Brantford people, that the money is going to be equal?

Mr. Fortier: This is something which you have not considered?

Mr. J. Preston: No.

Mr. Fortier: No. Is there a radio station in Brantford?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes; CKPC.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a television station?

Mr. J. Preston: No, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a table TV operator?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever considered going into the broadcasting business?

Mr. J. Preston: My father thought about it before the war. When we got back from service overseas, he died; and we have never thought about it.

Mr. Fortier: You have never thought about it?

Mr. J. Preston: No.

Mr. Fortier: Is this because of a certain policy which you have adopted? Why have you not thought about it?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, we have looked at CKPC once or twice, and it was never for sale. And it was never for sale to the Preston family if it was for sale. We were told that very definitely. So at that point we stopped looking. And again I am going back fifteen, twenty years.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think it would be beneficial for your newspaper, Mr. Preston, to have an interest in the broadcasting medium in Brantford?

Mr. J. Preston: In some ways, yes; and in some ways, no.

Mr. Fortier: Could you explain it, please?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, it is a duplication really. I can see where the radio news staff could be of help to us in covering some things that we would not be able to staff. And we would do the same thing for them. But I think the competition that we have for new coverage in trying to... We try to beat the radio twelve-thirty noon newscast. And that is one point that I think is in favour of having it owned by some person else.

Mr. Fortier: And then the radio station use your news—scouts your newspaper?

Mr. J. Preston: I was going to come to that.

And then the other one is, it keeps our advertising staff on its toes, because they are competing against the radio station for the advertising dollar.

It would be fun to own it, but I am just as happy we don't.

Mr. Fortier: What are your views of multi-media ownership within a single community such as Brantford?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, I think I probably answered it in my previous answers; but I don't have it, so therefore we don't like it. We had it, we would like it—I think is about the size of the matter.

Mr. Fortier: You said in your very presentation earlier that you did not favour control by any agency of advertising rates—one-newspaper towns.

A question comes to mind: if there is regulation, how are your prices set? How does a play of competition come into being?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, let us take an advertiser like Woolco. Do you know the...?

Mr. Fortier: The department store.

Mr. J. Preston: The department store. They have an operation in Brantford; they have an operation in St. Catharines, Kitchener, Windsor, and so forth. And we renew the contract in Toronto every year. If our advertising rate is out of line for the service that we are giving them in relation to what they are paying in other markets they quickly tell us, and just say they won't buy.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, but you are dealing with a big buyer. Let us deal with a small buyer in Brantford, a small corner shoe store. I mean, he maybe is not in the same economic position that the Woolco department store may be in from a bargaining point of view, is he?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, let us take an independently-owned men's-wear store by the name of Ludlow's, a very good operation. If we were exorbitant George Ludlow would be climbing our frame.

Mr. Fortier: Possibly. Would that make you change your mind?

Mr. J. Preston: We would certainly reconsider it and re-assess, well, perhaps we are out of line. And every time any person challenges us on the policy of advertising, or editorial policy, or reporting policy, we sit down and look at it. And we thank them, as they have made us look at ourselves here. It has made us sit down and examine some of the things.

You know, you decide to do something ten years ago and it is accepted policy, and no person challenges it. And fine. And times have changed, and so forth.

We realize that every time advertising rates go up the small advertiser suffers. But, on the other hand, every time wages go up in the union negotiations something else has to go up.

Mr. Fortier: The small advertiser in Brantford, though, has nowhere to go, does he, but so your newspaper?

Mr. J. Preston: And the radio station.

Mr. Fortier: And the radio station?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Fortier: But you will agree it is a different type of advertising?

Mr. J. Preston: Oh, I quite agree. It is not nearly as effective.

The Chairman: On this subject of advertising—just to interrupt you for one moment—I would like to ask this. You make a comment in your brief that your national advertising range in 1966 was 131,000-some-odd inches; in 1968 it was down to 79,000. That is a rather dramatic decrease.

Mr. J. Preston: Well, I think some of the national dollars undoubtedly have gone to TV. Some probably have gone to magazines.

As I say in the brief we are in a very small market. You have been in the advertising business yourself, sir, and you realize people say, "Well, I can cover Brantford with over-the-air TV." After all, we do receive ten TV stations in Brantford, so it is very easy for an advertising agency buyer to say, "Well, Brantford is covered; fine."

We have done a little work on this in the last year. We are the only newspaper in an under-50,000 circulation last year, 1969, that showed a decrease in national advertising.

The Chairman: I was going to make that point. That is true.

Mr. J. Preston: We are the exception in this particular bracket. And we are concerned about it. And we have talked with people in Toronto. We have talked with national advertising representatives who are calling for other people; and they just cannot come up with any answer that can be made to stand up.

We hear the story, "Well, you were a depressed area. You got cited some years ago as a depressed area instead of a designated area"—which really turned out to be a boom for the city. But we have not been able to unsell that thought.

The Chairman: Does CKPC have trouble attracting national advertising, the same problem?

Mr. J. Preston: I would have to guess at the answer to that one, sir, because we hear that you can get any kind of a rate you want at CKPC. I am told—and I don't know this for a fact—that their rate card is not their Bible. Our rate card is.

I know there are times, fairly prime times, on the radio station that they do not have filled periodically, and perhaps they could carry more. I don't know.

The Chairman: So you really don't know whether they have the same problem as you?

Mr. J. Preston: I know that any time we talk to Dick about doing a joint promotion on Brantford, he says, "Okay, let us go. Anything we can do to sell Brantford, that is fine."

The Chairman: Do you use the radio station to promote your newspaper?

Mr. J. Preston: No, sir. We have at times. And they have used ours.

The Chairman: On a contra basis?

Mr. J. Preston: On a contra basis. It did not turn out to be very satisfactory.

The Chairman: I was going to ask you what you were doing to develop this national thing. I guess you have answered that by saying you are worrying about it.

Mr. J. Preston: We are worrying about it. We have men on the road, so to speak, making calls two days a week in Toronto. And twice a year they spend a week in Montreal calling on the agencies and advertisers. We are sending out promotion material at all times.

The Chairman: Sorry; go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: Your newspaper has a contract with the American Newspaper Guild?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes, sir. Well, it is under negotiation.

Mr. Fortier: You mean, it has expired?

Mr. J. Preston: It has expired, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. How long have you had the contract with the Guild?

Mr. J. Preston: 1956, I think.

Mr. F. W. Pollard, Director, The Brantford Expositor: Yes. I think it is about twelve years.

Mr. J. Preston: I think they were certified in 1956.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it doesn't matter. It is for some years now?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You may have read or heard that Mr. Bassett of The Telegram when he came before the Committee before Christmas said that the Guild had improved the professional calibre of reporters and editors by bringing about better salaries and working conditions.

Do you agree with that statement?

Mr. J. Preston: Pete, do you want to answer that?

Mr. P. Preston: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Why hasn't the Guild been able to win contracts with more than a dozen Canadian newspapers, then?

Mr. J. Preston: They will have to answer that one, sir.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to get your opinion.

Mr. P. Preston: Just frankly, I don't know, sir.

The Chairman: Mr. Pollard, do you have an opinion on that?

Mr. Pollard: Yes. There is one reason when you enter into a contract with the Guild you pay all your reporters the same rates of pay, unless you want to give them merit increases. I would say for the man who has ability it is a disadvantage to work under union contract. I think it loses some of the opportunity to improve himself, not only work-wise but also earning-wise.

Mr. Fortier: Has that complaint ever been voiced to you by some of your employees who are members of the Guild?

Mr. Pollard: Well, they are always after merit increases. And it is quite a problem. Once you get into that field, it is well known. And then everyone wants a merit increase. Why have a contract at all?

Mr. Fortier: So that complaint has been voiced?

Mr. Pollard: Oh, yes, very definitely.

Mr. J. Preston: We have some now of merit increases.

Mr. Pollard: We have had to take a star that we are not going to grant them, because we are getting too much trouble with them.

Mr. Fortier: With the Guild?

Mr. Pollard: No, with the individual employee. The employees were approaching us for merit increases, not the Guild.

Mr. Fortier: I appreciate that. But you grant some merit increases, do you?

Mr. Pollard: We have granted them.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Pollard: But our policy now is not to grant them because of the problems you run into through granting them.

Mr. Fortier: I see—with the Guild?

Mr. J. Preston: With the rest of the reporters.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

On page 5 of your brief you refer to an investigation of the Brantford Police Department which was thoroughly covered by The Expositor, and also to an investigation of the Brantford Welfare Department.

My question to you is this: did your newspaper play any part in bringing about the investigations by exposing abuses in the departments? Or did you just play them up after?

Mr. P. Preston: I can answer that, sir. In both of these cases we reported what was going on after, in a sense, the investigation got started.

Mr. Fortier: I missed that; I am sorry.

Mr. P. Preston: We were not instrumental in bringing on the investigations.

Mr. Fortier: Do you consider that this may be a role of the newspaper?

Mr. P. Preston: Yes. I would say if we have knowledge of something that is going wrong in City Hall, then we should do our best to bring it out in the open.

Mr. Fortier: You would not shy away from doing, would you?

Mr. P. Preston: Oh, no, no.

Mr. Fortier: Have you in recent years covered instances where all was not well in any sector of your community—public sector or your community?

Mr. J. Preston: I would like to answer that, and be vague, if I may, because of the circumstances. But there was a problem in the judiciary in Brantford a few years ago. And I went to the Police Commission and said that this matter either had to be cleared up or we were going to have to carry it in the newspaper; and we don't want to carry it in the newspaper because we don't think it is a good thing for the people involved. And it concerned drunkenness on the bench.

It was in the time when Porter was the Attorney-General in Toronto. And there were frequent phone calls to him. And finally the matter was taken care of.

Now, this was fairly common knowledge to me at the paper. There was some knowledge within the community, but we did not feel it was going to do any person any good to air it publicly.

Mr. Fortier: What standard did you apply there, Mr. Preston, when you elected to go as a private citizen to the—did you say Police...?

Mr. J. Preston: To the Police Commission.

Mr. Fortier: Police Commission, rather than in the story in your newspaper. When you made that decision it was John Preston the citizen rather than John Preston the publisher acting; is that correct?

Mr. J. Preston: No. I would think it was the publisher acting, sir, at that time.

Mr. Fortier: Would you explain?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, I went there saying that if something was not done to correct this situation we would have to conduct a campaign that this man was not capable of sitting on the bench.

Mr. Fortier: If you had received a letter to the editor from a citizen complaining of that particular fact, would you have published it?

Mr. J. Preston: If it conforms within the law of libel, yes.

Mr. Fortier: You would have published it. So then the distinction here is that the news came to you in a form other than through a letter to the editor?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, it came to us through our staff.

Mr. Fortier: Through your staff. Did any member of your staff ask for your permission to print the story?

Mr. J. Preston: No. This was a matter of decision of whether we wanted to malign this family. And it is a big family. And the children of this family are all gainfully employed in Brantford at the moment, and surrounding area. When I say "big family", there were 14 children. And we felt that perhaps we could accomplish what was needed to be done by not publishing and not running down the family. It is a fine line.

Senator McElman: Would you have felt the same if he was a childless, lecherous old bachelor?

The Chairman: Old bachelor?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes. I don't like to run anybody down if we don't have to.

Senator McElman: Did the law of libel have any bearing in your decision?

Mr. J. Preston: No, not at that time.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: In answer to one of my earlier questions you said if the information had come to you by way of a letter from one of the citizens you would have published the letter.

Mr. J. Preston: Our policy, sir, quite frankly, is to publish all letters as long as they are within slander, and of reasonable length.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever nixed (if that is an acceptable word)...

The Chairman: Yes, that is an acceptable word.

Mr. Fortier: From a French-Canadian.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever nixed publication of a story by one of your reporters for similar considerations?

The Chairman: You understand his meaning?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes.

Peter? I don't remember one.

Mr. P. Preston: I cannot remember one, sir.

Mr. J. Preston: I will go one step further, sir. Most of the time I don't know what is in the paper until I read it when I get home, as far as what the reporters are turning in.

Mr. Fortier: Who oversees the newspaper before it is put on the press?

Mr. J. Preston: Our city editor.

Mr. Fortier: He is...?

Mr. J. Preston: Under Peter. It is Peter's responsibility.

Mr. Fortier: Do you read every newspaper before it goes out?

Mr. P. Preston: No. I don't see everything that goes in. I do have a conference with the news desk men, the editors, sports editor, and women's page, every morning. And we discuss what is going in the paper for that day as far as local news and national as well.

So that, while I don't see every story that is going in the paper before it goes in, I have got a rough idea of pretty well what is going in as far as local news and national news.

Mr. Fortier: And to your knowledge no story by any one of your reporters has ever been killed by a member of management; is that correct?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, I can't remember one.

Mr. P. Preston: I can't remember one.

Mr. J. Preston: If you have got a case in point, bring it out, sir.

Mr. Fortier: No. Please don't think that I do. This just followed your earlier comments.

Mr. J. Preston: Quite frankly, our news staff have a great deal of freedom in reporting. And there is no check on what they submit. They have their beats and their assignments and so forth.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have any trouble holding onto your staff in Brantford?

Mr. J. Preston: We have had very little turnover in the last two or three years in both the reportorial department and the advertising department.

Mr. Fortier: There is no exodus to the bigger city, or to the bigger papers?

Mr. J. Preston: I guess the London Free Press are filled at the moment.

Senator Beaubien: If they are not filled, it is not so good, is it?

Mr. J. Preston: We have been and we are and we regard ourselves as a training ground for bigger papers. Costan started with us, and gradually became editor of Saturday Evening Post, and so forth. We like to boast about some of the people who have worked with us over the years.

Mr. Fortier: I have no further questions at this stage, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I just have a couple of questions.

I would like to ask what The Expositor is doing to broaden its appeal to young people.

Mr. P. Preston: Well, we are very much involved with the newspaper-in-the-classroom program. And we are sending out, I think close to 600 papers a day to mostly public schools at the moment. But we have some papers going to one high school. And we hope to, in a sense, graduate into that area as much as we can.

We have tried youth pages and so on over the years. They always get off to a flying start and then peter out. And we have found that this newspaper-in-the-classroom program serves the purpose of involving young people in reading newspapers better than anything else that we could do.

The Chairman: In your brief you indicate that The Expositor tends to concentrate in terms of new coverage on local events. And you take particular pride in your local coverage. I think that is a fair statement, reading the brief.

What does this mean in terms of your national and international coverage? For example, if I live in Brantford must I buy the Globe and Mail or the London Free Press or the Toronto Star to get a broader coverage?

Mr. J. Preston: The only reason you would need to buy either of the two morning papers, in our opinion, would be to get a better stock market summary than we carry. They both carry a complete list of the markets. We carry a fairly complete list as of 12.30 p.m. and we like to feel that as far as the coverage of Ontario, Canada, and the world, we are doing it as efficiently and as effectively as any other newspaper in Canada.

As I said in my brief, my verbal brief, a number of people that come back from a holiday in Florida or California, or any place: It is nice to get back to a paper that gives us something of the whole world." This is the reaction we get from our own subscribers. So I guess we are doing a satisfactory job.

The Chairman: So this local coverage is not at the expense of...

Mr. J. Preston: No, sir. We average a minimum of 120 columns of news in the paper a day, including photographs. And we carry a large percentage of the Canadian Press service in that, let us say, they submit us with 5 columns (this is a round figure) day in and day out. That is a guesstimate. We use 40 columns of that—thirty-five to forty columns day in and day out. The rest is photographs and local sports.

The Chairman: How could CP's coverage be improved?

Mr. P. Preston: I don't know how it could be improved, because as a person who sees a lot of it, I think it is pretty good.

The Chairman: So you don't think it could be improved?

Mr. P. Preston: Not that I would think of, no.

CP might have perhaps more staff members in other corners of the world than they do. But as far as the coverage of Canada is concerned, I think they do a very good job.

The Chairman: I mean, their broad coverage. Do you think they do a better job in terms of covering Canada than they do in terms of their international coverage?

Mr. P. Preston: For comparison, in Canada they have 104 daily newspapers working for them as well as their staffers and their bureaux. I am not too sure at the moment just how many staffers they have in other parts of the world, but between what the CP staffers supply, and the Canadian Press exchange arrangements with Reuters and AP and Agence France Presse, CP could perhaps take over some of that role themselves. But I do not think it is necessary.

The Chairman: Do you think it would be desirable?

Mr. P. Preston: Let us put it this way: it would be nice to have. But I don't know whether we would benefit by doing it that way—by having all of the world events covered by Canadian Press men. I do not think it is necessary.

The Chairman: Do you not think there is a Canadian point of view for over there?

Mr. P. Preston: Oh, I have heard it said that Associated Press in the United States has an American viewpoint. But we carry a lot of news that comes to us from the Associated Press and from Reuters; and I do not detect an American view in there too much.

The Chairman: Do you detect a Canadian view?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, it is all selected by Canadian Press trained staff—the AP bureaux and Reuters bureaux.

The Chairman: Selected, but not written?

Mr. J. Preston: Selected.

The Chairman: I might say I am asking you for my information what your opinions are.

Mr. J. Preston: There are some men in the audience who are much more qualified on Canadian Press matters than I am—two vice-presidents...

The Chairman: We will ask them the same questions.

Senator Sparrow: Under your heading of "Press Councils"...

Mr. J. Preston: Yes, sir?

Senator Sparrow: There is a couple of subjects there. One is that you refer to the fact that, if a complaint has substance and requires correction, you make amends. Do you give equal prominence to corrections?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes, sir. Any time we make a correction we try to put it in the same place in the paper with the same-sized heading.

Senator Sparrow: On the same page?

Mr. J. Preston: One the same page. The same page is sometimes hard to do, because of advertising perhaps moving it, and so forth, but we try to duplicate its location as closely as possible.

Senator Sparrow: This looks after, in other words, the grievances that you were referring to?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: You suggest you are not in favour of press councils of any description. I would gather that. You say your newspaper can look after the aggrieved reader.

Is there not room for both, though? You suggest—you can read between the lines, at least, that you say if there was a press council this would make it less convenient for people who were aggrieved.

Would not your same system work, though? People with a grievance could still come to you but, if they in fact did not get satisfaction—and I don't think you nor anybody in any business can say that they satisfy everyone's complaints at all times—that there would be an additional place for complaints as such to go?

Now, with this argument do you still feel there is no area for a press council as such?

Mr. J. Preston: I think one answer to that might be that, if it had been in effect and if you were dealing with some person who was a little difficult to get along with, you might just say, "Well, why don't you take it to the press council?" and slough it off.

It is quite common for both Peter and myself to get phone calls at night at home from people who are unhappy with the way we have treated a story, or the fact that we have carried certain things in the paper. And we feel that the fact that they can call us up, and see our name on the masthead of the paper; they call us up at home; our phone numbers are listed; this gives them a chance to air their beef. And if they wish a correction we will carry the correction.

Sometimes it is a matter of explaining policy to them. If they are charged with impaired driving, as far as we are concerned it is automatic. It does not matter to us who it is, it is going to go, provided it happens within our own jurisdiction. And there is a standing order in the shop: if Peter and I get picked up on impaired driving it goes on the front page.

Senator Beaubien: It has never happened has it?

Mr. P. Preston: No.

Mr. Fortier: So you don't drive.

Mr. J. Preston: Let us not commit ourselves to that.

Senator Sparrow: This still does not really answer the question, though.

Mr. J. Preston: No, it does not, sir.

I have kicked it around. I don't know whether it would help or not. I think it would depend on how it was meeting, where it was meeting, how it was held, and what trouble the individual would have to go to to appear before this council.

We do not feel that we have that many grievances that do not get satisfied one way or another.

Peter was telling us at lunch today of a woman who phoned. Normally on an anonymous call we answer, "If you don't wish to tell me who you are, do you mind if I end the conversation?" But he just felt in this case she had something she wanted to get off her chest.

How long did it go; half an hour?

Mr. P. Preston: A good half-hour.

Mr. J. Preston: But when she was finished her attitude was: "Well, I feel better; I have got it off my chest."

If this is not a pretty good press council for relieving grievances, what is?

Senator Sparrow: Well, it is good public relations, yes.

Mr. J. Preston: I mean, we are available. go down to the curling club; I go down to the golf club. Mr. Pollard does. And we are available to people.

Senator Sparrow: But that would not change if in fact there was a press council. Or, at least, I would not think it should change.

Mr. J. Preston: Well, it should not.

Senator Sparrow: You seem rather definite in your brief in opposition to a press council.

any description. Are you falling away a little bit from that now, in your verbal statement, that this may be not a bad thing; that there are maybe areas where it would be useful?

Mr. J. Preston: Well, frankly, I cannot see where it would be of use in our case.

Senator Sparrow: I see. Okay.

Mr. J. Preston: At the moment.

Senator Sparrow: Thanks.

The Chairman: One answer troubled me just a little bit, Mr. Preston. You say you go to the golf club and the curling club. There are an awful lot of people in Brantford who do not belong to the golf club or the curling club.

Mr. J. Preston: That is right.

The Chairman: Do they have the same access to you?

Mr. J. Preston: Not at the golf club. But they can come in the door. They can come into the office. The telephone is there.

The Chairman: Would you not agree, though—and please don't let me put words in your mouth—that some guy working on the line, or the wife of some guy who was working on the line in a factory in Brantford, it would be a major undertaking for that person to come in and see you in your office, as opposed to somebody who can speak to you on the twelfth tee or in the locker room at the club, someone who moves in your particular social circle?

Mr. J. Preston: It might be an undertaking for him to come into the office, but, I assure you, there is no problem for them to call me on the phone. Because they do.

The Chairman: I would suggest a particular kind of person—the kind of people who write letters to Senators and Members of Parliament—that there are a lot of other people who perhaps are not that aggressive.

Mr. P. Preston: Perhaps I could answer that.

I would think if this person finds it quite an undertaking to call one of us on the telephone and air a grievance, I don't think he would ever be bothered with the press council either.

The Chairman: Well, he might be. I don't know. That is an interesting answer. I don't know.

Mr. Fortier: In the same vein, supposing, gentlemen, there was only one such aggrieved person in any given year who, either after having been dealt with by one of you gentlemen or not having been dealt with by one of you gentlemen, felt that he or she could go to a press council, air his or her particular beef, and then possibly have her side of a particular story published in your newspaper. Would that not in your mind justify the usefulness of a press council?

As Senator Sparrow said earlier, you cannot please everybody all the time.

Mr. J. Preston: My objection to the point that you have just made is that I am going to assume there is a lapse of time between the event and the hearing.

Mr. Fortier: There may be.

Mr. J. Preston: Well, I cannot see it happening the next day, with all due respect to any press council that may be meeting in Toronto or...

Mr. Fortier: Well, it may be a community press council.

Mr. J. Preston: Well, if it is a community press council that can be convened immediately, that is one thing. But I am assuming that there is a lapse of time. Then we carry her side of the story three months later.

My feeling is that at that time we are re-opening an old sore by people saying, "Well, what is this all about?" type of thing. The memory of people sometimes is not very long.

Mr. Fortier: Without at all taking away the role which you feel you now play in receiving complaints from your readers, is it your unqualified statement that a press council which would operate as a sort of court of appeal, which would be a court of honour, as they have in England, has no views whatsoever, has no role whatsoever to play in Canada? Is that your statement?

Mr. J. Preston: You are making a very broad statement. I would not go that far, no.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Going back to the matter of the hypothetical question of whether your paper might at some point come up for sale, and looking again at the possibility of local share ownership, that sort of arrangement...

Mr. J. Preston: Yes.

Senator McElman: Would such a possibility shade your judgment that it still should go to the highest bidder, if there was a relatively close range?

Mr. J. Preston: I think we would probably favour keeping it local, all things being reasonably equal.

Senator McElman: Right.

Senator Sparrow: I have one question on that point, sir.

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead.

Senator Sparrow: In the possible sale of your newspaper within three years...

Mr. J. Preston: Who put that time on it?

Senator Sparrow: You used the figure of three years in some context. I thought you had. Okay, I will take it back.

In the discussion on succession duties, was this the purpose of your consideration of sale—only because of succession duties? Is it this important?

Mr. J. Preston: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Thank you.

Senator McElman: Supplementary on another point that was discussed: this matter of publishing the names of owners; it has been suggested in one of the briefs we have had and you are not against the principle of it. But in this violent society (I believe were the words they used) the owners and principal officers of the company would be reluctant because they would fear a rash of crank phone calls and the possibility of violence to the person of themselves or their families.

Do you feel that this is a valid point of view?

Mr. J. Preston: No, sir. This has never crossed our minds. We just took the attitude that it is known around Brantford, The Expositor is owned by the Preston family. And fine; we have no objection to publishing a list of shareholders.

Senator McElman: Then could we expand that? And I realize this is asking for an opinion. Would you think that Canada today is in such a state that any publisher or owner should fear this sort of thing?

Mr. J. Preston: No, I do not.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

On the matter that Senator Davey raised about how you deal with youth, has the format or the presentation by your newspaper changed to any degree in the face of the so-called new morality of youth? Is there any specific change in your approach?

Mr. P. Preston: I would not say so. We have always tried to deal with the youthful activities going on in the city, or in our circulation area.

Senator McElman: Excuse me. I am thinking more, sir, of—well, drugs, which is quite a problem. Are you doing any in-depth work by your staffers in research, on trying to be of assistance to youth in pointing out perhaps the dangers involved, and so on?

Mr. P. Preston: Our own staff has not done research in this way by themselves. But we have a very close liaison with two men who are working with the Drug Addiction Foundation in Toronto. And these two men are regional representatives for Brantford and, think, Kitchener and Simcoe.

As a result of our association with these two men we have carried quite a lot of discussions, panel discussions, reports, and so on about the drug addiction problem, yes.

Senator McElman: Are there any outward evidences in the Brantford area of a challenging by youth of the accepted elements of society, of the church, of the Establishment so-called, and so on? Are these fully reported?

Mr. P. Preston: Yes. Any time this is a matter of discussion at a meeting of any type we report it quite fully.

Senator McElman: And do you endeavor to lead in any fashion with other editorials feature stories, and so on?

Mr. P. Preston: We have carried feature stories, and we have had editorials on the drug addiction problem, as to whether marijuana should be legalized, and this type of thing.

Senator McElman: Then you feel you are reacting to the so-called problems?

Mr. P. Preston: Yes, I would say we are.

Senator McElman: Fine. Thank you.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, I was going to terminate, but if you have a question?

Mr. Fortier: I have one last question, if I may, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You speak very eloquently on pages 2 and 3 of technological improvements in your plant, Mr. Preston. And I wonder if you have found your craft unions resistant to these improvements in Brantford.

Mr. J. Preston: Our craft unions have gone along with us on all improvements. Because when we start to think about it we bring them in. We take them right along with us, right through our planning stage. We take them away on a trip to Toronto to see the equipment, and so forth.

We have had no problem in modernizing our program in any way whatsoever.

Mr. Fortier: Has your manpower decreased, though?

Mr. J. Preston: No, sir.

Mr. Fortier: I has not, due to these improvements?

Mr. J. Preston: Our manpower has stayed about the same with the increased volume of business.

Mr. Pollard: And increased time off.

Mr. J. Preston: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Otherwise it would have increased?

Mr. J. Preston: Otherwise the staff would have greatly increased. If we had not put in these things we have we would have had at least another ten men on the floor.

Mr. Fortier: I see. Thank you.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, gentlemen, I would like to thank you for coming here this afternoon as requested.

In drawing up our list of witnesses, of necessity we could not ask everyone in the country. We asked you for some of the reasons outlined in the early stages of your brief. You come from one of the smallest counties in Ontario, facing keen competition from every part of the county. You are an independent newspaper. These are some of the reasons why we asked you.

It has been a valuable session for us. We are grateful to you. I suppose to express our appreciation I should make it clear that you did not say that The Expositor was for sale.

Mr. J. Preston: It is not at the moment for sale, sir.

We are very pleased if we have been of any assistance to your Committee.

The Chairman: Thank you.

—Short Recess.

(Upon resuming at 3.15 p.m.)

The Chairman: If I might call this session to order, this afternoon we are going to receive the brief from Le Droit.

While I am speaking in English, much of the presentation indeed probably will be in French. I should say for the benefit of senators and visitors that we have the translation service available.

The representatives of Le Droit are with me. On my immediate right is Aurèle Gratton, Vice-President and Director General.

On my immediate left is Jean-Robert Bélanger, Treasurer and Director of Personnel.

On his immediate left is Marcel Gingras, the Editor in Chief.

Mr. Gratton, the brief which you were kind enough to prepare for us as requested was received in advance as requested. It has been circulated to the senators. It has presumably been studied by them.

The procedure we follow here is to allow you an opening statement of perhaps ten, twelve, fifteen minutes, in which you can explain your brief, expand upon it, amplify it, add to it, say anything else which may be on your mind. And then we will proceed to question you.

The senators will be free to question you on the contents of your brief, but they may wish to ask you questions about the comments you make now, or indeed about other aspects of journalism in Canada.

Mr. Gratton, thank you.

Mr. Aurèle Gratton, Vice-President and Director General, Le Droit: Mr. President, senators, I just want to say first of all that is it not a question of being biased. Is that the word that we should use?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Gratton: If we are going to make our presentation in French. But on the other hand, I think it would be preferable for us because it is always easier to express yourself in your own language.

The Chairman: We would prefer you to make it in French.

Mr. Gratton: Thank you very much.

Everybody has the brief. I don't know if I should read it at all.

The Chairman: If you feel you would like to. It is not necessary. It has presumably been studied.

Mr. Gratton: Yes. But on the other hand the brief is only about six pages.

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Gratton: So if you don't mind, sir. . .

The Chairman: No. Please.

[Translation]

Le Droit is a printing and publishing enterprise entirely independent of any press group.

It belongs to a corporation with a federal charter which was founded in 1912. There are 148 shareholders comprising 101 known and 47 unknown shareholders.

To date, the Syndicat d'œuvres sociales Limitée still has 100 percent of the CKCH shares as well as 100 percent of the shares of Hebdo-Revue and L'Imprimerie Leclerc.

Le Droit is a member of the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association, the American Newspaper Publishers Association and Les Quotidiens du Québec Incorporée. In addition, it is a member of the Bureau International de Presse (B.I.P.) and a special contract authorizes it to reproduce all articles from the French daily, Le Figaro.

Founded primarily for French-speaking residents of Ontario who still remain its major preoccupation, Le Droit also acts as informant, spokesman and defender of French-speaking persons in western Quebec. French-language persons from all parts of Ontario and from western Quebec are therefore its chief readers and customers.

In an editorial in the first issue of Le Droit on March 27, 1913, the editor briefly outlined the raison d'être of the new daily. I quote:

In view of the distressing situation of the French Catholic schools in our province, the directors of the Syndicat d'œuvres Sociales Limitée felt it their first duty to publish daily newspaper to keep our people better informed and to prove to our opponents that we intend to fight to the end with loyal weapons.

Since then, French-speaking residents of Ontario have made good progress. However their problems have not all been resolved as evinced by the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. Le Droit is therefore still on the look-out, always ready to defend their cause. In the same way, it is concerned with French-speaking residents in western Quebec, willing to work towards their economic and social progress as towards the economic and social progress of French-language Ontario residents. Le Droit is therefore a Catholic and French Canadian newspaper, a newspaper engaged in the struggle for and defence of the educational, linguistic and religious rights of its readers and of all French Canada which, in its eyes, is not limited merely to Quebec. Unquestionably Quebec is the nucleus or heart of French Canada but its ramifications in the primarily English-speaking provinces are for Le Droit equally as important.

Independent of both federal and provincial political parties, Le Droit is also independent of governments and it intends to remain so. For this reason, it is opposed to any form of government aid to newspapers. The generosity of the State could become a very heavy chain and endanger freedom of the press. It could also result in the death of the newspapers if the latter, accustomed to State grants were suddenly deprived of this income. However, Le Droit would accept indirect aid as represented by the former postal rates, form of assistance which it considers of much greater value to readers—and I stress this point—than to the press agencies. Throughout Canada, thousands of citizens today are deprived of the news and information formerly supplied by the daily papers before the increase in postal rates.

Let me mention here that Le Droit is in a more or less special geographic situation quite unlike the other French-language daily papers in Canada. Published in the federal capital and on the border of the two provinces, it must constantly watch over the general interest of Canada. More than any other French daily, it must be the advocate of bilingualism and of the cultural duality of our country. Its range of action is therefore very vast. I might perhaps add in passing that Le Droit covers an area extending to Hearst approximately 600 miles from the capital. It must inform its readers on federal policy which, for them, often assumes the form of local politics; it must inform them on Ontario and Quebec provincial policy and, in addition, give its readers an abundance of municipal and school news in numerous Ontario and Quebec localities. Being Catholic for the most part, its readers count on it for information on matters of religion and on the great unimmaculate movement.

From the preceding are derived the editorial preoccupations of the newspaper. On this point, let me mention that the editorials are planned and that the choice of subject matter is left to the editor in chief, with no intervention on the part of the owners or management. According to the general policies determined by the owners, the writers are free to express themselves as they wish. Naturally, we accept differing viewpoints as to the methods of action but not as to the final goals. For example, a writer may write that the Canadian Constitution must be amended section by section and another may write that an entirely new Constitution must be drawn up, without taking into account the British North America Act. Basically, however, both demand the same thing: a new Constitution.

In its questionnaire, the Committee asked what was the first duty of the mass media. To inform? To interpret? To defend causes? To this we reply: to inform, naturally. The Committee will allow, however, that having informed their readers, the newspapers help them to understand the information by interpreting it. It will also allow that the newspapers defend causes. This is their social role. The daily must therefore inform, but it must do so with objectivity. It must even diffuse information which is most contrary to the views it upholds. At Le Droit we insist that headlines and headings of articles, the "leads", occur with the news. The importance of the news is obviously relative and the news is presented and arranged according to its value. A coup d'état in Iceland obviously would not have the same importance for Canadians as a coup d'état in their own country or in the United States. All in all, newspapers must avoid sensationalism.

Le Droit naturally does not live off its circulation. To exist, grow and prosper it must open its pages to commercial advertising and to mail ads. Thus, in a 42-page issue, there would be one editorial page, 17 pages of news and 24 pages of advertisements. Last year, the percentage of advertising in relation to reading matter was 52.7 percent.

With advertising as with information, Le Droit obeys a certain code of ethics. Accordingly, it will not publish an advertisement it considers false, tendentious or immoral. It will not publish an advertisement exploiting human misery, etc. As an appendix to the present brief, the Committee will find the code of ethics relative to advertising.

With regard to advertising and in reply to one of your questions, I should like to point out that competition with American publications hardly affects us, naturally because our language is French. Competition from Canadian television does affect us, however, large industrial and commercial firms devote great portions of their advertising budget to television rather than to newspapers.

As your Committee is also interested in the recruiting of journalists, I wish to state that recruitment itself does not pose serious problems for us. Each year teaching institutions produce young people capable of becoming good journalists. Unfortunately, very few of them come to us from actual schools of journalism. At Le Droit for the past 20 years, we have had only two. Like several others, these two men left us. The federal or provincial public service and government agencies very often offer salaries or wages against which we are powerless. I am thinking in particular of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which, to a basic salary often comparable to our own, adds—something which is incomprehensible—a guaranteed overtime pay equal to one-quarter or one-third of the annual salary. How can you compete with that?

As graduates from schools of journalism are fairly rare among us, as everywhere in French Canada, we see only one solution, the opening of an actual school or faculty of journalism for French-speaking persons in our area. Algonquin College already offers an elementary course in journalism, but this is not sufficient, all the more so as French-speaking applicants for this course are not a majority, even if they do exist. On the other hand, in the third year of journalism, Carleton University offers a seminar in French, but it is designed for English-speaking students. Carleton is vaguely considering the progressive introduction of other French courses in its school of journalism, but these are still in the planning stages. Although we refuse direct government assistance to newspapers we would, however, agree to provincial government assistance in establishing French journalism courses—and I stress the establishment of a French journalism course as in a news bulletin this morning, the public was given to understand that Le Droit was asking for a French course. What we are asking is that a French journalism course be introduced in any of the universities of the province, preferably the University of Ottawa in which not only young French-speaking Ontario residents but also French-speaking Quebecers could enroll.

Due to the lack of a school of journalism in our midst, Le Droit, in short, acts as a school. In fact, we are alone in training bilingual reporters in the area, hence our popularity with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Film Board and the information services of the federal government, a popularity which honours us but also impoverishes us.

To your questions on technical progress, I should like to reply that this obviously imposes heavy expenses on enterprises wishing to prosper. Technical progress, however, is inevitable. This is not the most disturbing aspect. The day of electrofax is not far off. If we do not prepare ourselves for this, the news will soon be stereotyped and the result will be a universal brainwashing of which not even the dictators have ever dreamed. To avoid this, we must rethink the whole question of work techniques in the press. It would be interesting to conduct research on the subject, but this is neither the time nor the place.

What do we mean by freedom of the press? The duty of the press is to publish, analyze and comment on all news of public interest, whatever its subject and independently of the persons in question. The exercise of this right presupposes that we scrupulously check all news as to veracity, content and origin. In addition, we must not publish anything illegal. In other words, the press is subject to the laws applicable to any individual.

Because of the preceding, we would approve the formation of a press council. It would no doubt be desirable to call for the establishment of a press council, of a Canadian council. However, given the present situation, we feel that provincial press councils would be better accepted by Quebec journalists than a national council.

Despite the political agitation we are experiencing in Canada, we are nevertheless living in a relatively calm climate if we compare it to what has occurred in other countries at other periods in history, notably in France during the last war. A press council could therefore spare us troubles and guarantee freedom of the press. A press council would be particularly useful should the day come, despite the contrary hope expressed here, when the State sees fit to support the newspapers through dangerous subsidies.

Contrary to what Balzac wrote in the last century, we do not believe that journalism is still in its infancy and that its power is just dawning. On the other hand, contrary to Marshall McLuhan, we do not believe that television is marking the end of the printed word. With Walter Lipmann, we believe rather that television is far from satisfying our curiosity and that the newspapers are not on the brink of extinction.

In conclusion, a word on the news sent to us from agencies. All this news, as you are aware, is finally forwarded to us through the Canadian Press, first in English, then in French. I must mention first that there is a delay, even in English, especially with regard to news coming to us from abroad. Secondly, I must state that with regard to French, the delay is still obviously more marked. Taking everything into account, we understand these delays, but we deplore them. We deplore them all the more, however, because most of the news which reaches us from abroad is now presented to us from a Canadian standpoint. As the Canadian Press is constantly increasing the number of its foreign correspondents, the situation is improving. We are particularly pleased with the presence in Paris of French-speaking journalists of the C.P.T. The ideal, however, would be to find other French-speaking persons elsewhere. As the C.P. is a co-operative, we feel that it deals honestly with its members.

Ideally, it would be marvellous to have French service completely in line with the English service but such a service would be prohibitive for the French-language newspapers, even if it were integrated within the English service. In 1965 it was estimated that an integrated service would increase the cost of the French language newspaper agency 21.5 per cent and that a completely separate service would increase costs by 24.7 per cent. In 1970, another 25 percent would probably have to be added to the increase predicted at that time.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think the questioning this afternoon, Mr. Gratton, will begin with Senator Beaudet.

[Translation]

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Gratton, in paragraph 2 of your brief, you appear to have lost 7 shareholders; of 148, you have 47 of whom have no record. Did you issue shares to earners?

Mr. Gratton: No, no; the shares are in the name of the persons who purchased them at the time. It must be remembered, Sir, that the shares were purchased in 1912 and 1913. Some persons have died, some have never been seen again and for this reason we cannot state that we have 47 unknown shareholders. When we sent notices of shareholder meetings, such as last year, we sent dividends for the first time in history.

Senator Beaubien: You paid dividends?

Mr. Gratton: For the first year, yes, Sir.

Senator Beaubien: The first year?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Congratulations!

Mr. Gratton: The first in 50 years.

Senator Beaubien: You paid the first dividends last year?

Mr. Gratton: The first dividend which has ever been paid at Le Droit.

Senator Beaubien: That is very good. How many shares do you have, Mr. Gratton?

Mr. Gratton: Exactly—I should perhaps ask the treasurer to answer your question.

Mr. Jean-Robert Bélanger, Treasurer, Le Droit: Of 2,000 public shares, 1,722 are issued.

Senator Beaubien: Are these common shares.

Mr. Belanger: Common shares.

Senator Beaubien: Are there preferred shares?

Mr. Belanger: None.

Senator Beaubien: No. And there are no bonds?

Mr. Belanger: Yes, we now have a few bonds which are redeemable this year, in September 1970.

Senator Beaubien: Then it is marvellous to have paid a dividend for the first time.

[Text]

Senator Everett: Would the correct figure be 1713 or 1722?

Senator Beaubien: One thousand, seven hundred and twenty-two.

[Translation]

Mr. Belanger: 1722 shares issued, and 9 shares returned, that became Treasury shares, which causes us at present to have 1713 shares, net, on the balance sheet.

[Text]

Senator Beaubien: Nine were cancelled—1,713 outstanding.

1713?

Mr. Belanger: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Gratton, in paragraph 6 you spoke of problems which French Canadians of the province of Ontario had,—and in paragraph 7, you said:

However, they are not all of them solved. What are those problems that exist today?

Mr. Gratton: Mr. Senator, it would take me too long to answer you; in order to make it short, I will ask our Chief Editor, Mr. Gingras, to answer you.

Mr. Marcel Gingras, Chief Editor, "Le Droit": There is the school problem, which has not yet been fully solved, notwithstanding the new 1968 laws in Ontario, Bill No. 141, which became Act No. 141, which authorizes, for instance, the existence of French speaking Secondary Public Schools.

Senator Beaubien: Yes.

Mr. Gingras: There are still sectors in Ontario where we must fight to obtain even primary French schools—several sectors, and notwithstanding that Act. There are still sectors in Ontario where, notwithstanding Act No. 141, which provides for secondary schools, it is materially or physically impossible to build a school. For instance, a secondary school will certainly not be opened in Hamilton for a handful of French speaking students.

Senator Beaubien: No.

Mr. Gingras: They need a regional school now, and that is a problem. Now then, there must be an understanding between the various school commissions.

There is also the question of the Universities—and we confirm directly, we, French speaking Ontarians, that the University of Ottawa and the Laurentian University are bilingual universities. However, we know quite well that, basically, the French speaking people do not sufficiently take advantage of these two institutions, so that many courses that could be given in French, are not given due to a lack of students. Algonquin College offers courses in the French language,—and there are other community colleges,—but the young people do not even wish to take advantage of them. There is, therefore, work to do among them; and it is much more up to the readers, at this time, than up to the governments.

Senator Beaubien: Yes, I understand.

Mr. Gratton: Senator, I might report to you the most recent case, the most typical case—the Champlain School, here in Ottawa, which you know.

Senator Beaubien: Yes.

Mr. Gratton: There is the Champlain Secondary School, which the School Commission had given to be taught in French, and now, the Commission came back on its decision.

Senator Beaubien: It is not true that there were not enough French Canadian students? I am not fully acquainted with the details.

Mr. Gingras: If you will allow me,—there are 5000 vacant places in the Public secondary schools in Ottawa, in which English is spoken. In the French speaking Public secondary schools, they need more places; by displacing the English speaking students that attend Champlain, and by sending them to other schools, the institution would be relieved and be placed at the disposal of the French speaking students, without increasing the taxes of the tax-payers, and without building a new school.

Senator Beaubien: That seems to make sense.

Mr. Gingras: Yes; the English speaking population is not numerous enough to fill their schools,—and we, we are too numerous for our schools.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Gratton, you state in paragraph 3, that the Syndicate still owns 100 per cent of the shares of CKCH?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: 100 per cent of the shares of “Hebdo-Revue”, and of Impri-merie Leclerc?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Does that mean that you intend to sell or dispose of them?

Mr. Gratton: You see: your question relates probably to what you have seen approximately one month ago, that Telemedia purchased CKCH.

Senator Beaubien: It was bought?

Mr. Gratton: It was bought, but nothing can be done as long as CRTC has not given its approval.

Senator Beaubien: Yes, I understand.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gratton, who controls the “Syndicat d’œuvres Sociales Limitée” today?

Mr. Gratton: I must understand you correctly. What do you mean with control?

Mr. Fortier: Who has actual control over the company?

Mr. Gratton: Control over the shares,—the Oblate Fathers.

Mr. Fortier: The “Oblats de Marie Immaculée” are having actual control over the shares,—1722 shares presently issued and outstanding?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, and I might say, if you wish, and it will better answer your question that they own 72 per cent of the shares.

Mr. Fortier: Before referring to the Oblate Fathers...

Mr. Gratton: Come on, come on.

Mr. Fortier: They own 72 per cent,—meaning, there remains 28 per cent. Are those 28 per cent distributed among the other shareholders in a very diffuse manner, or are they blocks of shares?

Mr. Gratton: No; there are persons who own one share; there are others who own five shares and others who own three shares. The reason for the fact that you are given a number of shares that are unknown is that most of those persons bought their shares in 1912 and 1913, and when they bought a share for $100 they probably thought that it was rather a gift they were making,—but the were given a piece of paper that said: you own one share. These people never showed them in their estates, because that was the way it was done. Maybe I should emphasize the historical fact that "Le Droit", a daily newspaper, was founded in 1913 with $8,700.

I am wondering, whether I should have said that today, because, from an economic point of view, that does not count any longer. However, I notice that there are several journalists in the room and it is now alleged that it takes at least three million to start a daily newspaper, if not more. If the value of the money in 1913 and in 1969 is taken into consideration, it would have taken at least from $10,000 to 150,000 to start a daily newspaper; that time,—and I, personally, believe that it was a miracle how the "Le Droit" has been able to survive all of it; I still do not understand it.

Mr. Fortier: Is it because the Oblates own 7 per cent of the shares,—it is a miracle.

Mr. Gratton: The Oblates did not own 72 per cent of the shares at that time. You know, you are asking me that question and, if you will permit, I should like to add the following.

I do not know, but I think that you Senators know what is going on; has it not already been said that a certain religious community in Canada controlled the Canada Steamship Line. If you have not heard it,—I have heard it and, furthermore, I have had figures to support it, but I cannot give them now. But, does that mean that that religious community had one word to say in the administration of the Canada Steamship Line, in a case, for instance, where a man and woman wished to rent a cabin and who were supposed to be man and wife?—No, no,—and that is the reason why I must tell you myself, that "Le Droit" has been able to survive, thanks to the Oblates.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gratton...

Mr. Gratton: If you will permit me please,—I told you earlier that our company has never paid dividends before last year,—meaning that the profits had always been reinvested in the enterprise. If it is taken into consideration that the value of the share is $1, which means that the Oblates have put approximately $138,000 in the company...

Senator Beaubien: In all, and for everything?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, in all, and for everything,—and that, today, we are going into the market for improvements, for an amount of approximately two and one half million dollars,—in 1970, for the purchase of machinery, new construction, and so on. That is the same thing,—I told you earlier, when you asked me that question,—I told you that our newspaper was catholic. That does not mean that the information given by the paper is controlled by the Oblates. Personally, I can tell you that for 23 years,—I came to the "Droit" first as manager, I then got a promotion and was appointed general manager, and later on, I got to the management's office and I became executive vice president and Director general. I can tell you, personally, and I can vow for it with my hand on the Bible, if you are interested, and I have never had, not even once, an order from the Oblates to the effect that: you must do this, you must do that.

First of all, our Board of Directors consists of seven members, of which two are Oblates and five are laymen, and I can tell you that the laymen control the "Le Droit". The Oblates are there, and with reason, because they have control over the shares. I have never felt any interference, and I can tell you, and you may have been able to observe it in the papers,—and you are reading "Le Droit", I hope,—that often "Le Droit" has published things against the community,—among others, against the University of Ottawa,—which even the English newspapers of Ottawa did not wish to touch themselves,—and we have had sharp criticism,—because we were fully independent; and we are fully independent with respect to editorial matters, first of all, and I can tell you, equally as much as to financial matters.

Personally, I have full authority at "Le Droit" as executive vice president. I receive orders from nobody; I am a member of the Board of Directors and problems are discussed during our monthly Board of Directors' meetings, and I am told this or that, and I take my personal point of view, and when a resolution is approved, that finishes it; I have control,—I have never had any interference,—and Mr. Gingras, who is chief editor of "Le Droit" can tell you that he has had never, not even once, interference from the Community of the Oblates. Not only that, you should not forget that the Oblates not only contributed here,—I knew that that question would come up, and that is why I was prepared...

Mr. Fortier: There has been no criticism from this part.

Mr. Gratton: No, there has been no criticism, but I should like to put my points cross, to bring out the point of view of the company.

Mr. Fortier: You have answered almost all the questions which I was going to ask.

Mr. Gratton: There is one other question, which I can answer, that the Oblates have greatly contributed...

Mr. Fortier: This is bigger than a miracle because you are able to answer a question which I have not asked!

Mr. Gratton: I expected that question!

The Oblates have contributed to the survival of French in Canada, not only in Ontario, but outside Quebec, everywhere. Take the schools and the University, as well as the newspapers in Ontario—meaning us—and in Manitoba and also in Saskatchewan; they went there with their contributions. I am convinced that they are still putting money in it in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. But not in Ottawa. I have never asked the Oblates for one dime to operate the "Le Droit", since I have been there, since 23 years.

Mr. Fortier: Is there a reason why the actual owner of "Le Droit", meaning the community of "Oblats de Marie-Immaculee" is not mentioned in your paper, for example in the heading, on the editorial page? This is a question which we are asking everybody appearing before the committee, meaning, whether the name of the true owner should not be printed in the paper?

Mr. Gratton: Listen, you have the name, which is the "Syndicat d'Oeuvres Sociales Limitee,"—which is a strange name, which is ridiculous—that is my impression because, when you get to Toronto among the English, they are asking: the Syndicat—what does that mean?—the word "œuvre",—they don't know how to pronounce it in English, they say "œuvre"—they do not know how to pronounce and they say, "What does it mean?"

That is the reason why we are trying to have a change of name for "Le Droit Limitee". I should not like to have "Le Droit Limitee", I have tried to have "Le Droit Incorporee", because "Le Droit Limitee" becomes limited, is that not so. But, we cannot have it, because it is a Federal charter, and steps are presently being undertaken by our attorneys, in order that the owner of "Le Droit" becomes "Le Droit Limitee".

Mr. Fortier: Meaning, a change of name?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, definitely.

Mr. Fortier: Did you take that decision quite recently?

Mr. Gratton: Six months ago.

Mr. Fortier: The attorneys. That does not go fast!—I come back to the question, such as is it correct that it is mentioned in your paper that the paper is published by Le Syndicat d'Oeuvres Sociales Limitee, on the editorial page—but, would you object to the fact that under the heading "Le Syndicat D'Oeuvre Sociales Limitee", or "Le Droit Incorporee", is mentioned that the community of Oblats de Marie-Immaculee is the owner, or owns 75 per cent of the shares of the company?

Mr. Gratton: Quite definitely. Why?

Mr. Fortier: You would object?

Mr. Gratton: To say that?—yes. But why? Are we not a company with a Federal charter? We are a Federal company.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gratton, do not think this is a question which we only pose to Mr. Gratton; it is a question asked of all the witnesses appearing before the committee.

Mr. Gratton: I will now answer you, and Mr. Gingras is here, and he can tell you—has asked me for at least one year why we not show the name of the owners.

I expect to have the name changed from "Syndicat D'Oeuvres Sociales Limitee" to "Droit Limitee" to show that Aurele Gratton, Director general, Marcel Gingras, chief editor and Jean-Robert Belanger, treasurer; it will be indicated in that manner. But it serves a useful purpose to make a change at this time, and to make another change six months later, we are waiting for it, but it takes time. However, as I said earlier, does the Canadian Steamship Line show that the such and such nuns have control over the company?

Mr. Fortier: Unfortunately, they do not publish a newspaper.

Mr. Gratton: Listen,—they have a prospectus which they mailed when they borrowed, and they have never shown that the nuns control the company.

Senator Beaubien: The "Montreal Star" is never shown who controls the "Montreal Star" either?

Mr. Gratton: No.

Mr. Fortier: Do you not believe that in the case of a newspaper in Canada we should be interested in that question in a different manner, than when dealing, for instance, with a company operating ships, or a company selling grain?

Mr. Gratton: I fail to see the difference. You speak of "Le Droit", but do you know what we are doing a bigger business with our commercial printing than with the newspaper?

Mr. Fortier: No, but I am interested to know if you are doing a bigger printing business?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Greater profits?

Mr. Gratton: Yes,—Because the commercial printing business is the best organized,—because I would not wish the people from Montreal to think that we are better organized than many others in Montreal and in Toronto; between Montreal and Toronto, our company is the best organized from the point of view of commercial printing businesses.

Mr. Fortier: You are, therefore, saying that you would look askance at the publication in our newspaper of the shareholders who control the limited company?

Mr. Gratton: Well, listen,—have you ever seen a company that tells you, for instance, that one of your senators controls in excess of five million, let us say, in that business? Let us say, for instance, that it is a liquor company, would it say that that senator owns five million shares, who controls the company? Why? Listen,—let us reverse the roles,...

Mr. Fortier: We are speaking of a newspaper, Mr. Gratton.

Mr. Gratton: What difference does it make?

Mr. Fortier: It is just that...

Mr. Gratton: It is a limited company with a federal charter.

Mr. Fortier: Therefore, in your testimony, you say that there is no difference between a company operating a newspaper and a company selling liquor? Is that correct?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, clearly... absolutely. Don't you agree with me on that?

Mr. Fortier: Unfortunately, it is not up to me to give testimony.

Mr. Gratton: I am asking you the question, now. You asked me the question, I answered you, and now...

Mr. Fortier: We are here to hear testimony from people with interests in this field.

Mr. Gratton: I would not have you think I was trying to be clever, there; it was for my own information; perhaps if I knew what you were thinking, I could change my ideas.

Mr. Fortier: Certain opinions have been expressed, Mr. Gratton, to the effect that in the field of newspaper journalism, the question of responsibility to the public, to the community, was extremely important, and that in the Hull region and in the Ottawa region, for example, in this case, as you say, it is the Order of the Oblate Fathers of Mary Immaculate that is, in effect, the owner of the newspaper. Well, that is important.

There is another example of the same thing in Saskatchewan—a company called XYZ Limited; but I personally think it is important to know that it is Mr. Sifton who controls XYZ Limited.

A number of people have expressed the opinion, before this Committee, that the corporate veil should be lifted, and that the names of those who own shares in the newspaper should be made public. I am not saying that the Committee leans in one direction rather than another; I am asking you the question. I am not a senator, don't look at me.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Gratton has answered...

Mr. Gratton: So you do not live in the area?

Mr. Fortier: No. I am from Montreal.

Mr. Gratton: Yes, because in this area, everyone, when speaking of CKCH, Le Droit, Hebdo-Revue, and so on, it's the Oblate Fathers, and they say so.

Senator Beaubien: They know it?

Mr. Gratton: There is no need to publish it, for that matter.

Mr. Fortier: Even though I am from Montreal, I knew it. But you anticipated my question, Mr. Gratton, by saying that the Order had at no time exercised any control whatsoever over the administration of the newspaper. Is that correct?

Mr. Gratton: Excuse me, I did not say "over the administration"—not only over the administration, but even over the newspaper's opinions. I told you just now to ask Mr. Gingras whether the Oblate Father had ever asked him to write such and such pro or con; not con, of course—but I would like Mr. Gingras to tell you.

Mr. Fortier: I shall put the question to Mr. Gingras.

Mr. Gingras: I have quite often had occasion to write articles against the University of Ottawa—not the University as such, but certain aspects of life at the University of Ottawa. Almost every time, I received comments from Oblate fathers who were most indignant—but none of that did anything to change my mind. They tried to show me that I was being too harsh, or that I was exaggerating, that I was not taking account of the courses open to them, and so on. Sometimes, they gave me information that enabled me to write a new editorial; but they have never made me change my mind.

For example, I still maintain, as I have written, that when the University of Ottawa's Faculty of Medicine was founded, it should have been made a French faculty; at that time, it would have been sufficient to hire French-speaking professors and say that it was a French faculty, and it would have become French.

Whenever I wrote this, they complained. Others wrote it before I did, however, and they complained then, too; but we are still writing it.

Mr. Fortier: Have they written you letters that you have published?

Mr. Gingras: Letters? No, never.

Mr. Fortier: Not at any time?

Mr. Gingras: No.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gingras, have they never suggested, directly or indirectly, that they were the owners of Le Droit, and that you should not publish such articles?

Mr. Gingras: Never, not once. Last year—I am going back to the previous question—a case occurred that is fairly typical, I think: when the Faculty of Education was being established, and the provincial Government in Toronto wanted to make it a predominantly French faculty, not to say exclusively French; the university authorities wanted to make it a bilingual faculty—in other words, to train French-language and English-language teachers. Personally, I took the provincial Government's side against the University authorities—I was criticized, of course, but took no notice; I said: that is your opinion mine is different and similar to that of the provincial Government. The Government in Toronto is offering us something, and we are refusing it.

Mr. Gratton: Anyway, it's the same thing—there may be, I won't say "suckers", but all kinds of people who belong to such and such a group, who are going to make representations to us. But it's the dog that wags the tail.

Mr. Fortier: Do you receive any pressure of that sort?

Mr. Gratton: There again, that is question...

Mr. Fortier: You know, I have not followed the discussions here, the last month, but...

Mr. Gratton: As I said just now, in the 25 years I have been with Le Droit, I have never had telephone calls in which they let fly and chewed me out. First of all, my personal commitment was that I had interference from none, and as long as it served their purpose, would stay there; they kept me for 23 years and so I shall be retiring soon.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gratton, what role do the Oblate Fathers of Mary Immaculate play in the newspaper, Le Droit?

Mr. Gratton: None; and I can tell you that our board of directors meets every month; I have seen such things as proposals put forward by an Oblate father that were rejected because there were five against two.

Mr. Fortier: I think you explained just now that you were three against two?

Mr. Gratton: No, five against two; the laymen have control of Le Droit.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gratton, when did you decide to sell the CKCH shares?

Mr. Gratton: About three months ago without consulting the board of directors.

Mr. Fortier: I take it, of course, that the decision was confirmed by the board of directors?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, it was, afterwards.

Mr. Fortier: You say, "without consultation". So it was you who took the decision together with your colleagues?

Mr. Gratton: Well, you see, that becomes a very delicate question, because it could be thought that I am supreme, and that I do as I wish at Le Droit.

Mr. Fortier: Well, in order to get away from this delicate aspect, I shall put the question this way: when the decision was made, was it made on a question of principle, namely, that the owner of a newspaper should not at the same time be the owner of a radio station?

Mr. Gratton: I am happy you asked me that question; that is precisely the reason why—and note well—what we did was to sell only the radio part.

Mr. Fortier: Of CKCH?

Mr. Gratton: Yes; the properties are being retained—they are worth much more than the other part. We are not in business as a real estate agency, but if the CRTC approves the sale, we are selling all we have—even the property and a piece of land in Deschênes.

Mr. Fortier: As you know, of course, that is one of the problems the Committee will have to deal with: an individual or a company's ownership of various information media, that is the written press and the electronic press—and you decided that you should not have an owner of both. Could the Committee hear your reasons for that? How did you arrive at that decision?

Mr. Gratton: In the first place, as I was saying just now, Le Droit is expanding; the expansion has been fairly considerable over, say, the last four or five years, and we naturally had to concentrate all our efforts into a single organization, the press organization. I find it was a waste of time to divide our efforts between two organizations, instead of concentrating all of them on Le Droit. The purpose of that was, and I do not know whether you saw the statement that was issued on December 18:

...has decided to sell the radio equipment of CKCH in order to concentrate all efforts on the improvement of the newspaper and the modernization of its equipment.

Mr. Fortier: Am I to understand that from a social point of view, you see no objection to one person's controlling both a radio station and a newspaper in the same area of Canada—or do you have an objection?

Mr. Gratton: Well, you see—we have run CKCH-Le Droit for about 25 years; I did not notice too many objections. But on the other hand, I do not like setting myself up as a judge on that point; it is rather for the Committee...

Mr. Fortier: We want to hear your views; that was the reason for your coming here, to give us your opinions.

Mr. Gratton: Of course, there is always a danger if opinion in a city is concentrated using the newspaper, the radio and television—that can probably become dangerous; but I would not say that it is dangerous to that extent.

Mr. Fortier: At what point can it become dangerous? Let us not discuss specific cases, but in general terms? At what point can it become dangerous?

Mr. Gratton: Well, look, you know as well as I that if you control the thinking of a whole community—it depends on the owners.

Mr. Fortier: If I understand aright, it is the inherent power that is dangerous, is it not, because as long as the power is properly exercised, obviously there is no problem? But is the Committee to understand that it is the exercise of that power that could be dangerous?

Mr. Gratton: Not necessarily.

Mr. Fortier: Could you conceive, say, in Canada, a region—or I could go farther and say: a province—in which all the information media were controlled by one person? Is it a good thing or a bad thing, in your opinion?

Mr. Gratton: In one province, it certainly is not a good thing.

Mr. Fortier: In a municipality, or a town?

Mr. Gratton: It still depends on the owners, for example. As you know, the Southams and the Lord Thomsons are often mentioned, but after all, those people are left in complete freedom to express their opinions.

Mr. Fortier: What makes you say that?

Mr. Gratton: Well, look, I have many colleagues in newspaper chains—Southam, Thomson, F.P.—and as far as the newspaper's opinion is concerned, we may say that they are certainly free to express it.

Senator Beaubien: Like you?

Mr. Gratton: And I think that yesterday, I saw and read a copy of the report that Norman Smith is to present to you tomorrow, I believe; it cannot be said that the Ottawa Journal is controlled by F. P. Publications. Administratively speaking, certainly; you know, it is like control of the press; it is constantly said that one group controls the entire press; the Montreal group will be mentioned.

It is preferable for it to be in private hands; but on the other hand, I can assure you that we independents sometimes have trouble. I know that in our case, there are problems.

If you have a group of five or six papers, you can share your expenses, with the result that it helps you at the end of the year; but when you are independent, it is much more difficult to do it, because when someone is needed, such a group as the Montreal papers can send a man to Paris, and they can share that among five or six papers. But as for us, do we have the means to send a man to Paris? We do not. In this, there are advantages and disadvantages on both sides.

Mr. Fortier: Am I right in understanding you to say that essentially and basically, it is preferable for a newspaper to be independent?

Mr. Gratton: That, Sir, is the ideal; we always strive towards it, but it is not easy to achieve; the ideal is a wonderful thing, but when is it achieved?

Mr. Fortier: In this world?

Mr. Gratton: Not in this world.

Mr. Fortier: I would not want you to be shocked by my question, but do you at Le Droit look upon yourselves as an Ottawa newspaper, or as a Hull newspaper?

Mr. Gratton: A Franco-Ontarian newspaper, first of all. It says so in our brief.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I know.

Mr. Gratton: First of all; naturally, we are near Hull, because Hull helps us too.

Mr. Fortier: Could you tell us how your circulation is divided between Hull and Ottawa?

Mr. Gratton: Mr. Bélanger has some figures, I believe.

Mr. Bélanger: Approximately 40 per cent of our circulation is on the Ontario side, and 60 per cent on the Quebec side. The bulk of our circulation on both sides of the river is, of course, concentrated in the Ottawa-Hull area.

Mr. Gratton: On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that Ontario is about 26 per cent French-speaking, compared with a figure of 92 or 93 per cent for Quebec.

Mr. Fortier: Whom do you regard as your main competitor?

Mr. Gratton: The two English papers.

Mr. Fortier: The two Ottawa papers?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, because this is an area that is 90 to 95 per cent bilingual, I would say, with the result, of course, that we do not get all the advertising the English papers get. Consequently, we may publish a 48-page paper one day, while the others are publishing a 76- or 80-page paper. There are many people who buy a newspaper for its thickness, not for its content.

Mr. Fortier: On the other hand, you say that your competitors are the Ottawa Citizen and Journal?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In your advertising, you say—quote:

85 per cent of Le Droit readers indicate neither of the Ottawa English dailies read yesterday.

How do you reconcile that with what you say?

Mr. Gratton: You were told just now that our circulation is 40,000; the others have over 80,000. When we say 80, it is there that we must make a distinction. We are not discussing total circulation, because I can personally assure you that there is a duplication of circulation, in Ottawa, between the Journal and the Citizen and Le Droit—but we do have readership, according to a survey carried out by Le Droit, but by an independent company.

Mr. Fortier: What class of readers do you have? Haven't you already made a survey of the class of readers? Do you have some findings from this survey that you could give us?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, but it is rather difficult because, without wishing to be divisive, on one side you have the intellectual, and on the other you have the fellow who works in a factory, and so on.

Mr. Fortier: How does it break down, approximately?

Mr. Gratton: Well, let us say 40-60.

Mr. Fortier: The problem you have with the dispatches from the Canadian Press that you mention in paragraph 22 of your brief—and without wishing to suggest the answer to you, though you suggest it yourself—it seems to me that it puts you at a disadvantage in relation to your competitors in Ottawa, the Citizen and the Journal, which receive the dispatches in English?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, up to a point, you might say; the news will arrive in English, over the English wire service, before the French, and we have to translate—to have translators.

It's the same thing with advertising; 95 per cent of the people who advertise in Le Droit are English-speaking.

Mr. Fortier: How many?

Mr. Gratton: I would say 95 per cent; they send us the advertisements in English, and that is why we have to have a staff of translators, in excess of seven people—which increases our costs, because we have to translate, apart from the making up, because the English newspapers will very often receive the advertisement already prepared for the printer—while we have to translate, and set the whole thing up.

Mr. Fortier: It's all messed up?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: It's rather difficult, because you have to have a good man to do that?

Mr. Gratton: We don't have just one, we have seven working on translation, which increases our operating costs considerably.

[ext]

The Chairman: Could you not pass the cost of this translation on to the advertising agency?

Mr. Gratton: No.

The Chairman: Have you tried?

Senator Beaubien: He would pass the ad to somebody else.

The Chairman: Have you tried to pass it on?

Mr. Gratton: Not only that, sir, but what happened sometimes: the fact that both English papers are bigger than us...

The Chairman: Yes?

Mr. Gratton: They get the mats first and we get them only after. So instead of having two days to do the work, we have only one day. And then we have to translate and make it up, and everything.

The Chairman: Could you not have a service charge for this?

Mr. Gratton: I wish he knew the advertisers. What they want, they want.

The Chairman: Well, I know the advertiser, and they want to use your paper or they would not be placing advertisements there.

Mr. Gratton: Well...

The Chairman: I am sure you have considered it.

Mr. Gratton: We have.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: In your brief, you were discussing postal rates, weren't you, and obviously, as everyone knows, they have risen substantially. You do not give any figures, but you say that today, thousands of people are deprived of news the daily papers used to bring them, before the postal rates went up.

Might we know what percentage of your circulation was mailed, and what the percentage is today? How many readers do you have?

Mr. Gratton: On February 1, 1967, we had 7,815 mail subscribers. On December 31, 1969, we only had 1,750.

Mr. Fortier: You lost 5,000 subscribers?

Mr. Gratton: Over 6,000.

Mr. Fortier: Over 80 per cent?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your testimony, Mr. Gratton, that you lost...

Mr. Gratton: I have the supporting figures.

Mr. Fortier: But, your testimony is to the effect that you lost those readers because of...

Mr. Gratton: Definitely.

Mr. Fortier: Because of the increase in postal rates?

Mr. Gratton: Definitely. You see, what happens—is that it has always been said that the Post Office Department gave a subsidy to newspapers—which is as ridiculous as can be.

Mr. Fortier: In your opinion, it is a subsidy to the readers?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, to the readers, which means—you have 6,000 readers, and if you take an average of three per family, that is 18,000 readers that you do not have, who are now with radio or television. What I find most strange is that the CBC is subsidized, and not only to take employees away from us, but to take people who used to read us before.

Mr. Fortier: According to you—you made a study to find out whether those 5 or 6,000 readers received a newspaper today? If so, what was the result?

Mr. Gratton: On February 1, 1967, we had 7,815 readers, by mail; on February 1, 1968, we had 6,839 readers; on December 31, 1969, we still had 1,750—and that is the way it has been in the past year, because, as we send out invoices, which were $15.00 before, and which now are $30.00, people leave us.

Mr. Fortier: Those are very eloquent figures but I ask you, do you know whether those readers, who have dropped you, do they get another newspaper now?

Mr. Gratton: That is just it—because we always try to get those people back, they are seen, and they tell us: it is too expensive.

Mr. Fortier: No more newspaper?

Mr. Gratton: No more newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: And when they say, no more newspaper, that means neither Le Droit nor any other newspaper?

Mr. Gratton: Perhaps there is a weekly, but it cannot give the same information as a daily.

Mr. Fortier: But there is no daily?

Mr. Gratton: No, there is no daily.

Mr. Fortier: There is no daily which fills the void that is created?

Mr. Gratton: No, and as I said a while ago, when you think that Le Droit is the only daily in Ontario, which represents Ontario thinking, and that our territory went as far as Hearst—you understand what is happening to-day—our circulation is gradually going down.

Mr. Fortier: Am I right in thinking that most of those readers whom you lost were living in Ontario rather than in Quebec?

Mr. Gratton: There are some in Quebec but mainly in Ontario—that is, the Sturgeon Falls area...

Mr. Fortier: Sudbury?

Mr. Gratton: Sudbury, Kapuskasing, Kirkland Lake—all those places.

If we could find it possible to deliver by motor vehicle, for example—well, we could get people at 60c. a week—that isn't as bad. But when a person has to give $30 in one shot, they drop you.

Senator Beaubien: There would be no way of sending an account every three months only?

Mr. Gratton: Even for three months—that may mean, for three months, 32 or 33—can't give you the exact figures.

Senator Beaubien: That would mean more bookkeeping?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Now, all those people, who are in large part French Canadians, living in Ontario, whose only newspaper was Le Droit, no longer have a newspaper?

Mr. Gratton: Yes. Where the main things were in Le Droit,—you know, you can have some in the English papers, but small things the main things were in Le Droit, and to-day they do not get them.

Mr. Fortier: I noticed in Le Droit—and even when I am in Montreal, I read it when am in the area—I noticed that you have reporters in many centres, in Ontario, do you not—as well as in Quebec, besides?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Since you have lost all those readers, you know in what areas, obviously, you have lost them?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I am sure that you have those figures. Do you still have people available in those places?

Mr. Gratton: That is so true that, until to-day, Le Droit did not have a correspondent in Toronto, and now, we have a man, and it is the only French language daily in Canada to have a correspondent at Queen's Park.

Mr. Fortier: Permanently?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, permanently; it is someone from Hamilton who travels every evening and morning to cover it.

Senator Beaubien: There is no way of delivering by truck, because that would cost too much?

Mr. Gratton: It is too expensive—and I might add, even if it does not interest the committee very much, that we tried a northern edition—which lasted for a year and nine months; we spent $485,000 and yet, it was with the approval of the clergy there; it was an edition which was printed in Ottawa in the evening, which was postdated and was sent by truck during the night and was distributed in the morning; we began with 5,000 and the first thing we knew, we were down to 1,500.

Senator Beaubien: What did it cost? What did they pay for the newspaper?

Mr. Gratton: They paid the usual price.

Senator Beaubien: 10¢

Mr. Gratton: Well, at that time, it wasn't 1¢—it was around 7¢

Mr. Fortier: Unless Mr. Kierans decides to amend the Act, do you expect that you are going to have to live with those rates? Are you looking for a solution to the problem?

Mr. Gratton: We are looking; we are trying to organize truck delivery, everywhere, in the immediate Ottawa area. There is no point in thinking about the north, unless the person is convinced, and it is nothing for him to spend $5 a year.

Mr. Fortier: I presume that you cannot absorb that increase yourself?

Mr. Gratton: Well—I have some figures. The Canadian Press has mentioned. Perhaps that is beside the point—but it was said that the Canadian Press should have a French service.

Mr. Fortier: That is not beside the point; that is part of the Committee's terms of reference.

Mr. Gratton: I was a member of the Canadian Press committee which made that study in 1965, taking 1964 figures as a basis naturally. I was a member naturally—it was the French service of the Canadian Press; I gave figures in the report; but if to-day we tried—it is impossible from the economic viewpoint. You know that we cannot charge—we tried to charge $30, and you see the results, we lose subscribers; if you try to charge too much per line—in Ottawa, for example, we are trying, with the English newspapers, to keep the "milline rate"—I do not know what the French expression is exactly—it is the cost per line.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Gratton: When it is $5, we could keep it at $3.50, in Ottawa. We can't any longer because we have to increase the cost per line; it was increased by 2¢ a line, which is going to bring in approximately $25,000, for the national advertiser, per year.

The wage increase alone that was given to the employees, in 1970, is around $150,000.

In 1965, we paid $16 less for a ton of newsprint than we pay to-day, since January 1. Do you know what that means, in five years? That means a quarter of a million dollars. We have to try and find ways to balance our budget—and that is not easy.

Mr. Fortier: Did you say that you have an agreement with the Ottawa newspapers concerning the milline rate?

Mr. Gratton: No, it is not an agreement. Only, if we charge too much, the national buyer in Toronto or in Montreal is going to say to himself that he can get it more cheaply in English newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: But, he will not be reaching the same market.

Mr. Gratton: He will not be reaching the same market, but well, you always have dealings with the English.

Mr. Fortier: I am quoting you.

Mr. Gratton: Yes, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is that a fact, that they will not reach the same market?

Mr. Gratton: They will not be reaching the same market, but, as I said a while ago, you have a bilingual population, we do not have to lose our circulation; if we lose our circulation, we have to cut our advertising rates.

Senator Beaubien: Subscribers pay $30 a year?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Isn't there a way to send two bills—one every six months? They would forget that they have already paid?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, but you have the office work.

Senator Beaubien: Yes, but you could send them, and they may forget the first six months.

Mr. Gratton: You know, you cannot send out bills without that costing you some money. When we write a letter, it costs us $1.75 a letter.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Gratton, it costs you more to lose subscribers than to send two bills a year?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, I understand, but on the other hand...

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gratton, you mentioned, in paragraph 13, that you do not publish any announcement "which may be false, misleading or immoral".

Are we to understand that you check the content of announcements, to find out whether it is false, misleading or immoral?

Mr. Gratton: Definitely, always.

Mr. Fortier: What standard do you use?—I am thinking mainly of the word "immoral".

Mr. Gratton: I will give you just one example, of a small municipality which you perhaps know—Ste-Cécile de Masham.

Mr. Fortier: I know the name.

Mr. Gratton: We received a notice that a certain gentleman married a certain young lady three months ago. Well, we checked and discovered that it was a joke that the people wanted to play on the fellow.

Can you imagine if we had published that announcement; that would have been libelous, would it not?

That is the way we have to check continually.

I also wish to tell you, on that subject, we are very strict. I can tell you, for example, that there is a merchant in Ottawa—not to-day, this happened about 16 years ago—he was sued and he came to see us at Le Droit, to tell us that we should not let that news out, because he would consider it unfair to him—and he was a big advertiser. Therefore we lost that advertising for 14 years, he did not advertise in Le Droit because he had let out that news.

That is where we see freedom of the press. Just because someone advertises in Le Droit he is not going to get privileges—no matter who he is—even the biggest advertiser.

Mr. Fortier: He came back not long ago. He came back after 14 years?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: He was away for 14 years?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, and he came back after 14 years—two years ago.

Mr. Fortier: There are the so-called small advertisements, are there not? But, for national advertising, do you check whether it is false or misleading?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, definitely; we have had cases...

Mr. Fortier: What kind of check do you make?

Mr. Gratton: For example, if prices are being compared, a big automobile advertiser, for example, who apparently wanted to compare with another automobile advertiser—that was rejected.

Mr. Fortier: Do you often reject advertisements like that?

Mr. Gratton: That happens rarely, especially from the national point of view. Those things are checked mainly by agencies.

Mr. Fortier: From the viewpoint of immorality, have you ever rejected advertisements, publicity for films, for example, because, in your opinion, the publicity was immoral?

Mr. Gratton: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Recently?

Mr. Gratton: Perhaps not recently, but there are certain films, where we put a question mark, and we investigate later.

Mr. Fortier: Do you investigate after it has been published it, or...

Mr. Gratton: No, no, excuse me—before.

Mr. Fortier: That means that you hold it back?

Senator Beaubien: You go and see the film?

Mr. Gratton: Well, there is no need to make secret of it—I do not know whether you recall the “Cloche Merle” matter.

I recall that the advertisement arrived at Le Droit in the afternoon, and that Mgr. Vachon had said: “That shouldn’t pass, under any considerations”. Well, it arrived around three o’clock, and at four o’clock, I went to the theatre to see it because, before it is ensured...

Mr. Fortier: Did you publish the advertisements for the film “I am Curious (Yellow)”?

Mr. Gratton: Yes, all the advertisements were published.

Mr. Fortier: In Le Droit?

Mr. Gratton: Yes. But there is always the moral rating, for example; on the same page, the film’s moral rating is shown.

Mr. Fortier: Who sets up that moral rating?

Mr. Gratton: It is a society in Montreal, I believe.

Mr. Gingras: It is the Office des communications sociales of the Canadian Catholic Conference which has an office in Montreal.

Mr. Fortier: It is not a provincial agency?

Mr. Gingras: No.

Mr. Fortier: To your knowledge, are there other newspapers in Quebec which publish that moral rating for films?

Mr. Gingras: It seems to me that L’Action publishes it; La Presse, Le Nouvelliste, I am not sure, but it seems to me that I have seen it in Le Nouvelliste also.

Senator Beaubien: English newspapers?

Mr. Gingras: I do not think so.

Mr. Fortier: A while ago, you mentioned Mr. Vachon. I recall that there was question, not so long ago—I believe that it was in November or December—of the purchase by the Bishop of Hull, of a certain property. Am I mistaken?

Mr. Gratton: It was the Archbishop of Ottawa, Mgr. Plourde.

Mr. Fortier: Well, at that time, did you take an editorial stand on the question, and if so, what was it?

Mr. Gingras: Yes, I took an editorial stand at the time. That was more than two months ago, it was at the beginning of autumn or the end of the summer.

No one exerted any influence, neither the Bishop nor the Oblates—contrary to what some seemed to fear.

I thought about the question for a fairly long time because I weighed the pros and the cons. I alone made the decision. I finally advised the Archbishop to sell to the National Capital Commission, the historic part of the Bishop’s palace, that is, the original building—to demolish the annexes, to build behind the property of the Bishop’s palace, parallel to the building which serves as a hall, as a diocesan centre—to construct a building identical to the diocesan centre—to live there and sell the house.

Mr. Fortier: You suggested it in an editorial?

Mr. Gingras: Yes, in an editorial—and there was no repercussion, except for thanks from the Archbishop.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, is that all of your questions?

Do any of the senators have questions?

Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I would like to go back to one point.

Mr. Gratton, I gathered from what you said a while ago that you felt the economies of chain ownership might be a compelling reason for an independent newspaper to become a part of them. Would you think with the public interest in mind, and competition, that it would be equally compelling or advisable that Eaton’s and Simpson’s merge into a chain and use joint facilities, and so on, to make savings and economies?

Mr. Gratton: Well, what difference would it make to the buyers, the person that would go and buy them, if they were amalgamated?

Senator McElman: There would be no competition.

Mr. Gratton: Competition? After all, you know, it is what it costs and what you get for your material.

Senator McElman: Well, that is one theory.

Mr. Gratton: Well, I believe it is a theory of business.

Senator McElman: You don't believe that competition has any effect in the marketplace?

Mr. Gratton: Yes. I do believe competition is good.

Senator McElman: Does it have any effect?

Mr. Gratton: It might have some effect, you know. But sometimes I wonder.

Senator McElman: You doubt, then, that competition between Eaton's and Simpson's has an effect on price?

Mr. Gratton: Well, I am not in that line. But I feel, you know, that as businessman they would be darned wise to get together. They would cut their costs. That is one thing, you know. If you have two...

Senator McElman: I stress the public interest, Mr. Gratton; not their interest; the public interest.

Mr. Gratton: Well, I don't know. The way I feel, you know, today, the worst it would be in years to come, that you would be able to operate small shops here and small shops there—you won't be. We know in Hull—I can give you this example because I live in Hull—you have a small corner store. They are independent, but if you go and buy there, they charge. And they do everything with a little black book. They charge everything. But at the end of the month the person that have paid there, how much more has he paid? He could have bought a lot cheaper going to one of the Steinberg's or IGA.

So it is in the people's interest.

It is all right. He has got the facilities, you know, to charge. He has got the facilities to charge. He will charge all right. But he is going to pay darned more at the end of the month than if he had gone and paid cash for the thing.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: If another French Canadian newspaper were published in Hull or Ottawa, would you publish the newspaper differently?

Mr. Gratton: No.

Mr. Fortier: Would the milline rate be different?

Mr. Gratton: No, but it might go up.

The Chairman: Are there other questions that senators have?

Sorry, Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: On page 4, Section 13 you refer to the code of ethics relating to advertising. Do you at any time or periodically publish this code of ethics so that you subscribers can compare your performance against the code?

Mr. Gratton: We do.

Senator McElman: You do. How often would this be done?

Mr. Gratton: Well, I don't know. You see in the newspaper, like I said, you have got to have a certain percentage of publicity. And some days we are very down. We may go to sixty-five or seventy on Wednesday, but on Monday or Tuesday we may be down to thirty-five or forty.

Senator McElman: I am not speaking daily—once every two months.

Mr. Gratton: Well, let us say every three months.

Senator McElman: Every three months. Thank you.

The Chairman: Are there other questions that senators have?

Mr. Gratton, Mr. Belanger, and Mr. Giras, I would like to thank you. This has been, I think, a productive and useful session for us. I think all of us are familiar with Le Droit. Some of us read it quite easily. Some of us have difficulty, but try. But we are familiar with the paper. Add I think it has been particularly valuable to have you here. We are grateful for your coming. I am sure has taken time.

Thank you. Thank you for the brief as well.

The Committee adjourned.

—Upon Resuming at 8.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I now see a quorum and would suggest we could begin. I should perhaps begin with an apology, but I am not sure to whom it should be. For openers, I will apologize to Senators Evered and Beaubien who were under the impression the meeting began at 8.30. Some of the rest of us were under the impression, as were our guests, that it began at 8 o'clock so I will apologize to you for embarrassing you. I am sorry.

Senator Beaubien: I would apologize for holding you up.

The Chairman: Not at all. You did not know. I do apologize though, Mr. Blackburn.

to you and to all your people in your continent because this is an unusual session which we are having and you were kind enough to agree to come this evening and we were appreciative at 8 o'clock and we are doubly appreciative at 8.30.

Having said that, I will not labour the point.

I think you wanted to make one minor point before we begin.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, I may have, without intention, given evidence this morning with respect to the CRTC decision with respect to Mr. Bassett in the Toronto TV cable situation which was inaccurate and with your permission, I would like to withdraw that part of my testimony and file with you, sir, a copy of the decision of the CRTC.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Blackburn: Which may have been slightly different from the decision as I described it.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Blackburn: But I have not got a copy of the decision. I will have to send it to you by mail.

The Chairman: Mr. Heine, who is on my left and who is the editor of the Free Press has also asked to make a statement. He has a point he wishes to make.

Mr. Heine: Yes. A couple of points dealing with this morning's session. I think Senator Melman is entitled to an explanation on why possibly so many newspapers—I will speak for this one—have not commented more editorially on the activities of this Committee. In a sense I am tending to correct him on one or two things. As a fellow New Brunswicker, I am sure he will accept it gratefully.

Senator Prowse: In the spirit in which it is given.

Mr. Heine: Yes. It is largely due, I think—I cannot speak for other papers—but for this is due to the fact that we rather look on this Committee—you will not agree probably—as being an investigation, something in the nature of a trial, a confrontation and an adversarial situation.

In a sense—although legally it is not—we cannot understand—we look upon it as subterfuge. We feel when you have made your report, gentlemen, and given your views and made your recommendations we will pull no punches in saying what we think about what you have done and said during your sessions and what you have come up with in the way of recommendations.

I have personally, and my colleagues have tended to support us in this, felt we should mark time on it till the matter is finished and for this reason there has not been any comment of your specific activities in the London Free Press editorial page and I strongly suspect that you will find this may be the case with other newspapers.

The other point I wanted to comment on and I tended to almost interrupt you at noon, sir, when you appeared to be adjourning was the use you made, sir, of the phrase "raw, naked and unadulterated power" in connection with the newspaper media. This is a very common opinion in the general public. I must confess I am a little surprised to find it among people with the experience of Senators and Members of Parliament but you find it there too. I do not believe it is so at all. The media do not exercise raw, naked, unadulterated power.

It may not be a fair comparison but we are adulterated—if you use it that way—in our power by the impact of other media, the newspapers, other newspapers, magazines, radio, television, billboards, handouts, government information bureaus and it is very much modified—I will not use the word "adulterated" here—it is very much modified by the attitudes of the public, who will not be picked up by the scruff of their neck and turned around 180 degrees in their opinion simply because an editorial writer says something on the editorial page. It just does not happen that way.

It is also modified by the responsibility exercised by publishers like Walter Blackburn and I hope by the kind of editorial staff we have on the London Free Press. I think it is very important to say this. I think you should realize that 75 per cent, an open and acknowledged 75 per cent of the 1700 newspapers in the United States are republican in their editorial page approach and in the last 38 years, since Herbert Hoover relinquished power, there have been some eight or ten years of Republican Government.

Now, if the raw, naked and unadulterated power of the press is as great as you think it is, sir, how does it happen that so many Democratic Governments continue to be elected in the United States?

The same thing applies in Canada.

Mr. Fortier: May be the democratic newspaper have a larger circulation.

Mr. Heine: I don't think so.

Senator Prowse: It could be the public has good common sense.

Mr. Heine: Yes, and that is exactly the point I am heading for. The public has far more common sense than a great many politicians and a great many newspaper men sometimes give them credit for and it is quite capable of surviving the manipulation of the so-called capitalist or establishment press.

A great many people seem to think that newspapers in Canada, the editors and publishers get together every morning on the long distance conference line and decide what the Canadian people are going to think in the next 24 hours and it simply is not so.

The people who feel this way often think that newspaper publishers are capital "C" and small "c" conservatives; that they are capitalists—entrepreneurs, but in the last half century, gentlemen, there have only been about a dozen years of Conservative Government in Canada. So the press, the media do not manipulate public opinion nearly to the extent that you have indicated by your comments, sir, about raw, naked and unadulterated power.

I felt the point should be made and made strongly.

The Chairman: Thank you. I think in fairness I will ask Senator McElman to comment on your second point. I would like to comment on your first point myself and I will do it very briefly. This is not a trial. It is not an inquisition. I subscribe totally to the rationale as to why newspapers are not editorializing on the Committee, the fact that the hearings are on. I accept that point totally. I agree with you.

However, I would hate to think that most publishers think that when they come here they are on trial. I do not think that is the way in which you from the London Free Press have approached these hearings.

Mr. Heine: No, quite.

The Chairman: If you had, I would regret it. This is in no sense a trial.

Now, on your second point about "raw, naked and unadulterated power", I will ask Senator McElman if he wants to comment on Mr. Heine's remarks.

Senator McElman: Yes, Mr. Chairman, very briefly. I will simply remind you that in my reference to this I said "I speak of the potential". I went on and I said I would emphasize the word "potential". I think that is almost direct quote.

If I were to use the same trend of thought that you have used, sir, in an argument—I do not propose to—it is not a good argument—neither yours nor the one I am about to use—I would say the proof of the pudding is... I would say that in all those years both in Canada and in the United States, there has never been a Socialist Government.

Mr. Heine: No.

Senator McElman: On your first point: Mr. Blackburn this morning referred to the fact that it was a bright sort of a spicy morning. That was not your terminology.

The Chairman: "Ear tingling" was the expression.

Senator McElman: Yes. Well I was tingling with enthusiasm and perhaps we can leave there.

Mr. Heine: Yes. If I might end it on facetious note, I once was told by President Truman of the United States—and he was quite serious in this—he wasn't joking—said "As long as the publishers of the United States were opposed to him he knew he was going to continue to be re-elected." And soon as those—he used rather strong language—started to agree with him, he knew he was in trouble.

Senator Prowse: He might even know he was wrong.

Senator McElman: To be equally facetious on your second point, I give you the analogy of the cross-eyed rooster in the chicken yard.

Mr. Heine: This sounds like a Maritime story, sir.

Senator McElman: He was starting to run down the yard and two chickens were staring together and one said to the other "Let's separate. He might miss us both."

Mr. Heine: Well taken.

Senator McElman: I think you missed your second shot.

The Chairman: I have one comment on your second point and not being facetious I made reference this morning to the Fair

Newspapers Act of the United States. I think that Mr. Heine, that you are perhaps familiar with what is happening. You should study what is happening in the United States Senate at the present time. You will see that the newspapers in the United States do indeed have enormous political leverage which they are prone to use on occasion and they are using it at the present time. I think that should be on the record.

Mr. Heine: I distinguish between direct political influence of newspapers and their ability to manipulate public opinion. I do not consider that newspapers have nearly as much capacity to manipulate public opinion as many people seem to think they have.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question here that is right in line with this question and apropos of what you said.

The Chairman: I would like to settle down a few minutes but go ahead.

Senator Prowse: We have had some discussion on it and besides I came here early.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse, if you don't realize the meeting was at 8.30, it is not my fault.

Senator Prowse: The phenomena you referred to—that of 87 per cent or whatever it is of the editorial pages in the United States being opposed to the successful presidential candidate year after year, with one or two exceptions, has been a matter of concern to me. I have wondered if perhaps the answer was that from your standpoint as an editor, I would be interested and I think it would be useful to us—to know if you would agree with the only explanation that occurred to me that is because of the sympathy of the reporters, chiefly because they were underpaid, with an administration that was interested in elevating the position of the people but unconsciously in their work through their stories, a sympathy for, let us say, particularly the Roosevelt administration, communicated itself to the people reading it; even though any American I have ever met thought that this was a four star disaster. Obviously the majority of the Americans voted for him.

The only explanation I can see was that somewhere through that comment and perhaps it was through the working press itself, the fellows that were writing these stories, that their objective stories carried unconsciously a sympathy which communicated itself to its readers.

Now, as professionals in the area what I would be interested in is: if this be a reasonably sound assumption on my part. I don't care who answers it.

Mr. Heine: I don't know, sir, whether I can honestly say that I think it is sound. It does exist in degrees.

Senator Prowse: Is it true?

Mr. Heine: It is true in degrees but how much in degrees, is a very subjective judgment which I am not prepared to make.

In the same talk that I had with President Truman—I was a very young reporter but I remember very vividly because I mentioned the reporters speaking, the reporters at the press conference and he said what you say that—"these reporters are on my side. It is the publishers back home that are against me."

Senator Prowse: I am glad I am in good company for once.

Mr. Heine: I do not know that either he or you are entirely accurate in assuming this to be the case throughout. There may be an element of it but to what degree it is, sir, if it exists—and I do not know to what degree it exists, but if it does, it tends to emphasize the point I am trying to make; namely, that publishers, even the very best ones in the world, do not have the absolute control even over their own newspapers, that people tend to think they have, which re-inforces the argument I was making against raw, naked and unadulterated power.

Senator Prowse: There is something we do not understand that communicates itself. Whether it is unconscious bias from the reporters or plain common sense on the part of the readers. You can take people just so far but you cannot make them drink. Is that about it?

Mr. Heine: Exactly and I subscribe very strongly to the school that argues that it is neither the direction of the publisher or the editor or the general manager, nor the manipulative capacity of the media, nor the bias, if there is one—and we all have it to a degree—of reporter and editor as much as it is the basic, common sense, of educated people in a democracy, which is the way we all survive in a western democracy. I subscribe to this school strongly and there is something in what you say in terms of the reporter vis-à-vis the publisher or editor. It is not nearly as great as you indicated it is. The real strength lies in an educated and politically sophisticated electorate.

Senator Prowse: I did not indicate anything. I just asked the question. May I ask one more while I am here?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: The emphasis we get from everybody is the importance of complete objectivity in the reporting of the news. But at the same time everybody accepts the fact that in reporting news, we have to select and in the selection, if you are going to be objective, you are going to so emasculate it, it ceases to be news.

Would we perhaps be getting a more useful press if we identified the reporters and allowed his bias to come through and the editor of the paper tried to see that the reporters of different bias were balanced in their representation in this paper?

In other words, leave it to the reporter. Do not say "Leave it out" because you can make more mistakes by leaning over backwards by far, than you can by being obviously biased; but would it be easier for the public to differentiate if the bias was there but clearly identified and then I can read it and I can say "Well, you know—this one—but this one, is a little better sense. I will buy that, bias and all. I will make allowance for the wheel I know is being sharpened. It is the wheel I do not know that is grinding my axe that throws it off balance."

Mr. Heine: Particularly in one newspaper column...

Mr. Blackburn: I think Mr. Williams, the editor, would be interested in this.

Mr. Williams: Mr. Chairman and Senators, I think if I outlined all of the bias that each one of us has it may be more lengthy than the story.

Senator Prowse: It would make a good story.

Mr. William: As the story moves from the information gathered, the person who is on the scene, through the city desk or the wire desk, through the news editor, there is the judgment of experienced people. All of us have our own bias and we recognize it and we try to eliminate the bias in the report, so that as far as is possible in our judgment there is no bias in the printed story.

There probably is in the accident case, the one car that was hit by the train and the 300 that were not. There is some inherent in the process of things but I am not sure that your solution would be of help to the reader really.

Senator Prowse: Well, what I have in mind is a situation like let us take the automobile accident case. As a lawyer, what happens as you get two people telling you what happens in an accident? One was in one car and the other was in the other and so help me, you have trouble knowing that you are even in the same continent. Somebody says there are a lot of liars around here but you find out after a while they are not liars. They are just telling what they had to remember.

Now, I am not worried about the newspaper report of the accident case but I am thinking about political reporting—I will tell you one more thing here. I was asked at one time when I was working as a reporter, and doing some other things as well, to cover myself. This embarrassed me quite a bit and must admit that probably I was afraid that would not give myself the coverage—because I was going to lean over backwards to be unbiased—that really I knew I was entitled to.

Now, I think when you start to say you are going to be completely unbiased in your coverage that in your effort to be unbiased you may be leaving out something because you say "Oh well, we shouldn't hurt him or we shouldn't promote him", and in your effort to be unbiased, you bring in a report that doesn't cover the fact and how can you avoid it?

But if you have a clear bias which the judge has—he listens to one and he listens to the other and he says "Well, somewhere down the middle, sense must run here" and for various reasons he decides one way or the other. If you are a lawyer, you lose the case. They don't know much either.

The point I am getting at is in trying to eliminate the bias from your reporting to be objective, we may be distorting the truth more than we would by using a subjectively biased report but clearly indicating its source and the basis of the possible bias.

Mr. Heine: If I could comment on that, sir, I think you will find that what you are talking about is already happening in a great many newspapers. We do not have two things on our paper; i.e. news and editorial comment. Now, we have news. We have a great many by-line writers. In the London Free Press and ave a dozen, you know, Charles Lynch, James Reston, the bit. We also draw heavily on our own news and editorial page staff to comment, under their by-line, as they see it and this may not be what the actual editorial of the newspaper says. It might be quite different. So these three things are now in most good newspapers. The point you are making is well taken and good newspapers have recognized it in degree. They may not have belled it out to themselves quite as you have but they are all moving to have news, the newspaper's considered reasonable position in editorial comment and columns of all political issues, commenting on the news with by-lines so the readers can identify them.

What you are asking is being done now.

Senator Prowse: So the mix is there.

Mr. Heine: The mix is there in my opinion, is.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, before this goes as someone suggested from the latitudes to the ridiculous, I should correct something that I think you intimated. I was not speaking for the Committee but as a member of the Committee. I think that is quite obvious and I think there perhaps was a inflection that should not be there.

Mr. Heine: Sorry.

Senator McElman: I should say as well, this morning I was trying very very hard to flush out some comment in depth that we have not been able to get thus far in certain important aspects of this whole inquiry and by George, I think I have had some success in it.

The Chairman: Mr. Heine, while Mr. Fortier is organizing himself to ask you a question let me ask you to comment on something that Charles Templeton said.

Mr. Heine: I am not sure I follow that.

Mr. Fortier: Neither did I.

The Chairman: Following up the discussion you were having with Senator Prowse, Charles Templeton, when he was here as a witness, said the working press in Canada by and large is inclined to be a small-l liberal. Would you comment on that?

Mr. Heine: To the degree that the working press in Canada represents a cross section of the population and to the degree that the Government of Canada happens to be people who will be considered small-l liberal, I suppose you are probably correct. In other words the majority of the people in the country seem to have elected a group of people who call themselves Liberals. If the press...

The Chairman: The point I was going to make is not everyone calls them small-l liberals.

Mr. Heine: I am not dodging it but if the working press of the country represents a cross section of the country in terms of the political spectrum, then I would expect the majority of them would be oriented the way the majority are, which is towards the Liberal Government at the present time.

The Chairman: Mr. Templeton carefully spelled out the fact he was not talking in terms of partisan political considerations of either Liberal or Conservative but rather in...

Mr. Heine: I took you literally, deliberately of course.

The Chairman: I am aware of that.

Mr. Heine: If I took you as you meant it, I don't really think I could comment with great validity there.

At the London Free Press we have people of all political hues who write regularly for us. One man is so far over on the right of the political spectrum that I am quite certain if he was in the United States, he would belong to the John Birch Society.

We have another man who we respect very highly too and who does a very competent job, who recently resigned as an international representative for a large Canadian Union and came back to our staff as one of our reporters.

I just do not think the question is answerable honestly. I can give you an answer but I don't know it would be an honest one because I do not think it is answerable.

Senator Prowse: Is it an economic association?

Mr. Heine: I do not understand the question, sir.

Senator Prowse: Do people tend to identify with people that they think are in their own economic area? Let me put it this way. They identify themselves with working stiff. They are people who work for a living and they say "All right, my interests are with labour, they are not with management."

This is a very general and incorrect way but it will serve as a guide.

Mr. Heine: I am a hired man. I work for a salary. I do not consider myself...

Senator Prowse: But you have a title.

Mr. Heine: Yes, rather.

Mr. Carradine: I wonder if it is more of a personal characteristic and not an economic thing that we are talking about. I believe this is more of a symptom of the personality and character of the type of person who goes into journalism.

The Chairman: That was the point that Charles Templeton was making.

Mr. Carradine: Again, we have an assortment of journalistic students here right now. I think these are the type of people who are involved in causes—who go out to see demonstrations to find out what is happening in the world.

I think these people tend to be a little bit to the left of centre. I am not saying that in any derogatory sense at all.

Possibly this is why the press tends to be small-l liberal, if you want to put a tag on it. This is just a very philosophical argument which may not advance the question very far.

Senator Prowse: It is a pretty acceptable answer.

Mr. Blackburn: I would agree with Mr. Carradine's answer. I think editorial people on the whole—this is not confined to only them—are progressive in their thinking. They like to see developments which are worthwhile occur and publishers do as well.

Mr. Heine: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Heine, I think you have made your point and I am not sure I do not agree with you with respect to the inability of newspapers to really manipulate public opinion, but isn't there another aspect to the issue though; that in your selection of news you, in fact, very much influence the issues which people will think about.

Mr. Heine: Yes, and it is a grave responsibility which Mr. Williams and his staff and all of us, including Mr. Carradine and Mr. Blackburn, take very seriously.

Mr. Fortier: Then in this respect would you not agree that this power to influence those events to which people in your community will apply their minds, is raw, naked and unadulterated power.

Mr. Heine: We are back to that again. No if the basic...

Mr. Fortier: The power is there, Mr. Heine.

Mr. Heine: No.

Mr. Fortier: The power is not there?

Mr. Heine: No.

Mr. Fortier: The power is not there?

Mr. Heine: It is the responsibility, Mr. Fortier, and it is taken seriously by everybody in our organization involved but the power—and I still make the point—is not nearly as great as your question would imply because the educated and politically sophisticated electorate can tell when you are manipulating the news for your selfish advantage and they will do something about it in the long run. They will probably find something else to read.

Mr. Fortier: What will they do in a one newspaper town?

Mr. Heine: They tend to ignore the manipulative elements and I made the point concerning politics on an American and Canadian basis in order to illustrate the point.

Mr. Fortier: There is no suggestion on my part this is being done by the London Free Press.

Mr. Heine: No. We are arguing an academic situation, I realize that.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I am suggesting to you the power is there.

Mr. Heine: No.

Mr. Fortier: Let us not qualify the power but the power is there.

Mr. Heine: No, because again in a western democracy the great mass of educated relatively politically sophisticated public do not accept a manipulation of that order which you are talking about.

Now, what happens in practice, you give the kind of situation we have in the Free Press and given the encouragement in the direction of publishers, we are able to draw public attention to matters of concern to the community and to give leadership sometimes.

where it is needed. If it is honestly needed and if the community accepts it as an unselfish leadership, then it will be accepted in part by some and will therefore influence the course of events; but it is a matter of degree and degree is dependent entirely, in my opinion, on the integrity with which you approach his responsibility.

Mr. Fortier: That is my whole point.

Mr. Heine: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: So that is my whole point. So at the event that these people who are saddled with this responsibility do not have the integrity which you do have, then that power could be exercised and public opinion moulded in a way which would not be to the advantage of the community.

Mr. Heine: There are many publications which attempt to manipulate public opinion and public attitudes in ways they should not be manipulated.

There are some rags of sex publications knocking around the big cities. There are all sorts of things but are they widely accepted?

No, because we have an educated people in this country who know integrity when they see it.

Mr. Fortier: What can they do in a given area where there is only one newspaper or more than one newspaper is owned by the same person and certain news, which is of direct interest to that community, is not published in the newspaper?

What can those intelligent readers do about it? Where do they get their information?

Mr. Heine: Well, it is a bad situation, is it not?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I asked you the question. What can they do about it?

Mr. Heine: Well, to put it in our own context, which is the one I prefer to deal in because I don't like to name names outside of that, if we were not doing a competent job, I would think that the people of London would find, more and more, to buy more and more copies of The Globe and Mail, a very fine newspaper, the Toronto Star, a very fine newspaper, or maybe the Windsor Star. Maybe some of the local dailies around would grow in their responsibilities and supply the sort of need that we were failing to do.

Mr. Fortier: It is highly unlikely.

Mr. Heine: It is quite entirely possible, sir.

Mr. Fortier: But do you agree with me that the power is there?

Mr. Heine: I think I will have to stand on what I said so far, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Perhaps Mr. Blackburn would like to comment on that.

Mr. Blackburn: I think you are referring basically to the story which is not published.

Mr. Fortier: I am referring, Mr. Blackburn, to the story which is not published or to the story which is not published in full.

The Chairman: The phantom story—to recall the phrase of this morning.

Mr. Fortier: Which I have termed "Mr. Blackburn's white elephant."

Mr. Blackburn: I think the power of a newspaper not to publish a story is, in fact, a power which should not be exercised. Sometimes we are forced to fail to publish stories because we could not get them and we are disappointed when we report that our reporter endeavoured to attend the meeting—normally in our case a municipal meeting—and was not permitted to enter the room.

Public reaction is disappointing quite frequently, but this is a story which we have endeavoured to get and which we have not published and I think that is a loss to the community. It certainly is, in our judgment.

Mr. Fortier: And do you report in your newspaper the failure of this particular council to allow one of your reporters in?

Mr. Blackburn: We do, we do.

Mr. Heine: Mr. Honey might comment on some of our editorial positions on this very matter.

Mr. Honey: We have taken quite firm editorial positions on several municipal boards which have refused our reporters access. In fact, I think you can say we have run an editorial campaign to open the meetings.

The result of the last municipal election was that three or four candidates for the local Hospital Trust, campaigned on the issue of open meetings and I think two of them were defeated.

The Chairman: What percentage of the electorate voted in London?

Mr. Honey: Thirty-one percent.

The Chairman: I contrast that statement with the statement that Mr. Blackburn made a moment ago with the suggestion that the citizens of London apparently are not aroused by these closed meetings; and I contrast it with Mr. Heine's repeated reference to "politically sophisticated electorate."

Mr. Carradine: I believe this is quite true. Our belief is that there was not a sufficiently stimulating mayoralty campaign to bring the people out to vote.

I believe that our coverage of the last municipal election—and again I cannot speak from history—but I believe it was probably more extensive than anything we have ever carried in the past.

Mr. Heine: Page after page.

Mr. Carradine: But the people were apathetic. They were not stimulated to come out and vote even though we covered the issues—I will not say ad nauseam—but really in great detail, and possibly this is the reason.

We have a mayor who was running for re-election against two other people who, in my opinion, were not really satisfactory candidates and the people were just not interested.

The Chairman: We had a similar experience in Toronto. Again I have said several times on this Committee that the coverage on the municipal election by the three Toronto papers was the best I can ever recall.

Again there was 31 per cent who voted in Toronto, and I just wonder about the repeated references Mr. Heine has made to these same 70 percent of the people who sat at home as being politically sophisticated.

Mr. Heine: Let me try to rationalize that. In the town of St. Marys—what was the name of the other place?

Mr. Williams: Mitchell.

Mr. Heine: Mitchell, the fire chief and the hippies.

There were two towns in Western Ontario, Mitchell and St. Marys where the electorate did become concerned and did become interested to the point that in both these communities, without a great deal of prior publicity on our part, they turfed out the entire council and put in another new one over an issue which was very meaningful and real locally.

Now, certainly you can have a non-issue election such as Mr. Carradine has described with an incumbant mayor and two relative newcomers, people not known and no issue. But where the issues are there, this is where the crunch comes and this is where the politically sophisticated electorate enter the situation.

The Chairman: Have more than 40 per cent of the people voted in a municipal election in London in living memory.

Mr. Heine: Yes.

Mr. Blackburn: You will be interested, Mr. Chairman, we are now campaigning to change the time of the year in which municipal elections are held. We hope to influence public opinion in this case.

We feel that the first Monday in December is a poor time as quite often the weather is poor. We are endeavouring to convince the electorate and the elected officials that it should be the latter part of September or the early part of October.

We feel this might help to permit more people to turn out to vote; to encourage them to come out and vote, particularly more people who are less able to get around or poor roads or streets.

Mr. Fortier: On this issue of closed in-camera council meetings, do you feel this is an area where press councils would be useful?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes. I mentioned that this morning. We would lay a complaint in our case with the press council against the electorate if we had endeavoured to attend the meeting and had been refused and we felt we had a right to be there.

Mr. Fortier: Would you approach in-camera sittings of a trial in the same way?

Mr. Blackburn: No. You mean a trial in the courts?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Blackburn: I am sorry. I think I would have to decide that on the individual case. Mr. Fortier. I could not make a general statement.

Mr. Fortier: If it was a case that was of definite interest to your community and the presiding judge ruled—as he is empowered to do under the Criminal Code—that the hearing should be held in camera, would you comment on it?

Mr. Blackburn: I think we would probably find a reporter there and report that he had not been permitted access to the court and let go at that, very likely. I do not think we would get into a fight on such an issue with a judge.

Again there might be a case where we would wish to insist but I cannot be entirely specific.

Mr. Fortier: No. Now, Mr. Blackburn, the Southam Press owns 25 per cent of the common voting shares of London Free Press Holdings as well as a somewhat similar percentage of CFPL Broadcasting Limited. I will leave the broadcasting company aside for the time being.

Would you please tell this Committee what is the nature of Southam's interest in the London Free Press?

Mr. Blackburn: You mean, other than financial interest?

The Southam Company has a member on or Board of Directors.

Mr. Fortier: How many members are there on the Board?

Mr. Blackburn: Five, and Southam Press has one member, who is Mr. St. Clair Balfour, the President of Southam Press. Southam Press has no management involvement as such and never in fact has wished to exercise any.

Mr. Fortier: You inherited this fact, this more or less Southam relationship?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Or investment in the London Free Press?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes. It goes back many, many years where the thing is outlined in our brief, back to 1907—the early part of the 20th Century.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever sought to purchase the Southam interest in the London Free Press?

Mr. Blackburn: Do I have to answer that question? These are personal matters.

The Chairman: I think the question was...

Mr. Fortier: Whether Mr. Blackburn ever sought to purchase Southam Press Limited's 25 per cent interest in the London Free Press Holdings Limited?

The Chairman: Well, perhaps that is the kind of question which you may comment on to us in private later.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

The Chairman: Would that be satisfactory?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Prowse: There would be a corollary.

Mr. Fortier: I was going to ask that. My following question was: whether or not Southam—I will ask it...

The Chairman: Yes. I will make the same ruling.

Mr. Fortier: ...Press Limited has ever sought to purchase from you your 74.08 per cent interest in the London Free Press Holdings Limited?

The Chairman: I will give the same ruling.

Senator Prowse: The third question is: has anybody else?

Mr. Fortier: Well, all right.

The Chairman: I think before you say "All right" would you like to answer?

Senator Everett: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the witness should be called upon to give an answer to that question at all, either in public or in camera. It is almost a hypothetical question. We are concerned with what the present ownership situation is.

The Chairman: Well, Senator Everett, I am grateful for your comment.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Chairman, before you make your comment, may I suggest that possibly the thrust of the question is that we are concerned by offers that may be being made in order to increase concentration. Now, that is the basis of the question.

The Chairman: Having indicated a ruling, I might perhaps have ruled somewhat differently had Mr. Fortier put the second question first because I think, with respect to Senator Everett, that the second question certainly is germane to this kind of discussion. I am not sure that the first one is and perhaps on both questions you would prefer to answer privately in writing. That would be satisfactory.

Mr. Blackburn: I think on second thought I would prefer to answer now.

The Chairman: Do not feel you must.

Mr. Blackburn: There have been approaches made by Southam Press, by Thomson Newspapers and by F. P. Publications to purchase the London Free Press. I have not offered or endeavoured to purchase, in return the chain.

Mr. Fortier: That was my last question.

Mr. Blackburn: I might say I do not like that word "chain". I should have used "group". I think "chain" has an unfortunate connotation which is not proper.

Mr. Fortier: You make use of the Southam news wire service, do you not?

Mr. Blackburn: No, we do not, Mr. Fortier. We do buy the Charles Lynch column and we pay for it if we use it.

Mr. Fortier: Pardon?

Mr. Blackburn: We pay for it if we use the Charles Lynch column but we do not buy the Southam News Service.

Mr. Fortier: Is there any reason for that?

Mr. Carradine: Maybe Mr. Heine might like to answer that.

Mr. Heine: We considered it seriously at one point for no other reason than we thought it might be useful to us. But on examining the flow of news of Canadian Press, which does a very competent and workmanlike job of covering the national scene and the work of our own correspondent in London, and the columnists we buy, we decided it would not add that much and chose not to take it.

About the same time—this was an entirely separation decision—we decided to add the New York Times Wire Service to our flow of news in the Free Press and this gave us the balance that we felt was important.

Mr. Fortier: Are the resources of the Southam Group available to the Free Press in any way?

Mr. Blackburn: If we wish to ask questions with respect to management matters, costs, pensions, and such matters, they are prepared to give us the information we ask for, normally.

Mr. Fortier: So you do have access to this advantage?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, and we make use of that.

Mr. Fortier: The American Newspaper Guild has no contact with the London Free Press?

Mr. Blackburn: It has not, no.

Mr. Fortier: If my memory serves me correctly, there are no craft unions at all?

Mr. Blackburn: There are two craft unions. Members of our staff belong to two craft unions, the stereotypers, the International Stereotypers and the Electro-typers and members of our Stereotyping Department do belong to that union and certain of our maintenance electricians belong to the local craft union.

Mr. Fortier: You were here—Mr. Blackburn...

Mr. Carradine: I should add, Mr. Fortier, 1 members of the stereo department do have cards in the union but the union is not certified as the bargaining agent of the organization.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you. You were here Mr. Blackburn, when Mr. Bassett testified on the Friday before Christmas, were you not?

Mr. Blackburn: I was not here. I was afraid of not getting home because of the possible Air Canada difficulties so I left.

Mr. Fortier: You may have heard or read that he told the Committee that the American Newspaper Guild had improved the professional calibre of reporters and editors by bringing about better salaries and working conditions.

I wonder if you would care to comment on that statement by Mr. Bassett, for the edification of the Committee.

Mr. Blackburn: Frankly, Mr. Fortier, I have not had any experience with the American Newspaper Guild. I am really not competent to comment.

It does appear where the Guild has contracts that the reporting is quite well done not necessarily, in my opinion, any better done than where it is not, frankly.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have a company policy on unionization?

Mr. Blackburn: No. We have an employee association or our employees have an association with an elected council.

Mr. Fortier: This is a very personal question but I think it has relevance in view of some of your comments this morning, Mr. Blackburn. In your curriculum vitae, which you annexed to your very substantial and very good brief, I note that you are a director of the Canada Trust Company.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is this the only outside directorship that you have accepted?

Mr. Blackburn: It is the only one which I presently hold. I was a director of Northern Life Assurance Company and had to resign because I had not the time to devote to the work and to do it properly.

Mr. Fortier: Do you consider this is a good thing for a newspaper publisher to be associated with companies who operate in this milieu?

Mr. Blackburn: I find it helpful to have that association.

Mr. Fortier: In what way?

Mr. Blackburn: I am not a financier. I think that it is quite apparent to you. I am an operating—I suppose one way say—publisher and broadcaster. However, I am responsible for the operation of a rather large business. I find the information which I am able to get as a director of Canada Trust, helpful in my operation.

Mr. Fortier: Did you not ever consider...

Mr. Blackburn: It is the only access I have to that kind of information.

Mr. Fortier: In selecting one trust company or one insurance company did you not consider that the situation may arise, where in your newspaper there would be raised an issue, which concerned this particular company or even maybe more important, other trust companies or other insurance companies where you, as a newspaper, would have to take an editorial stand and that you might feel a little hamstrung because of your directorship?

Mr. Blackburn: I would not. I would resign and carry on.

Mr. Fortier: You would resign.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Fortier: If such a situation arose?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes. If there was a conflict of interest I would give priority to my communications responsibility.

Mr. Fortier: After listening to you, I believe you. In the same section or in the same area, has a situation ever arisen in London where your multi-media ownership has caused you in the eyes of the community some inconvenience, should I say?

The Chairman: Can you explain that?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I am thinking of the John Dickins case.

Mr. Blackburn: I almost read your mind.

The Chairman: Do you want to ask the question more specifically then?

Mr. Fortier: Would Mr. Blackburn comment on the Jack Dickins case?

The Chairman: Well, for the benefit of the other senators and other people who may not know what the John Dickins case is, do you want to elaborate or is that necessary?

Mr. Fortier: I am certainly willing to.

The Chairman: Why do you not take a moment and do that.

Senator Prowse: You might as well tell us what we are talking about.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. John Dickins was the reporter or the open-line radio announcer on the CFPL open-line programme in London.

Mr. Blackburn: On a freelance basis.

Mr. Fortier: Pardon?

Mr. Blackburn: He was a freelance performer.

Mr. Fortier: He or his wholly owned company had a contract with your company, with the radio station, which expired, I believe, on December 31, 1969.

Mr. Blackburn: Correct.

Mr. Fortier: That contract was not renewed and he claimed publicly, and as a matter of fact he wrote a letter to the editor which was published in the October 22nd issue of your newspaper where he claimed he was fired. He claimed he was fired for various reasons which I think could be summarized succinctly as being because the management of the London Free Press was not in accord with some of the stands he took on his open line radio programmes.

Now, I think it would be very important for the members of the Committee to hear what your views are on this particular situation and I come back to my first question: whether or not this is one of the situations where, because of the fact that you were associated with both the radio station and the newspaper, you were put in a position where you had to choose between the two, in effect.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, may I ask Mr. Brown to outline the broadcasting part of this particular situation...

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Blackburn: And then we will handle the newspaper.

The Chairman: I might ask you to begin perhaps by saying whether the facts were substantially, as outlined by Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Murray Brown, President and General Manager of CFPL Broadcasting Limited: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Other than the fact that the newspaper had nothing to do with Mr. Dickins departure from CFPL Broadcasting.

Mr. Chairman, if I am to deal with this question, I feel quite properly I should deal with it as president of CFPL Broadcasting and no association with the newspaper, as I have done with the Canadian Radio and Television Commission. I voluntarily filed with them a report outlining exactly what our working arrangement was with Mr. Dickins and what happened. I will be quite happy to file copies with your Committee, Mr. Chairman, of what I filed with the Commission.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Brown: Or I can read it in part or in its entirety.

The Chairman: Can you file it and could you also now read it in part?

Mr. Brown: I would be quite happy to read the substance of it.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: First of all, was it voluntary or at the request of the CRTC?

Mr. Brown: Voluntary.

"Mr. Dickins, as was mentioned, was not an employee of our company. CFPL engaged John Dickins as a freelance talent through an agreement with his proprietorship, Broadcast Design. Freelance talent arrangements are common in the broadcasting industry. As the term implies a freelance arrangement allows the performer the freedom and time to participate in other commercial activities—in addition to the services provided to the broadcasting station.

"Mr. Dickins quite properly had other business interests. He operated a commercial broadcasting school in London known as the National Institute of Broadcast Design. Through his proprietorship Broadcast Design, he provided advertising consultant services to such clients as the PUC, the East Town Chevrolet, MacDonald Drive-In Restaurants and many others.

"A freelance arrangement also provides both the performer and the station with the right to terminate the working arrangement under whatever terms exist in the agreement.

"In the agreement dated January 1, 1966 between CFPL and Broadcast Design, either party had the right to terminate the agreement on 30 days' notice. Under the same agreement, Mr. Dickins was to perform six open line broadcasts weekly for 52 weeks. For this service CFPL paid Mr. Dickins a fee of $80 per programme approximately $25,000 per year; at the same time allowing him to perform whatever other services he wanted in the community.

"Following a period of negotiations with Mr. Dickins, the management of CFPL Radio reached the decision not to enter into a new agreement with him in 1970. "Mr. Dickins was advised of this decision on October 15, 1969. It was the opinion of the management, of CFPL management, that it would be unwise for John Dickins to continue as host of the open line programme beyond this date.

"Additionally if Mr. Dickins were freed of his responsibilities he could devote more time immediately to his other business interests. Mr. Dickins concurred with this opinion, evidenced by the fact he signed a separation agreement, copied and attached as Appendix B.

"Under this agreement John Dickins received from CFPL on October 16, 1969 a cheque for $5,520 which represented the total fees to which he would have been entitled had he continued with CFPL until December 31, 1969. CFPL's offer legal obligation was to provide Mr. Dickins with 30 days' notice.

"Under this severance arrangement, Mr. Dickins agreed not to perform on any competitive broadcasting undertaking until January 1, 1970.

"On October 16, station manager E. M. Knight prepared an announcement regarding the change in the host in the open line show, copy attached as Appendix C.

"The announcement was given to the news department of CFPL Radio and used in an abridged form. Copy of the news item, etcetera, attached.

"A copy of the announcement was also given to the London Free Press.

"In our view this was a business agreement which CFPL quite properly felt it did not want to renew. We think this Commission will agree that CFPL Broadcasting, as a licensee, must assume the ultimate responsibility for what it broadcasts on its station. As such the management of CFPL must have the right to decide who performs."

The Chairman: Do you want to comment on that at all, Mr. Brown?

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, essentially that is the story.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: On what date did you appear before the CRTC and give as an example the way CFPL was running and the fact that John Dickins was doing such a good job?

Mr. Brown: Mr. Fortier, that was in March of last year at the time of our CFPL AM licence renewal. I said in our presentation that John Dickins' open line was the cornerstone of our programming, being the opening show of the day, and I meant it, but it could have been somebody else's open line. It wasn't just John Dickins. At that time he happened to be the host of open line. Quite properly I referred to it as John Dickins' Open Line and I was quite sincere and I meant it. It was the cornerstone of our programming day. As it is now, Bill Brady is its host.

Mr. Fortier: As I understand your statement, it appears very clear you had every legal right not to renew Mr. Dickins contract, or rather terminate it upon giving 30 days notice. Do you care to comment on as to what motivated you to take that position, to exercise the rights given to you under Clause 6 or 7, whatever it is, of the agreement?

Mr. Brown: I don't know, Mr. Fortier, whether—I have not been asked by the CRTC why we saw fit to not renew our contract with Mr. Dickins.

Mr. Fortier: This is the Senate Committee on Mass Media, Mr. Chairman. I suggest that whatever the CRTC might decide to ask or not ask is of no concern to this Committee.

I ask that the question be answered.

Mr. Brown: Well, I think the simplest way is—I can say we were not satisfied with Mr. Dickins' performance.

Mr. Fortier: You have read the letter from Mr. Dickins which was published in the London Free Press on October 22nd, 1969.

Mr. Brown: I have indeed, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Do you recall the reasons which he gives as being those which motivated the notice which he received?

Mr. Brown: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Are those true reasons?

The Chairman: So that the Senators and others can follow the discussion, what were the reasons he gave? I am not familiar with them.

If there is a long list you do not need to read them, just highlight them.

Mr. Brown: It seems to me, Mr. Fortier that...

Mr. Fortier:

"Mr. Brown's displeasure was aroused most by my stand on the police rail on 80 Maple Street last August and the jailing of 17 young people, many with money in their pockets, on vagrancy charges. He did not like my speaking of it as a travesty of justice.

"Mr. Blackburn objected most to my out-spoken support for the UWO and Fanshaw students antibomb demonstration at the Sarnia Blue Water Bridge.

"In checking my files now I find many other issues on which I differed with management. The judges' crackdown at Christmas in which they automatically jailed first offenders and petty shoplifters, my disagreement with..."

The Chairman: That would appear to be enough.

Mr. Fortier: No, I think this is important.

The Chairman: All right.

Mr. Fortier:

"My disagreement with the Free Press editorials on that subject; my objection to the station accepting what I thought was dubious commercials for a door-to-door carpet company; my expressed respect for Bob Paton, the crusading plumber, who was now about to sue the Free Press because they would not print his advertisement.

"Management did not like my comments on the Rice Krispies commercial in which former Health Minister Judy LaMarsh attributed health-giving properties to the product.

"There was an objection four years ago to my stand against the Viet Nam war (which was then supported in the hawkish editorials of the London Free Press.)"

Now it appears to me, Mr. Chairman, these are matters which should definitely be commented upon both by Mr. Brown and by Mr. Blackburn.

The Chairman: Those are the reasons which Mr. Dickens gives for saying the contract was terminated and these appear in a letter which was published in the London Free Press...

Mr. Fortier: In the London Free Press on October 22nd, which I will file.

The Chairman: And which you are familiar with and you are familiar with, Mr. Blackburn?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And every reader of the London Free Press?

The Chairman: Presumably, yes. Do you want to comment, Mr. Brown?

Mr. Brown: I think if we are going to conduct a trial, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Dickens should be here to protect himself.

The Chairman: I do not think we are conducting a trial.

Senator Prowse: We are getting close to it.

Mr. Brown: First of all, I disagree with everything Mr. Dickens says.

Mr. Fortier: As being untrue?

Mr. Brown: Mr. Dickens has never been told by any official of CFPL Broadcasting or the London Free Press what he could say or not say on the air.

Mr. Bremner, who is here in the audience tonight, is the radio editor of CFPL. He has been doing commentaries for some nine years. He is quite prepared to testify at no point in his career has he had any directive from the London Free Press or CFPL management as to what he could say or not say.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Dickens says in his letter in fact more. He says management had asked me to take stands, to express myself, to do a controversial programme.

Mr. Brown: We told Mr. Dickens that he could express his opinions based on facts, not on what he thought or just his views.

Mr. Fortier: You mean that he was to state facts and not give opinions on an open line programme?

Mr. Brown: That is correct. If he wanted to express opinion which was based on fact, that was acceptable.

Mr. Fortier: The Viet Nam war is a fact.

Senator Prowse: He could listen to anybody else's opinion, am I correct?

Mr. Brown: That is what he was supposed to do, sir. He was supposed to act as a moderator to get various opinions phoned in by the community.

Senator Prowse: But not to comment himself? I am just asking a question.

Mr. Brown: We did give him authority last year again to express an opinion based on fact, not just his own personal views that might not be based on anything.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse, I think we should let Mr. Fortier finish with his questioning.

Senator Prowse: I agree.

Mr. Fortier: Did these facts related by Mr. Dickens influence your decision to give him his 30 days' notice, Mr. Brown?

Mr. Brown: I said that we were not satisfied with his performance. We decided not to renew his contract.

Mr. Fortier: Would Mr. Blackburn care to comment with respect to those parts of Mr. Dickens' letter which I read and where he is directly mentioned?

Mr. Blackburn: Just refresh my memory on the one point.

Mr. Fortier:

"Mr. Blackburn objected most to my outspoken support for the UWO and Fanshawe students anti-bomb demonstrations at the Sarnia Blue Water Bridge."

Mr. Blackburn: Yes.

Mr. Fortier:

"My disagreement with the Free Press editorials on this subject and the Judges' crackdown of last Christmas..."

Mr. Blackburn: As I recall it is just the one point to which he was referring insofar as I am concerned.

Mr. Fortier:

"The concern for Bob Paton and the objection to my stand in the Viet Nam War which was then supported in the hawkish editorials of the London Free Press."

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Dickins was not referring to me in that context of anything but the university demonstration at the Sarnia Blue Water Bridge and I might explain that, Mr. Fortier.

Following his having received advice that his contract was not going to be renewed, Mr. Dickins requested to see me and I agreed to see him at once. Mr. Dickins said that he was surprised that over the period of time during which he had had the authority to make editorial comments, or whatever you wish to call them, as described by Mr. Brown, that he had at no time received a directive from me.

That is not on the record. That was not placed on the record by Mr. Dickins. However, it is true and I place it on the record.

In discussing the Sarnia Blue Water Bridge incident I merely said to Mr. Dickins that I, Blackburn, could not have brought myself to playing a part in organizing the demonstration. I felt that Mr. Dickins had in fact played a part in organizing it, using his programme on CFPL Radio to do this.

I could not have brought myself to do it because it was a demonstration which the leader of it in advance had said would involve the blocking of a public highway.

Therefore, it was a demonstration which was planned to break the law and, in fact did; and I could not have brought myself to encouraging students or anybody else to break the law. I told him this in that way. I did not criticize him directly as such for having done it.

Mr. Fortier: Simply put, Mr. Blackburn—and I ask this question on behalf of the Committee—did the fact that Mr. Dickins expressed opinions which ran contrary to opinions which had been expressed in editorials in the London Free Press, influence your decision, the decision which was taken not to renew his contract?

Mr. Blackburn: I think Mr. Brown would have to answer that because I had nothing to do with the decision.

Mr. Fortier: I think that is very important. You had nothing to do with the decision?

Mr. Blackburn: Nothing whatsoever.

Mr. Brown: I can add, Mr. Blackburn was not aware of the situation with Mr. Dickins until the fait accompli. His contract was not renewed.

Mr. Fortier: It is very important to put that on the record. Would you care to answer the question which I put to Mr. Blackburn and which he then put to you?

Mr. Brown: Would you repeat the question.

Mr. Fortier: Whether the fact that certain opinions expressed by Mr. Dickins on his open line programme ran contrary to editorials published in the London Free Press. Was this one of the factors which was instrumental in your reaching the decision to give him his 30 days' notice?

Mr. Brown: Absolutely no. I repeat: Mr. Bremner, our radio editor, constantly does commentaries and editorials which are in conflict with what the newspaper says he does and we are quite happy that he does so. It has never been suggested he should change and the thing applied to Mr. Dickins.

Mr. Fortier: This has often happened, that there has been editorials aired over the radio station which ran contrary to what had been said earlier in the London Free Press?

Mr. Brown: That is correct, sir.

Mr. Fortier: This letter from Mr. Dickins, published in your October 22nd issue of the London Free Press, has an editor's note to it which I will read.

"As with all letters to the editor, this one has been edited to conform with the newspaper's standing policy requiring letters to be brief and to avoid possible libel."

My first question—maybe this should be directed to Mr. Heine—is: do you have a similar note at the bottom of every letter to the editor?

Mr. Heine: We carry that note or something like it fairly often. Mr. Honey? Once a week or thereabouts?

Mr. Honey: Yes.

Mr. Heine: Once or twice a week in a little italic box that says just that in effect.

Mr. Fortier: Is there any particular reason in this instance this note was appended to the letter?

Mr. Heine: I think it is self evident. Mr. Dickens was casting rather—using rather strong language about the newspaper. It seemed to me on reading the letter it was unduly long rambling, had many aspects to it, deserved tidying up and pruning and yet we had a responsibility to carry a charge by such a person in such circumstances in this newspaper and we did.

In order to be fair, so that the public would not think that we had in fact run the entire letter, I decided to put a little note on so that it was quite clear we had altered the letter, edited it as we would any letter and I exercised normal editorial judgment in doing so.

Mr. Fortier: You edited that letter as to size?

Mr. Heine: Oh yes. It was six closely written, typewritten pages.

Mr. Fortier: You edited it as to libel?

Mr. Heine: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Libel from whose point of view?

Mr. Heine: Probably Walter Blackburn's.

Mr. Fortier: Was your editing...

Mr. Blackburn: Pardon me just a moment, may I speak to that, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Blackburn: Our solicitor advised us that certain parts of the letter were, in his opinion, libelous and that they libelled both the London Free Press corporately and Walter J. Blackburn personally. As we would have handled any other letter, the libelous portions were removed on our solicitor's advice.

Senator Prowse: Not to save you a libel action?

Mr. Blackburn: No. I was the one who was libelled and the London Free Press in our solicitor's opinion.

Senator Prowse: If it had been said about anybody else you would have been subject, in your solicitor's opinion they could have sued you for publishing it?

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, in our solicitor's opinion.

Senator Prowse: But you were not clearly going to sue yourself. You would have had both legal fees and you would not be anything.

Mr. Blackburn: It was a very interesting case in fact which I had never experienced before. Our solicitor also advised us that we were to publish the libel, we would have no case against Mr. Dickens.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Blackburn: And I was personally unwilling to forego my right to sue Mr. Dickens. I decided later that neither the company nor Walter Blackburn personally should engage in such a lawsuit. I think the reasons are obvious but I was at the point initially was certainly unprepared to give up my rights or the rights of the company.

Mr. Carradine: May I say one thing? I find it is fairly pertinent to this discussion. When the letter came in to Mr. Heine, the editor, brought it to me. We advised Mr. Blackburn that we had received a letter from Mr. Dickens and Mr. Blackburn's reply was that he did not wish to see the letter, that the newspaper would handle this just as any other letter to the editor.

I think that should be on the record in defence—not his defence—but I think it is a matter of interest to the Committee.

Senator Prowse: May I say something, Mr. Chairman, just to clear up one thing. I asked a question and I made a comment because didn't understand it all, which could imply that the paper had used the law of libel that they normally would use to protect themselves from suit, in order to protect themselves from accusation. After hearing Mr. Blackburn's explanation I understand that this was used in order to protect his right to take action against the writer of the letter. I think that should be clear because...

The Chairman: I think that is what he said.

Senator Prowse: I do not want my previous statement to leave an improper implication.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes. It is a very interesting case. A newspaper apparently, and I had not run into this before in my full experience, cannot be a party to libelling itself without losing its right to sue.

Senator Prowse: You are repeating the libel and becoming a party.

Mr. Fortier: I am sure your solicitors must have wrung their hands in swift glee and said "ah jurisprudence".

Mr. Heine: If I may continue the facetious note...

The Chairman: That is not being facetious.

Mr. Heine: No, but the facetious note was a suck. If we had published it I would have been in the position as editor of having been sued by my publisher.

Mr. Fortier: You could not have claimed you had not seen the letter.

Mr. Heine: No. I would have been in the position of having made an error in allowing the libel to run.

Mr. Fortier: Were any facts edited from the letter?

Mr. Heine: To the best of my professional ability I removed those elements that were described in the footnote, the excess verbiage, that did not have much meaning, the libelous elements and the remainder to the best of my ability is an honest editing job on a series of charges, all of which are reflected in the letter. I may have erred. I do not think so.

Mr. Fortier: The aftermath of this incident, Mr. Blackburn, does it lead you to conclude now that a person who owns a newspaper in a community should not also own another media of information?

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Fortier, my answer is "No". It does not. I might say one thing—at least one more thing. Mr. Dickins' accusations in this matter, the allegations, were in fact carried by CKSL Radio and were published in the University Gazette in part, the really important allegations and in a magazine called Twenty Cent Magazine which is distributed in the city and so the part of it which we were unable to publish for the reasons I have given, or parts, were published elsewhere, which would indicate there are other media voices in the community and I might have also sued them for libel had I chosen to do so.

The Chairman: It is almost 10 o'clock and I would ask if any Senators have any additional questions that they organize themselves and ask them immediately as I have assured our friends from London we would adjourn at 10 o'clock and I am going to try and adjourn.

Mr. Blackburn: We are prepared to stay.

The Chairman: We appreciate that and we are grateful. I think the Senators should organize themselves for their final questions.

Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: There is a fairly common practice when letters are edited that dots and periods, a series of periods and other markings are put in at those points where it has been edited. Is that practice ever followed in your newspaper?

Mr. Heine: No sir. You have asked us several times not to answer with a "No". I have heard your hearings. Our practice with letters is to try to preserve the honest intent of the writer.

Senator McElman: I am not questioning this.

Mr. Heine: Yes you are.

Senator McElman: No I am not.

Mr. Heine: We do not use dots to show what was taken out because some of the letters come in, in such a poorly written fashion that there would be more dots than there would be context, honestly. So, we run all letters except from the chronics who write regularly. We write and tell them we are sorry. We will just run one a month or something.

Senator McElman: I have heard the suggestion in this instance the result of the editing would have wound up with perhaps as many dots as there was copy.

Mr. Heine: Yes. That happens sometimes.

Senator McElman: In this particular case.

Mr. Heine: Oh, goodness no.

Senator McElman: It was indicated to me this was the case.

Mr. Heine: I would not say that was a fair comment, sir. I am sorry. I misunderstood the entire intent of your question.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, whereas I do not want to prolong the Dickins case, there is one more item of information which should go on the record. Mr. Brown mentioned that Mr. Knight had made an announcement with respect to Mr. Dickins. That announcement was published in the London Free Press on page 3—on page 2, I believe it was.

Mr. Honey: Page 1.

Mr. Carradine: October 16th was the first announcement.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Dickins was a fairly prominent London person. Then following Mr. Dickins stating on CKSL Radio he had been fired, our editorial department followed that story up and interviewed Mr. Dickins and the result of the interview was also published.

Mr. Fortier: On page 3, October 17th.

Mr. Carradine: That is correct. I would like to add a little more to that, if I may because I think it is important.

On October 16 when it came to the attention of our news department that Mr. Dickins was leaving CFPL, we attempted to contact him—our news department did. They were unable to reach him after several attempts. They phoned Mr. Knight of the radio station who gave them a statement. As we were close to deadline that is what ran on October 16th on page 1.

On the morning of October 17th when Mr. Dickins went on the radio station and made his statement, our news department again contacted Mr. Dickins and asked him to make a statement, which he did and then as is customary, and as is our policy, we then went back to Mr. Knight and asked him to make a further statement so that we would have both sides of the story and that is what ran on page 3 in the afternoon edition on October 17th.

Mr. Heine: One further final observation. A publication on page 3 of the London Free Press is not a form of secrecy.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, have you any further questions?

Senator McElman: Yes. Your newspaper, or your organization does a lot of research and in that research I should imagine there is a measurement of your circulation readership. Would that break down into age groupings perhaps—to tell you whether you are relevant to the youth of today?

Mr. Carradine: We ran a study last summer, Senator, which was quite an extensive study at that time unfortunately we only broke it down under 35 and 35 and over, so it is very difficult to read off from that any information as to the reading habits of young people, which is possibly, I believe, the question you are asking.

Senator McElman: Following on that, can you give us any instance of specific changes in your approach to meet the change in moral values or the challenge of moral values by the youth of today.

Mr. Carradine: I am sure we can. Perhaps Mr. Williams or Mr. Heine would care to talk to that.

Mr. Williams: Senator, we try to constantly be aware of what is going on in our community. We have been able to devote staff from time to time to in-depth studies which we are able to publish and in some instances in special sections.

We have what we call a Saturday Feature Section in which we have changed the emphasis from the routine into a special supplement. I recall one that we did last October on drugs where young people lived for several days with people who were taking drugs. It was a September issue.

We researched it thoroughly. We went to the Addiction Foundation, through the medical research and the kids who were living in this sub culture. We thought this was of importance to young readers.

We are continuing doing this sort of work where we see the lead from the news that indicates a social problem we try and do it.

We are currently running one on the challenge of Canadian Indians. Now this is not particularly new but one of our writers spent some months and this is the sort of thing we are looking and continuing and trying to do in advance of problems.

'Drugs is one of them. We have done a great deal of work with the pill. One of our writers won an award about three years ago for work on abortion stories.

Young readers are not only interested in that might be—the teenagers—they are young adults really. I really think we are doing this work but we do not label it this is the interest of teenagers or young people.

Senator McElman: No.

Mr. Blackburn: One of our reporters, I might say, Senator McElman, purchased some marijuana in the community. We were rather concerned about it because it ended up in the office and we didn't know what to do with it. I was breaking the law but we made..

Senator Prowse: What did you do?

Mr. Blackburn: We turned it over to the mounted police as quickly as we could.

In this manner we prove marijuana was available in the community for purchase.

Mr. Heine: To supplement Mr. Blackburn's comment, this was some time ago at a time when it was not commonly known there was marijuana in the community as it is generally known today. There were some very snarky questions asked.

Senator McElman: Mr. Blackburn, you have heard me ask other witnesses about the theory of the protection of sources of information in criminal cases and the proposition that this should be provided for in the law. Could I have your reaction as to whether you believe it should continue under the present system whereby the court makes that decision or whether journalists should have such protection in law?

Mr. Blackburn: I think that our responsibility, Senator McElman, is to support our system of justice and I think that it probably has to be left up to the decision of the reporter involved as to whether or not he chooses or chooses not to disclose his sources; and I would be unable to advise him one way or the other if he were to ask me.

I do not think that it is wise for the law to provide to a newspaper or to a reporter of a newspaper any privilege that is different from that provided to any citizen.

In my judgment we do not wish any special privileges; but having said that, I must say that I am very sympathetic with the reporter who refuses to disclose his or her source of information and having decided that the disclosure should not be made, he or she may in fact be found in contempt of court and go to jail on the issue.

I am very sympathetic with the reporter in that position, I must say. It is the reporter that is going to jail and not the publisher.

Senator McElman: You have no corporate policy in this respect?

Mr. Blackburn: No.

Senator McElman: You mentioned several times in the brief the theory or premise that newspapers are hired by the public to obtain and report news and information. What is the basis for this hiring aspect?

Mr. Blackburn: It is a philosophical view we hold, Senator McElman. We feel when the subscriber purchases a newspaper he is purchasing a service and expects us to provide that service; and he is in that manner and in this concept employing us as his agent to be present where he is unable to be present in person. And we report to him the occurrences which we are able to report.

I suppose it is in a way a philosophical concept. I suppose to put it another way, one might say, in return for his trust in us—spending his money to buy the newspaper—we endeavour to fulfill that trust.

Senator McElman: I just have not heard this put forward before and I was wondering what the foundation was.

Mr. Blackburn: Well, it is just a philosophical concept.

Senator McElman: The Canadian Code of Advertising Standards—you have introduced this in your brief. Have you published that in your newspaper?

Mr. Carradine: Yes, sir, it has been.

Mr. Heine: From time to time.

Senator McElman: At what approximate time?

Mr. Heine: Well, it would appear on our classified pages, I would say, probably once a week. Right at the present time we are working with the Canadian Advertising Advisory Board. They have supplied us with a series of advertisements which we will be publishing and they could be published this week.

Senator McElman: There is lots of opportunity for the public to compare your performance with the code that you support?

Mr. Heine: Absolutely.

Senator McElman: There was a reference made as well which had to do with the publishing of the names of the owners. You supported the principle and then you seemed to back away from it out of concern or fear, of a multiplicity of crank phone calls and perhaps the fear of mayhem to your own person or to your family. I think you used terminology something like this: "In this violent society"—or "The nature of these violent times".

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, words to that effect.

Senator McElman: Do you really believe this to be a fact?

Mr. Blackburn: We have had, Senator McElman, in the last five years three bomb threats at the London Free Press and I learned of only one the other day. My staff did not tell me. On the first one we evacuated the building. The second one I said we would not and the third one we evacuated only part of the building. I receive telephone calls from time to time personally. The last one I received was at 2 o'clock in the morning. Mr. Carradine has received crank telephone calls. This is not unusual. Whereas I am quite prepared to receive them myself, I would be quite prepared to identify myself in person on the masthead of the newspaper as the President and Publisher and accept the consequences, if any, of drawing attention to a name which some crank might choose to take some action against, I would not wish to publish the names of my staff and subject them to the same possibility.

I do not feel that there is anything in London that is any different from any other community.

This is not, in my judgment, related to London per se.

I mentioned in my brief the experience of Mayor Drapeau in Montreal. It is possibly a different situation but one worries a bit about this.

Senator McElman: There is indicated in this that you perhaps feel that the holder of what is often referred to as a public trust, should perhaps be better or more insulated in this respect than the holder of public office.

Mr. Carradine: I do not believe we said that, Senator.

Senator McElman: No, I did not say you had said it. I said it was indicated.

Mr. Blackburn: Another thing I would like to say—possibly I should not—but it is a factor in this.

Five young women have been murdered in and around London in the last while—about five years. We have offered a reward for information which leads to the apprehension and conviction of the murderer. The City Council, after we offered our reward, voted a much larger reward; in that case $10,000. Our offer was $1,000, and we organized a system by means of which a person could provide the information with respect to the murderer without identifying himself and we did this on our own decision and the murderer knows it, no doubt.

Mr. Heine: To amplify on the answer Mr. Blackburn made, there are two people, one associated with the intense hatreds of the Middle East and another associated with the strong views of people who hold political views on the right hand side of the political spectrum, who come to my office regularly and I say in all seriousness that I am very careful to keep myself between them and the door.

The crank calls are common to all of us.

The Chairman: It sounds like public life

Mr. Heine: It is. We are aware of it.

Senator Prowse: I was going to say we have lost a couple of Presidents but I have not heard of us losing a city editor yet.

Mr. Heine: They used to horse whip them.

Senator McElman: I have one further question only.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator McElman: Your studies indicate that you, holding newspapers, radio and television interests, looking to the future perhaps your CATV interests might be not only highly useful in the future but also highly profitable; and yet I believe it is indicated that you are endeavouring to dispose of the cable interests.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes, Senator McElman. We have a 50 per cent interest in Chatham Cab

TV which we have sold to Jarmain Cable System Limited.

We have no other cable interests. We went into the Chatham Cable Television with Mr. Jarmain and Famous Players initially in order to extend coverage of CFPL Television to Chatham, because up until that time—and this was before the CRTC had any jurisdiction over cable—we could not assure ourselves of being on any cable system unless we had some voice in ownership and we were interested in Chatham and in Sarnia.

So our purpose, more than an investment, was to assure ourselves of being on the cable. That assurance is provided now by the CRTC and it is no longer required that we have a voice in the system.

Senator McElman: And it has no bearing on any principle that might be involved as to the extension of the multi-media ownership aspect of things?

Mr. Blackburn: No. Not with respect to Chatham, but—we are quite aware it is unlikely—we would be prepared to have an interest in a cable system in London.

Senator McElman: You did not have any other cable interests prior to that which you have disposed of?

Mr. Blackburn: No.

Senator McElman: That is the only one?

Mr. Blackburn: That is the only one.

Senator McElman: Fine, thank you very much.

Mr. Blackburn: I think in fact you may be interested in this. In the early 1950's we were offered an interest in one of the cable systems in London and concluded that it would not be proper for us to be involved in it because at that time cables were bringing American programming into Canada which was, we thought, contrary to the public interest and we did not feel as Canadian Broadcasters we should be involved in this.

I was surprised in fact that the Government, in the light of what has been said in the various Royal Commission reports, permitted it to be done. However, it seems at that time, if I have had, in its opinion, no control or did not wish to exercise what control it might have had.

Senator Everett: What percentage of Jarmain do you hold now?

Mr. Blackburn: We own nothing of Jarmain. We own 50% of Chatham Cable Television until the sale is approved by the Canadian Radio and Television Commission. It is before a hearing...

Mr. Brown: February 10th.

Mr. Blackburn: February 10th the application for transfer.

Senator Everett: It does not involve a stock transfer to you.

Mr. Blackburn: No. We own 50% of Chatham Cable Television.

Senator Everett: But the sale of it does not involve a stock transfer to you of Jarmain stock?

Mr. Blackburn: No, it involves cash.

Senator Everett: Does CFPL Broadcasting Limited own anything more than CFPL-TV and radio?

Mr. Blackburn: No. It has no other interests.

Senator Everett: Does London Free Press Limited own anything other than the London Free Press?

Mr. Blackburn: No equity investment as I have mentioned this morning, Senator Everett. We have some non-equity investments, mainly in short-term bank notes.

Senator Everett: Do you have a separate printing company?

Mr. Blackburn: No.

The Chairman: Do you have any more questions, Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: No.

The Chairman: I gather that Mr. Fortier promises me he has only one question and on that basis we will hear it.

Mr. Fortier: In reviewing my notes, Mr. Chairman, I found one which I had taken this morning from your presentation and it surprised me at the time and it still does now as I read it.

You said you avoided, as much as possible, editorializing on situations in the Province of Quebec so as to be told—and I quote—"It is none of your business". Did you say that this morning?

Mr. Blackburn: No sir.

Mr. Fortier: What did you say, Mr. Blackburn?

Mr. Blackburn: Because I felt that certain situations in the Province of Quebec are probably none of the business of English-speaking Canadians.

Mr. Fortier: Such as what?

Mr. Blackburn: Whether or not newspapers—I was thinking of the Press Council to a degree. I would not wish to recommend to this Committee a national press council, as I said.

Mr. Fortier: Oh, I see.

Mr. Blackburn: Because I would be then asking you to suggest that there should be a Press Council for the Province of Quebec—I think I mentioned there was already one being organized—but the newspapermen in the Province of Quebec might not wish a National Press Council and this is their business, not mine.

Mr. Fortier: I am glad you added this because I was not the only one who understood you to mean you did not comment editorially on, say, political events in Quebec thus abdicationing what I think is a very important responsibility.

Mr. Blackburn: No, we do that.

Mr. Fortier: I am glad you added that and I am glad that I asked the question because Mr. Spears and I both thought this morning that you had said that.

Mr. Heine: We comment vigorously concerning matters in Quebec vis-a-vis the rest of Canada.

Mr. Fortier: And the rest of Canada vis-à-vis Quebec?

Mr. Heine: Exactly. We have tried with good conscience to understand the problems that exist in national unity in this country and to do anything we can to encourage the bridging of whatever gap exists.

Mr. Fortier: And I would have been very surprised if it had been otherwise.

Mr. Heine: We work at it very hard.

Mr. Blackburn: We have felt that the Province of Ontario has probably held the main responsibility for playing a part in this matter of national unity because we are closer neighbours to the Province of Quebec and possibly understand the situation better than the others; we accept this responsibility very actively.

Mr. Fortier: Merci beaucoup.

Mr. Blackburn: Merci.

Mr. Heine: Mr. Blackburn fortunately you have a New Brunswicker to assist you in that.

The Chairman: Mr. Blackburn, on behalf of the Committee I would like to begin by thanking you and perhaps by apologizing to Mr. Carradine because he missed a birthday party tonight. He may be home in time for a anniversary party tomorrow.

We apologize to the other members of your party that you asked to stay because I quite appreciate they may have had plans, personally or otherwise. We are grateful that you were willing to stay this evening. I would say to you personally, Mr. Blackburn, since the beginning of these hearings you have displayed a keen interest in what we are trying to do and I hope that interest will remain now that your formal press hearings at least are complete.

Mr. Blackburn: Indeed it will.

The Chairman: Now, Honourable Senators, it has been a very full day and I think I can say on your behalf we are particularly appreciate of Mr. Blackburn and his group for being as frank and as fair as they have been. We particularly appreciate that.

I would mention to the Senators the schedule for the balance of the week. Friday we have only one session. Please note it is 11:30 and not 10 o'clock as listed on the schedule.

Tomorrow morning at 10 a.m. we have the F.P. Publications. At 2:30 the Winnipeg Free Press, at 3:30 the Ottawa Journal and 4:30 the Globe and Mail.

Tomorrow evening at 8 o'clock we receive the brief of the Canadian Labour Congress.

The meeting is adjourned.

The Committee adjourned.

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Wednesday, October 29th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator Davey moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lang:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada, in particular, and without restricting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and report upon the extent and nature of their impact and influence on the Canadian public, to be known as the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media;

That the Committee have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of the inquiry;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to sit during adjournments of the Senate and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to this Special Committee from 9th to 18th December, 1969, both inclusive, and the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period;

That the papers and evidence received and taken on the subject in the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Beaubien, Davey, Everett, Giguère, Hays, Irvine, Langlois, Macdonald (Cape Breton), McElman, Petten, Prowse, Sparrow, Urquhart, White and Willis.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—

Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, November 6th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,

The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That the names of the Honourable Senators Giguère and Urquhart be removed from the list of Senators serving on the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media; and

That the names of the Honourable Senators Bourque, Smith and Welch be added to the list of Senators serving on the said Special Committee.

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative.

Extract from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, Thursday, December 18th, 1969.

With leave of the Senate,
The Honourable Senator McDonald moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Smith:

That Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation to the Special Committee of the Senate on Mass Media from 20th to 30th January, 1970, and that the Committee have power to sit during sittings of the Senate for that period.

After debate, and—

The question being put on the motion, it was—
Resolved in the affirmative, on division.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, January 22, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, today we are going to receive a brief from FP Publications Limited, and then later on today presentations and briefs from several FP Publications.

Seated on my immediate right is Mr. R. S. Malone, who is the President of FP Publications Limited. Mr. Malone, as I am sure you know, is also the publisher and editor-in-chief of the Winnipeg Free Press.

Sitting on his immediate right is Mr. Bruce Iking, who is the Secretary of FP Publications Limited.

On my immediate left is Mr. Peter McLintock, the executive editor of the Winnipeg Free Press.

This morning we will be receiving a brief from Mr. Malone on behalf of FP Publications. But also, as you know if you have studied his brief, this is a brief from the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Malone, the brief which you were kind enough to send three weeks in advance, as we requested, has been read and circulated to the Senators. It has presumably been studied by them. I am going to call on you now to make an oral statement, which I suggest should take no longer than about 15 minutes.

Following that oral statement you will be questioned by the Senators on the content of your brief, on your oral statement, and indeed on any other things which may be on their minds.

I am at a loss to give you guidance as to whether or not this morning we will deal specifically with the Free Press. I am afraid we will have to play that just a little bit by ear.

As I understand, there will not be an oral statement on behalf of the Free Press this afternoon. You are going to deal with that now.

There will presumably this afternoon, however, be oral statements from representatives of the Ottawa Journal and the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Malone.

Mr. Richard Sankey Malone, General Manager and President of FP Publications Limited and Publisher and Editor in Chief of the Winnipeg Free Press: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, as your Chairman has mentioned, you had the brief, and no doubt are fully acquainted with it. But I would like to add a few words, if I might. I won't take up your time by repeating material that is already in the brief.

I have with me here today, as your Chairman said, representatives from the Globe and Mail and also the Ottawa Journal. They will be speaking to their respective briefs later this afternoon.

In our central brief, which we are dealing with this morning, I have touched on FP Publications as a group. I have also attempted to outline some of the factors respecting The Free Press in particular.

You will have noted that I have attempted to outline the organization or composition of our group, its ownership and how it came into being. I have also touched on something of our philosophy and the responsibilities of newspaper publishing as we see it.

Also for the benefit of the committee I have taken the liberty of quoting at some length some of the excellent statements by such authorities as Lord Francis Williams, Lord Shawcross, Clifton Daniels, Lord Devlin, Sir Geoffrey Cox and Chief Justice Bell of Pennsylvania and many others which typify what we believe in in the publishing business.

I have also touched briefly on some of the press enquiries in Britain in recent years. Then, in accordance with your Chairman's suggestion, I have at the end of our brief attempted to summarize some eight specific areas or suggestions to which I feel your committee might constructively direct your thinking.

I might say in this hearing our thought and hope is to be helpful and constructive. If we can add anything to your thinking, any of our people will be very glad to co-operate.

I have in my brief attempted to review some of the advantages and disadvantages of group development and our important policy of maintaining the separate and distinct characters of our individual papers and also their high degree of editorial freedom—and where editors are free to pursue independent and often diametrically opposed editorial points of view as in keeping with their honestly held convictions.

Since the preparation of my brief and in following your agenda and proceedings from day to day, it seems to me there are two very important areas of publishing which may not yet have been brought to your attention. I should like to touch on them briefly now.

The first is the critical—or I should say disastrous outlook now facing the agricultural or farm newspapers of Canada today. The great mortalities in farm papers seem to be completely ignored across Canada. Yet there are now only three farm papers of any size or national character left in all of Canada—and they are now all facing economic problems largely due to government actions.

By that I mean the discriminatory increase in postal rates of from 175% to 400% ordered by the Postal Department and the multimillion dollar government subsidy granted each year to their chief advertising competitor—the broadcast industry.

I was surprised to learn that none of the larger or general farm papers is to appear before you, according to the schedule I have seen so far—and I did not realize this until after my brief was written—although these papers are of vital national importance and are read by hundreds of thousands of people in rural areas all across Canada.

While I have not come specifically prepared to speak on this subject, we do publish Canada's largest farm weekly—and if it would be of help I would welcome an opportunity to enlarge on this subject for you and try to outline the situation further should your members care to raise it during the question period.

I would also like to direct the members' attention to paragraph 84 of my brief and appendix C—where I have touched on this matter of farm papers very briefly. I have a few statistics in my case here which may be helpful later.

The other area of concern is that of mechanical unions in the publishing field. Indications so far are that your committee may not be exploring this very critical area in any great depth.

This subject, I think as some of you are aware, is very complex and is perhaps the most urgent matter facing most newspapers today both in the United Kingdom, United States and Canada. Indeed a very large portion of the various press inquiries in England were devoted to this aspect of our business.

There have been three major press inquiries in England in the past ten years. And this took up a great deal of their time and study.

To give you some idea of the scope of the after the British studies they projected a special task force put out by the Economist Intelligence unit. And they did a study. And here it is. It will give you some idea of the scope of this aspect of the business. They went into very thoroughly.

I don't know whether your members are aware of this, but I would be glad to turn over, if it is of any value. There are tremendous statistics. Thank you.

The Chairman: We would be most grateful. Thank you.

Mr. Malone: I would suggest that many of the factors there, while they are somewhat different in Canadian terms—they deal in different terminology and that sort of thing—many of the factors there are applicable to our industry here in Canada just as they are in Britain. And it is a matter of serious concern. And I hope your members will have an opportunity of seeing something of that major aspect of the British studies.

I refer principally to such matters as "feather-bedding", "bogus" or "dead horse" settling, excessive manning on equipment, union positions regarding the introduction of new equipment and new technology, and so on.

I assume you are aware of union regulations which require newspapers to re-set type, proof, correct and then throw it away in the wastepaper basket—as it covers matters which may have already appeared in the paper weeks or even months previously.

And you must know of the local advertiser who wishes the identical advertisement to appear in both local newspapers on the same day in the same town—but the advertisement has to be set twice.

These are things that, I think, in the economy of newspapers we have got to give consideration to—how long can we go on in wasteful practices of this nature. But these are things I think your Committee, Mr. Chairman, might be interested in looking into.

I think you perhaps have noted over the years the mortality of newspapers. More often than not in such cases the argument has been that union practices have contributed to the end of many large papers. This was true in New York just a matter of a year or so ago.

I have only touched on that very briefly in my brief. It is a very involved subject. I doubt we could cover it in any depth here. Nor do I think we are qualified to do it in detail. It arises right across the country.

But I just draw your attention to it as something you might have a study on.

As to future trends in the newspaper field, I could direct your attention particularly to page 48 of my brief touching on the matter of agency operations. In addition, might I draw your attention to pages 54 and 55 of my brief where I have quoted Lord Francis Williams on the subject of group operations and a very flattering comment that the formation pattern developed by FP Publications has addressed both journalistic quality and political and economic independence—which he regards as an “important turn” in the newspaper field.

In this quotation on page 55, I would make a minor correction in the matter of dates. I am afraid there is a typographical error.

The Chairman: Are there extra copies available of this?

Mr. Malone: There are extra copies available on that.

The date given for The Globe and Mail joining the FP group is shown as 1968. This should read 1965. It is shown correctly elsewhere in the brief.

In this matter of editorial quality, might I also direct your attention to paragraph 31 of the brief, recording our recent distinction in Professor Merrill's new book “The Elite Press.”

In this, two of our papers, The Winnipeg Free Press and The Globe and Mail, were selected as the two Canadian papers rated among the top 40 newspapers in the entire world.

However, I don't wish to imply by anything contained in my brief or anything I may have said, that we are entirely happy with our operations or that we do not have worries and concerns about the future. We are continuously concerned with the quality of our papers and our service to the public.

We are concerned lest we should ever develop permissive reporting in our present permissive society. We are concerned with the growing dependence on advertising revenue as against circulation revenue. Today the stability of many papers could be very vulnerable if advertising revenues dropped 15 or 20 per cent.

I would certainly endorse Lord Thomson's view that the only way to have an independent and free press in Canada is to have the press financially independent.

In following your proceedings here, it seems to me there is a point of some possible confusion that I might be able to clear up. This is in respect to the numbers of news bureaus and correspondents the various papers have. This is often misleading.

Let me give you an example. While our group have permanent staff correspondents in Ottawa, Washington, London, Quebec and China, each of our papers also have countless part time “stringers” and contributors located all over the world.

For instance, the Free Press, quite apart from the Regular correspondents, I have mentioned, also has qualified regular contributors such as:

David Exel in Singapore.

Gavin Gordon in Brussels.

Normal Macrae and Alan Harvey in London.

Richard Mowrer in Madrid.

Leo Ryan in Paris.

Bob Reford at United Nations.

B.C. Nag in New Delhi.

Anthony Reynolds in Bombay.

Stuart Griffin and Mike Holmes in Tokyo.

R. L. Curthoys in Melbourne.

Cyril Wiss in Rome.

Ian Vorres in Athens.

Marcelle Poirier in Hong Kong, and so on.

This is in addition to all the foreign correspondents supplied through such services as The Observer in London, The Washington Post, The Los Angeles Times, The Economist and The Manchester Guardian and so on.

The Globe and Mail or Vancouver Sun would have an equally wide coverage of contributors in various countries all over the world apart from their regular staff men.

Last year also, for example, Free Press writers went abroad on special assignments on innumerable occasions. Areas visited, and from which stories and articles were filed—I had a quick check on this and the countries include The Middle East, Ireland, Israel, Belgium, Sweden, Germany, Yugoslavia, Italy, Scotland, Japan and Denmark.

I mention those simply for one purpose. If there should be any doubt in the minds of the Committee that the quality of newspapers has shown improvement both in writing and coverage over the years, I would invite you to go into any newspaper library and look at old newspapers of 20-30 or 40 years ago. The stilted and emotional style of writing and the parochial range of coverage of the past would amaze you in comparing with the papers today.

Here in Ottawa, for example, back in 1934, 35 years ago, when I was a member of the Parliamentary Press Gallery, there were only nine permanent members as I recall, which increased to some 16 during actual sessions.

I think you are all aware of the scope of the gallery here now. They have had to move them out and put them into another building.

All these things have expanded the coverage of both the national and international field. There is no question that Canadian newspaper readers today are far better informed than they have ever been in the past.

I have little doubt that most members of parliament and politicians regard the responsibilities of the press in a much different light than the general reading public. This is not unusual and nothing new. I have outlined this factor in my brief and I would hope this committee will be conscious of this fact in your deliberations.

The kind of newspaper a legislator might like is far different from the demands of the general reading public that we serve. The press is and should be a disturbing and thought-provoking force in its community. This is its nature and its value.

It is for this reason that in a free country the press itself is continually subjected to criticism—as you will note in most letters to the editor. Izvestia and Pravda don't have too much to worry about on that score.

I might just transgress on the lighter side if you will permit me.

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Malone: This is a very important occasion, and I would like to touch on it. I would not like to let it pass.

This is almost the 200th anniversary of a great event in England—1771, to be exact.

The Parliament in Britain took objection to the kind of papers or pamphlets which were being published then. They didn't like the way the affairs of parliament were being reported. So they despatched the sergeant-at-arms to arrest two publishers (or printers as they were then called) to bring them before the House to account for their actions and to throw them in jail.

I won't prolong the story but, if you are interested in it, he laid hands on the publisher. At this point the publisher, being very quick on his feet, turned to a bobby standing by and said "This man assaulted me; arrest him." Whereupon the bobby arrested the sergeant-at-arms and threw him into jail.

Then Parliament then said "Release him and the Lord Mayor refused to do it. So they put the Lord Mayor in jail.

I do hope that in any actions your Committee may take that we will not turn the clock back or start on any backward trail.

Senator Prowse: It is a lot of trouble to get rid of the Mayor, is it not?

Mr. Malone: I have got one final point here that I think is of some concern to you.

There have been suggestions of a press council in some form or another in Canada. I have dealt with this very fully in my brief and I would ask that my remarks on this subject be given your full consideration. It is a matter that has had a lot of study. There are lots of factors involved in it. And I have tried to cover it just as fully as I can.

We are not perfect, and we are not above criticism. But we are not an irresponsible press in Canada.

In my view at the present time there is no any justification or need for this type of pre-council to discipline or direct the press of Canada. In my view it would be a backward step and away from freedom and responsibility to establish one.

But if at any future date the press demonstrates any flagrant abuse of its responsibilities, the matter could be brought up then, and quite properly. But certainly no press council should ever operate, in my view, under the control or direction of government if we wish to preserve a free country.

In closing might I quote two paragraphs from the brief submitted by the Victoria Times? Mr. Irwin will not be here, but he has submitted a brief, as the other papers have. And he makes this comment:

"Whatever the ills of journalism only journalists can cure them. Journalism in the sense in which I have tried to define it is a creative process. Its direction demands the creative mind operating in a free environment. Regulation by authority cannot create. External dictation won't create. Only the professionally oriented free mind of the trained and dedicated journalist can solve the problems of achieving socially adequate communication through journalistic process.

In short, only journalists can make journalism work."

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Malone.

I want to assure you that the Committee has a considerable interest in the problems of the farm press and in the problems of the unions generally, both from the publishers' point of view and from the point of view of the union members.

These are matters which we are exploring and, hopefully, there may be some questions on this for you this morning.

I am also grateful to you for mentioning the representation from the Victoria Times. It gives me an opportunity of pointing out, as I have on a number of other occasions, that the Committee has received quite a substantial number of written briefs from publications across the country—publications who will not be appearing at these hearings. And these briefs will shortly be made available to the press.

The only other point I would make before turning to the Senators is that, if any of the questions this morning you feel are of such confidential nature that you would prefer to answer them privately, then certainly you need only indicate so.

Having said that, I turn first of all to Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Malone, you submitted a very complete and very comprehensive brief, and added to it this morning with very stimulating remarks, which lead me to ask you this first question.

In paragraph 2 of your brief you first said:

"If the public, as represented by its Parliament, wishes to know more about the information media, 'we are happy to co-operate in your investigation.'"

And then you went on in paragraph 8 to say:

"The suggestion that the press should 'account' to a parliamentary body is, of course, repugnant."

Could you please try and reconcile these two statements for the Committee?

Mr. Malone: Yes. I don't think they are in any conflict.

I think Parliament in wanting to know something about an industry, they are quite entitled to it; and we are happy to co-operate.

But to account to Parliament in what is said, or views, that is the thing that worries me.

Mr. Fortier: You mean on a permanent basis?

Mr. Malone: Or, say, we are called to account for some editorial position we have taken—say, a criticism of the government. That is the aspect that would concern me.

Mr. Fortier: I see.

Mr. Malone: But as to what our business does; who runs the business; who owns it; I agree, this is a matter of public concern.

Mr. Fortier: If the Committee should come to the conclusion that in any way the press is falling down on the job, so to speak, and should so report publicly, would you regard this as improper?

Mr. Malone: Not at all, no.

We get letters from our subscribers every day, and many phone calls, I think, every week, criticizing our paper, saying "You should do this; you should do that." Parliament has views. I think they should be able to speak out and say what they think of us.

Mr. Fortier: Fine. I am glad you have given these explanations.

Mr. Malone, you are General Manager and President of FP Publications Ltd. You are also editor-in-chief of the Winnipeg Free Press. Could you tell the Committee how you apportion your time between these two concerns?

Mr. Malone: That is a pretty difficult one. I think really where the greatest demands are each day. I would think about fifty-fifty.

That is a silly sort of answer. No, there are periods when perhaps several days running matters of direct concern to FP Publications as such would take up nearly all my time.

In that case I may have to keep in touch with my office, or Mr. McLintock on the editorial side of it, or the general manager in Winnipeg. I am never out of touch.

There would be other periods where ... Very fortunately in the last two weeks I have been in Winnipeg continuously almost entirely devoted to Winnipeg Free Press matters.

So it is really what the demands are.

I travel a lot. I am on the road visiting our papers as often as I can.

Mr. Fortier: I was going to ask you that.

Mr. Malone: And I try to make a point of getting around every month, six weeks, as frequently as I can, wherever the problems are.

Mr. Fortier: You attempt to visit each one of your papers once a month?

Mr. Malone: As closely as I can. If one has problems, I may have more time there. And our papers do have problems.

We are having projections of building programmes going ahead. And we are hoping to expand our facilities both in Ottawa and Victoria. They are in the planning stage now. This takes quite a bit of my time.

Mr. Fortier: Are these the only problems you refer to—problems of economics or physical resources?

Mr. Malone: Largely. But they do cover other matters: the question of staff, personnel, bureaux, labour negotiations; I mean, the whole range of things.

In short, we keep in touch with each of our papers to know what their worries and problems are.

Mr. Fortier: What about the editorial contents of your eight newspapers? Has it ever happened that one of the editors in Ottawa, Lethbridge, Calgary, Vancouver, Victoria or Toronto now, have cleared an editorial with you, or any member of head office, prior to publishing it?

Mr. Malone: No, they do not. Just the reverse. I sometimes pick up a paper with some amazement. Quite often they will take a position which does not necessarily follow my thinking.

You cannot wear two hats editorially. You either believe in one philosophy or do not. I am actively concerned in the editorial policy of the Winnipeg Free Press. Now, then, the Ottawa Journal or the Victoria Colonist may take completely opposite views. They do not show me the editorial before it appears.

I see it that they are entitled to their view. Indeed we may take shots at each other, which we often do.

Mr. Fortier: In view of your position as President of FP Publications, would it be fair to say that the editorial policy of the Winnipeg Free Press is also the editorial policy of FP Publications?

Mr. Malone: No, no. No, they each have a distinctive editorial policy. There is no central editorial policy for FP as a group.

If you take a look at the papers it would be very obvious almost any day of the week.

Mr. Fortier: How often does the Board of Directors of FP Publications meet?

Mr. Malone: Not very often. The FP group as such—oh, a couple of times a year.

Mr. Fortier: Could you tell us who the members of the Board are?

Mr. Malone: Yes. There is Mr. Max Bell, Mr. Howard Webster, myself, Mr. Don McGavin in Toronto, Mr. Stuart Keate. I think that is all.

Mr. Fortier: You have given us the share structure of FP Publications. With respect to the Sifton trust shares, could you tell us who votes those shares?

Mr. Malone: Yes. There are three trustees. On the death of Mr. Sifton—his children are minors. Until they grow up he has placed the voting shares in the hands of his trustees, with very wide powers. There are three trustees—Mr. McGavin, Mr. Shields and myself. And they will be exercised until such time as his youngest son, I think, reaches the age of 25. And then the distribution of shares is really in what is the best interest of the paper.

Mr. Fortier: In your brief after you have explained what the share division was you have a paragraph, which is numbered 28, where you conclude—and as a lawyer I have trouble understanding what you mean here, when you say that as a result of these restrictions in your letters patent:

“...we have in effect voluntarily placed ourselves in the hands of the government should our papers ever be threatened by foreign ownership or control.”

Do you really mean that, Mr. Malone?

Mr. Malone: Well, to this extent, that, say, shares were sold to outside interests, foreign interests, they could not register those shares on the books of the company unless we got a change in our letters patent, in our by-laws.

My understanding is—I have talked to a lawyer; as you say, I am not a lawyer—my understanding is that they would have to apply to the Secretary of State for a change in those letters patent. It is in his power, as I understand it, to grant them.

Mr. Fortier: I won't get into a legal argument, but what you are suggesting is that, if this provision of your letters patent was infringed, then the government could step in? Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Malone: They could refuse to change our letters patent, yes. That was the intent of it.

When we set this up—you can recall there was discussion here in Ottawa about restrictions and controls and so on. We were very concerned about it. I would be very concerned if the government ever attempted to say who owns a paper and who does not. This is the time we set that up. And that was the purpose for it.

Mr. Fortier: So this is what you mean when you say you have put yourselves in the hands of the government?

Mr. Malone: Yes. We discussed it at that time with the then prime minister, and argued the point.

We said “This is our responsibility, but don't start dictating who can own a paper and who cannot.” We said, “We will do everything we can to protect the future ownership of our papers.” And that was the only reason for that provision.

Mr. Fortier: You explained fully and very clearly why in 1959 FP Publications came into being. My question is related to the present and with emphasis on the past insofar as the Vancouver Sun and the Globe and Mail are concerned.

Since 1959 where you attempted to realize this concentration in order to obtain economies of scale, what has motivated your acquisition of two other newspapers?

Mr. Malone: Well, simply this, that we were originally a western group. We have always been interested in the possibility of linking up with eastern newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: You had the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. Malone: That is right. That was in 1959. And to strengthen our position across Canada. We are in a highly competitive field. There are other group operations in Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Are there?

Mr. Malone: Oh, yes, very much so.

Mr. Fortier: Competitive with whom? I am sorry

Mr. Malone: Well, with our papers we are competitive in nearly every city. We are in a highly competitive position here in Ottawa. We are in a highly competitive position in Toronto. We are in a competitive position in Winnipeg.

Mr. Fortier: I notice you do not use the word “highly” insofar as Winnipeg is concerned. Is there any reason for that?

Mr. Malone: You might reverse the thing in Calgary! We have a morning paper in Calgary. But it is still very competitive.

We have not attempted to acquire a monopoly position in Canada at all. We have papers, and we want them in the place where they will have matters of influence and carry some weight in this country. But we believe in it.

And papers that are in the distant provinces and in the capital city, yes, we are interested in those; but not the idea of trying to acquire a monopoly at all.

Mr. Fortier: Do you still actively seek newspapers in Canada?

Mr. Malone: Only to the extent if I thought it would strengthen our chain in some way or another, in Canada, in major cities in Canada, we are not represented in.

Mr. Fortier: In what way could your chain be strengthened?

Mr. Malone: Well, we have never looked at any papers in the Maritimes. But we are a national group, and we should. I don't know. We have never enquired about the papers down there.

But if we felt the circumstances justified and warranted a national group with a Maritime newspaper, we would be very happy to go about that. We have not.

But it is a hypothetical question. It is hard to answer a thing like that, you know. That could be my view. I could be wrong.

Mr. Fortier: In your words, what makes the strength of a group such as yours?

Mr. Malone: There are two aspects: the editorial aspect...

Mr. Fortier: If you have no common policy, how can you speak of carrying some weight in the country—if you have no common editorial policy?

Mr. Malone: No, but a paper, if it has a strong voice under it, it speaks with a little stronger voice. We are all aware of this.

I could go back to the thirties in Saskatchewan, where life was very thin and our profits were very low. It was difficult to speak with a very loud or commanding voice in the thirties, when we did not know if our paper was going to survive or not.

If you have a strong economic basis, strong associations, good news services, and are allied with strong papers, it strengthens that view. There is no doubt about it. People speak up in a better way.

You have better access to and an exchange of staff. You have better news sources to bureaus. And it has that benefit to it. It is very real.

The economic benefits are not as large as they might appear. It is generally assumed that, if you have papers, you can have great economic favours, and so on. It does not work out that way.

I would suspect our bureau, our overseas costs now are more than they were before we had a group operation. There are not great savings in that.

There are benefits in mechanical areas. For example, you have experiments going on in all the newspapers across Canada to some degree. Some are staying with full type; some are with offset; some are developing a slug conveyor.

If you are in a group operation, there is a benefit of passing on mechanical knowledge. You can send your mechanical foreman to another paper. If he gets a benefit, he will pass it on to you. This is a strength for a paper.

Mr. Fortier: This is what you mean when you refer to the strength of a paper or a group in the country?

Mr. Malone: Yes. I am talking both economic and operational strength; and also the question of the editorial strength that you do speak with a stronger voice than if you are in an isolated position.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think the Globe speaks with a stronger voice editorially than, say, the Telegram or the Star in Toronto because it belongs to a group?

Mr. Malone: I have always believed that.

Mr. Cooper is here. You can ask him the same afternoon.

Yes, I believe that. I do.

The Chairman: What do you mean by "stronger"?

Mr. Malone: I would not suggest that the group operation has changed their editorial point of view, I don't think. But their joint operations in bureaus, news coverage and on...

The Chairman: No. I am sorry. I was relying specifically to the Globe and Mail, as Mr. Fortier said, speaking with a stronger editorial voice than the Star and the Telegram in Toronto.

When you say "stronger" do you mean that they take positions more...

Mr. Malone: No, no. The strength in the future of the paper I think is insured here. The Globe and Mail was a single independent paper there, single ownership.

Say the proprietor suddenly died and there were heavy succession duty problems. I think joining with the FP group has strengthened the Globe's position in the overall position.

The Chairman: I think the question relates to editorial position, however. It would be my opinion that each one of the newspapers in Toronto takes an equally strong editorial position.

Do you agree with that?

Mr. Malone: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: I am sorry. I misunderstood you, then.

Mr. Malone: I think the Globe and Mail speaks with a stronger one.

Mr. Fortier: These were Mr. Malone's own words.

Mr. Malone: I think they speak a little stronger in the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Fortier: In what way?

Mr. Malone: They take good, strong stands.

Mr. Fortier: Do you not think the Star and the Telegram do?

Mr. Malone: You are talking to a man who has a little bias here. You might try that one with Mr. Cooper this afternoon. He will have a bias too.

Mr. Fortier: We will.

Mr. Malone: It is a matter of professional pride you are touching on here.

Mr. Fortier: Your bias is understood and excused.

Could you give us an example of a situation which arose in Toronto where, because the Globe belonged to the FP group, it took a stronger stand editorially than the Star or the Telegram?

Mr. Malone: No, offhand I don't think I could. But I think, as I say, this might be more properly directed to the Globe and Mail people.

I think they have a feeling of greater security and strength in the community on their paper as a result of joining the group.

Mr. Fortier: Without going into particulars or details, as you have expanded with the Star in 1963 and the Globe in 1965 have you realized more extensive economies of scale?

Mr. Malone: Not a great deal, no.

Mr. Fortier: But you have had some?

Mr. Malone: There have been largely benefits from mechanical developments and exchange of ideas. These have been helpful. But there have not been opportunities to cut down costs here and there by doing it as an operation.

I think I say in my brief we did not achieve the economies that we might imagine were there. And when you get into it you find there is no very substantial economy.

Take for example the Washington Bureau. You might think all right, you could reduce your Washington Bureau when you put it into a group. Well, there were three men in Washington; there are still three men in Washington. There was no variation there. There are very few areas of actually cutting down, or reduction.

In mechanical know-how there are some definite benefits.

Mr. Fortier: So with that thought in mind, and the others which you have expressed, you are in the market for other newspapers?

Mr. Malone: In certain circumstances, yes.

When I say that I mean if it was a good property and we thought it was in a position where it would not be creating a monopoly position, or it would strengthen our group. No, we are not going out trying to buy up every paper.

Mr. Fortier: But you are trying to buy some, as we heard yesterday?

Mr. Malone: No. I was here at that meeting, and I was rather shocked. We have never made an offer for the Brantford paper. I don't want to correct my fellow publisher, but we have never made an offer for the Brantford paper.

Mr. Fortier: What about the London Free Press?

Mr. Malone: We have had discussions with the London Free Press and said, "If at any time you are interested in joining a group, we would be interested in talking to you." We have never gone beyond that.

It is quite true, London is an excellent city. It is a good paper. If they were ever in a position where they want to change from being a privately-owned corporation, we would be very glad to have them join us.

Mr. Fortier: Do you look for any particular type of city when you are looking at a newspaper?

Mr. Malone: No.

I wonder if I could correct this. We are not actively going around looking for papers. If a situation develops and we think it might be a benefit to our group, we talk with them. But I am not going around knocking on doors trying to buy papers.

Mr. Fortier: I will phrase my question differently, then. If a situation developed in Brantford, Ontario, would you be interested?

Mr. Malone: No, I don't think so. If we had, I think we would have perhaps indicated. But we never have.

Mr. Fortier: Why would you be interested in London and not in Brantford? This is what I want to get at?

Mr. Malone: I think largely on this count: if you can group papers of roughly the same size together, it makes a very good operating package.

For example, the Thomson papers are all roughly the same size across the country. They are very proficient in knowing how to operate these papers.

Now, if you suddenly threw one large paper into that grouping, it is not as easy to work.

We have smaller papers in our group. Now, they are working on a different scale of things. They have not got the space and pages. They cannot cover the great wide range of bureau stories, and so on. It does not fit the package too well.

That is one thing. And that is purely economic.

The other thing is, you say, well, here in British Columbia for example there are smaller papers in British Columbia. But we have not reached out for them. We have a dominant position—I say “dominant” as far as Vancouver is concerned. We have got the large paper there.

Now, we are not hungry to go out and grab up the other papers out there at all. I mean, we have a position in the Province of British Columbia. I think we can speak effectively in the medium we have got.

Mr. Fortier: In looking at these situations as they arise (which is in effect what you are saying) how far do you think you should go, Mr. Malone, in expanding?

Mr. Malone: That is a good question. It is question of numbers on this.

If you carry it to the ultimate, no, I would not want to see the newspapers in Canada handed down in perhaps two or three groups. That would be a bad thing. I think I have touched it pretty clearly in my brief here. There are advantages to group operations, but also disadvantages.

The question of public credibility is one thing. You know, “Here is a group that controls everything; they are speaking for the province.” This is a bad thing—bad for the industry, bad for us.

I have indicated to you that, if a special situation has occurred in good papers, yes, you would look at them. But we are not trying to grab them up. I think there is a limit very definitely perhaps in terms of provincial areas.

We are broadly scattered across the country in the provinces. We have nothing in Saskatchewan. I think the Saskatchewan papers would strengthen our present group.

They used to be with our organization. I am sure if they ever wanted to dispose of it, I would welcome them in our group, because we have no voice in Saskatchewan.

But I have no desire to try to buy up all the papers in the province.

Mr. Fortier: Would that be a good or bad thing, for one company or one person to own all the newspapers in one province?

Mr. Malone: I am giving you a personal view here. No, I would not be in favour of that.

It depends. I mean, it is a hypothetical thing: what the conditions are; what province; if it is a question of saving the paper from folding up, or something like that. It is difficult to give you an answer without knowing the exact circumstances.

Mr. Fortier: You are speaking in general terms and you say that there is a limit.

Mr. Malone: Absolutely.

Mr. Fortier: ...to the expansion of group ownership. Is that correct?

Mr. Malone: Yes, I think there should be a limit. Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And would it be fair to say that that limit depends on the type of newspapers which belong to a particular chain?

Mr. Malone: No.

Mr. Fortier: I am trying to make a comparison—which you make yourself—between the Thomson, for example, and the FP group.

Mr. Malone: I think you have to look at it in terms of the public good.

You had Mr. Henry here the other day, and I was following his remarks pretty carefully. If a group or an individual newspaper, in the opinion of the Combines Branch is working against the public good, I would think the Government, or the Combines people, has every right to take a look at it and say, "Is this in the public interest?"

And, if they could demonstrate it was not, I would think they would be quite at liberty to act on it.

Mr. Fortier: This Committee is very interested in your views and the views of the people of your experience. I will phrase the question differently. I quote the learned Justice—I think it was Hamm—in the States in the Aluminum case: "How much is too much?"

Mr. Malone: I am afraid I cannot answer that. I mean, I like to be specific. I cannot tie you down to exact numbers.

Mr. Fortier: Can you tie it down to the number of provinces?

Mr. Malone: One hundred per cent would certainly be wrong.

Mr. Fortier: Can you tie it down to the number of provinces?

Mr. Malone: No. Each province has a different number of cities in it, different economic weight and concern in the country.

I could see nothing wrong with a good substantial group having representation in each province. I see nothing wrong with that.

Mr. Fortier: You have said a number of times in the last little while, and I quote "We can speak effectively in B.C., and we can speak effectively in Alberta." What do you mean by "speaking effectively"? What is the message of FP Publications?

Mr. Malone: Well, simply this, that here we have a substantial paper. It is regarded by the community in good terms. It has a wide circulation. And we try to appoint editors and newsmen of competence, and give them a free hand. And this is a public service, in our view. I mean, this is a very real thing with us.

Our view is that the paper can be effective if it has got a good medium, good respect, good circulation. And we think it can make a contribution both to the province and the national effort.

Mr. Fortier: And this is what you mean by the message of FP Publications?

Mr. Malone: Yes. And I think we can add something in this.

Mr. Fortier: You are not implying that there is a central message which FP Publications has to communicate?

Mr. Malone: No, not at all. Just the reverse. You will be talking to Mr. Norman Smith of the Journal. This will be a very interesting discussion. You could touch on that.

When the Ottawa Journal joined our grouping, this was very clear: they were traditionally a Conservative paper. And this aspect was discussed when they joined. And I was very clear at that time. And I discussed this with one of your fellow Senators, Senator O'Leary, and Mr. Smith.

And I said that we had no intention of changing the philosophy of this newspaper at all. It would continue as a Conservative paper. All we asked was that it would be a good Conservative paper, and a strong one, and speak out. This is the purpose of papers.

Mr. Fortier: And you are trying to balance things out in Winnipeg!

Mr. Malone: We are balancing it out in Winnipeg. We take shots at each other.

Mr. Fortier: I was interested in the comment in your brief that when you had a Conservative or Liberal newspaper and you had to appoint an editor you looked for a Conservative or Liberal editor.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: My question with respect to this statement is this: supposing your "Conservative editor" switches allegiance in mid-stream. That has been known to happen.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: What would you do at FP Publications?

Mr. Malone: Well, I think you would have to do the same in terms of, say, an editor suddenly becoming irresponsible.

Mr. Fortier: Do you mean he would be irresponsible if he switched?

Mr. Malone: No. You can have a responsible Conservative too, you know!

No. If he was doing a competent job there—his views might be widely different from ours, but I think, if he was being accurate and speaking honestly and with conviction and able to document his opinions, no.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. But, you see—maybe I was not clear enough. But take the case of the Journal.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Supposing the Journal in its editorial policy (if that is imaginable) became Liberal-minded rather than Conservative.

Mr. Malone: This would cause problems for me. I don't mind saying that.

Mr. Fortier: But you do say that when you are looking for the editor of a Liberal paper, you look for a Liberal man.

Mr. Malone: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Fortier: If that man changes allegiance...

Mr. Malone: This would not distress me at all, if he had a good and valid reason, and had his convictions behind him, and believed in it. That is fine.

We have done this. Our papers, whether they are Liberal or Conservative, have not necessarily supported that party in every campaign or every election.

I mean, there are periods in the history of the Free Press where we have supported other than Liberal policies. We have not necessarily supported the Liberal party.

Mr. Fortier: In the case of Mr. Kierans perhaps?

Mr. Malone: Yes. It would only be if an editor became highly irresponsible—he was not on his job, or something like that. Then the head office would have to do something. As I have said, we cannot abdicate our entire responsibility. We give them a very free hand. But in the final analysis the proprietor who owns it cannot argue in a court and say "I am not responsible." The court will hold him responsible—and throw him into jail if he ignores these things.

Mr. Fortier: But if one of the main considerations for FP Publications hiring a man as an editor is not there any more; it disappears—that is, his political allegiance...

Mr. Malone: No, not entirely political allegiance here.

Mr. Fortier: His political learning.

Mr. Malone: I know, but what kind of paper is it? What sort of country is it in? What kind of national background has the community?

Say we have a farm paper. Now, Bruce Macdonald is our editor of the farm paper. Bruce has a background in the rural areas. He knows farmers. There is no sense, with all due respect, say, taking somebody who has grown up in Toronto on the Globe and Mail and suddenly projecting him and expecting him to be a farm editor. You have to pick your man who has the craft and knowledge and background, and the interest in it.

Mr. Fortier: So a change in philosophy of the part of any one of your editors in the chain, in the group, would not bring about dismissal?

Mr. Malone: No.

The Chairman: I have one question on the very point.

What if the editor of the Ottawa Journal decided at election time not to support the Liberals but rather the N.D.P. Would you answer in the same way?

Mr. Malone: If it was an honestly-held conviction and he had reasons for it and argued his case, yes. If it was not an irresponsible act—and when I say "irresponsible" I mean not from political games being played—no, there was a valid reason for it; if he felt the N.D.P. candidate was the right man, and honestly argued the case.

The Chairman: This is hypothetical, of course. What if he decided that he, the publisher, had become a socialist, and was going to permanently expound socialist views and support the N.D.P.

In other words, he was not making a decision on the candidate but he was making a philosophical decision?

Mr. Malone: That is a pretty hypothetical question. I don't think I can answer. You would have to deal with these things as they came. I could not give you the answer to the might say something and I could be completely wrong.

I don't think this is likely to happen, you know.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Malone: Well, I have followed the philosophy, the arguments and the debates of the Ottawa Journal for some time. I don't think they would...

The Chairman: What if this happened with one of your other papers?

Mr. Malone: This is quite conceivable in any area, the area of provincial politics where often the provincial philosophy of the parties is not the same as the federal policy. And there have been occasions where we have supported Social Credit candidates.

The Chairman: Then is it inconceivable derally?

Mr. Malone: No, it is not inconceivable derally. If you can tell me what the federal issues are going to be in an election, I might better give you an answer to that. But we don't know what the issues are.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I think Senator McElman had a supplementary question.

The Chairman: I am sorry, Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: If at the Ottawa Journal the editor had a very strong conviction of change in political philosophy and the other principal people associated with editorials and news at the newspaper did not have a similar change of conviction, and there developed within the organization a controversy; would at that stage head office step in?

Mr. Malone: No. I don't feel this would occur, for this reason: there are definite areas of responsibility. The Ottawa Journal, the particular paper in question there, when the Ottawa Journal joined the FP group, so that there would be no doubt or questions in the former proprietor's mind on this point, we gave a definite undertaking that the federal policy remained in the hands of the then president, Senator O'Leary and Mr. Norman Smith, and then on the retirement of Senator O'Leary to Norman Smith.

...would never interfere with the editorial policy.

Senator McElman: Excuse me. I had forgotten that arrangement. Let us take another paper that has no such arrangement. Would head office then intervene?

Mr. Malone: Give me your question again then in the context of another paper.

Senator McElman: If the one in charge of editorial policy changed his political connection...

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: And those around him, who were doing a major part of the work in association with him, did not change theirs, and controversy developed within that specific element of your organization, then would head office step in to resolve it?

Mr. Malone: No, only if it resulted in very serious conflict or controversy head office might have to intervene.

We have never had to. You put your editor in charge, and it is up to him. You trust him. You get an experienced man. He may have people underneath him who may not agree entirely. They have conferences and argue it out.

I think it is a strength of an organization that they do not all march in and have identical views. And you have editorial conferences. They argue points of view. A new issue is thrown at them, and they say "What position do we take in this?"

In the final analysis the editor is held responsible. And I do not interfere with that.

But, as I say, if a really serious controversy developed, we could not sit back. We would have to resolve it some way or another. But without knowing what the norm was...

The editor is there. He is given his responsibility. And there is an absolute minimum of interference.

If the managing editor wanted to shoot the editor-in-chief, certainly we would have to step in. It is a matter of degree of what the problem is.

Senator McElman: What I have in mind, Mr. Chairman, is that we have received testimony from several quarters. But, if after an editorial conference some person holds a very strong viewpoint opposed to what the paper is going to follow editorially in a given instance; then they never compel anyone to write in opposition to the views he holds?

Mr. Malone: No.

Senator McElman: Well, what I am thinking of is that a continuing change of philosophy is involved.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: It is not a single incident. I can see a serious conflict developing.

Mr. Malone: Certainly.

Let us say you have a senior editorial writer, or whatever it is, and he feels he is unhappy with the direction his paper is taking, and he cannot resolve this with his conscience, and that sort of thing. He must make up his mind. The editors are in charge. He is put there. He has a responsibility.

I think in fairness he should go to his editor and say "I can't go along and identify myself with this. I am afraid I will have to leave", or "Can you transfer me to another paper?" or something. He must be honest with himself.

Now, the editor has the same responsibility. I don't think he should go to a man and say "If you want to continue with this paper you write this" and so on. We never do that if we have an honest difference of opinion in our group editorially.

I am talking now about the Free Press, because I am a little more closely associated there. We have perhaps half a dozen editorial writers. A man may have one particular outlook, and he does not feel he can argue a point of view his editor may have in mind. His editor does not say "Whether you believe it or not, you write it."

Senator McElman: I realize there is scant chance of this hypothesis developing.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: But the end result of the testimony we have had before would be, of course, that the editor-in-chief would stay and everybody else would be transferred.

Like you, I could not conceive of this ever happening.

Mr. Malone: I might give you a simile that I think is relevant here, in army terms. The senior staff officer may not always agree with his commander. He has certain obligations to his commander. He must give him his best advice. He must argue his point of view. But in the final analysis the commander must take the responsibility of a decision. He may be wrong, but he carries that responsibility, not the senior staff officer.

Now, then, the staff officer must support him loyally. He has an obligation to put his point of view, argue it, support his chief with all the information he can. If the chief in his wisdom decides this is the course of action that has to be, the staff officer has an obligation to support him.

If he feels in his conscience he cannot, must go to him and say "I can't honestly support you."

And this is much the same, I think. If there is, say, a continuing philosophy in a paper, and you reach a point where a writer felt he could not go on, I think he has an obligation to be honest and say so, in much the same context there. And he would ask to be transferred to another paper or say "Well, I am afraid I am going to have to leave you." But don't think he should remain in a false position. I think it would be very wrong. I would not agree with that. I would think that would be an impossible situation. I am sure it does not happen with us.

The man would say "You are entitled to your point of view. This is the way the paper is going. I don't think I can write it." That is fine. We accept that. We have had conditions like that. But it very seldom happens.

But here we may argue with, say, a western point of view. And I may have a different point of view from an eastern paper. We may argue it from the standpoint of the west.

This is perhaps the background of a paper to argue vigorously for the west—against tariff, or for tariff, whatever it is. And if you have a man who honestly does not believe this, you cannot say "You must write this whether you believe it or not."

You say "Well, the editor's position is this. This is the line the paper is going to take. And somebody else will write it."

Does that answer your question?

Senator McElman: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I think I will call you Brigadier Malone now!

Mr. Malone: No, no, no.

Mr. Fortier: You make a point in your brief of stressing (maybe the word is too strong and, if it is, please correct me) that you do not own or control a single operating broadcasting facility in Canada, although you do refer to some non-voting shares in Selkirk Holdings—I think it is some 7 per cent approximately—and an investment of 12½ per cent of the shares in Victoria Cablevision Ltd.

My question is, is it the policy of FP Publications not to get into broadcasting?

Mr. Malone: Yes. We are not anxious to get into a position where we control a broadcasting facility, certainly in areas where we have a strong position with the newspaper publication.

Mr. Fortier: Why?

Mr. Malone: I think simply this, that if you place yourself in that position, people are going to say, "Oh, you are trying to dominate the thinking of this area, this town" and so on.

I am now going back some years to the period when we divested ourselves deliberately of a broadcasting facility. I am going back some years. At one time in the Sifton group we owned two radio stations in Regina. We thought it was wrong. We said it was not a good thing for the community.

I do not feel we should necessarily keep out of the broadcasting industry...

Mr. Fortier: The radio stations in Regina are still owned by the same...

Mr. Malone: We used to have two. There is one now. We sold off one of them at one time. We disposed of one of them. We used to have two at one time.

When I say I am going back now for some time...

Mr. Fortier: You are going back to prior to FP Publications.

Mr. Malone: In the matter of philosophy in the broadcasting field I have only one concern at the moment. I do not know where the future lies in the electronic media at all.

Cable television is a new thing. It is expanding. What its future will be 20 years from now, I don't know. I don't think anybody knows. It could get into an area of being a means of transmitting news.

Well, our business is collecting and selling news. That is the fundamental business of the newspaper. Advertising makes this possible, but fundamentally we sell news; we gather news.

I would say if cablevision because the chief means of distributing news across Canada, obviously we must have an interest in it. This is our business.

Mr. Fortier: How are you hedging your position, then?

Mr. Malone: We have not done very well with it. I think we should, and it bothers me that we are not.

I don't think we should get control of the situation in cablevision; but I wish we had an interest in the major centres in which we have papers. I would welcome that.

Mr. Fortier: You have touched on this in your brief, but what is the present attitude on multiple media ownership?

Mr. Malone: I think we are on record. Our principal game is the newspaper business.

I think to some degree the broadcasting industry can complement it. And, as an investment, we are interested in it. But in terms of trying to get control and dominating it, no, we are not interested in the broadcast industry to that degree at all. I see an investment interest in it.

I have some concern about the future of cablevision, simply on the question of are they going to distribute news in the future? This is our business. If they are, we should hedge our position.

You may have seen that ANPA in the States have issued some comments on this saying to newspapers in effect, "You are in the news business; if this is the developing medium, you should take an interest in it. You have a responsibility in it, if you are interested in the game of mass communication."

And, as I say, I don't think anybody knows what the future of cablevision is. But I would see nothing wrong with getting into cablevision in a fairly strong position. I do not mean absolute control.

As I say in my brief there, we have no position of voting, no directors in any company. I wish we had in cablevision. I wish we had a man on the Board to keep in touch with it. We would have a greater interest in it.

Mr. Fortier: Let us take the London situation. You confirmed that you had indicated to Mr. Blackburn that, if it was for sale, you were interested.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would you buy the newspaper, the radio and the T.V. interest of Mr. Blackburn? Or would you buy only the newspaper?

Mr. Malone: Again this is a hypothetical question. We would look at the thing. I could not give you an answer. What I say now could be wrong.

If Mr. Blackburn were interested in selling, certainly we would look at it. I don't know the conditions on which he might want to sell it. He may never. He may say, "I want to sell off the broadcasting and not the newspaper."

Mr. Fortier: It is not fair to you or to Mr. Blackburn, but I ask the question only because that is the sort of situation I would like your comments upon.

Mr. Malone: I do not think I am qualified to give an answer to that. I don't know London well enough. I do know London, but I don't know ..

I think he is doing a very good service up there.

Mr. Fortier: Forget about London. I would rather you looked at it subjectively. What about FP Publications; does it have a policy on multiple media ownership?

Mr. Malone: We would be very conscious of our responsibility of not going into a situation that would harm our group.

In other words, if you say that we buy up all the broadcasting facilities and all the newspapers in the town, I would say no, that would not be right. I think we would run a great risk.

We might run it very well. I think we could. I think we could put out better radio and television.

But in principle I would have deep concern and worries about the picture—whether that is a good arrangement or not. Frankly, I do not think it is.

We all think that the administration of something is fine in our hands, but who comes after in the future? No; this would worry me.

Mr. Fortier: Outside of your group, which is the best newspaper in Canada?

Mr. Malone: Oh, I won't walk in to that one. I have to live with these publishers! Whichever city I am in is the best paper.

Mr. Fortier: I won't press you.

We got an answer from Mr. Bassett to that question.

The Chairman: Could I just ask which one of your own newspapers is best?

Mr. Malone: You have Mr. Keate in the room here, and you have Mr. Cooper.

The Chairman: But in your opinion—The Free Press?

Mr. Malone: Don't push me too hard! We have some very good newspapers. As was saying, the city I am in is the best paper.

The Chairman: So today the Ottawa Journal is the best paper.

Mr. Malone: I won't go into that.

The Chairman: Okay.

Mr. Fortier:

Mr. Fortier: I thought the Chairman would strike me down if I asked that question!

In your verbal presentation earlier this morning you suggested (at least, I thought you did) that the Government should consider union feather-bedding. Is that not purely matter for collective bargaining in the industry concerned, Mr. Malone? Should the Government interfere?

Mr. Malone: I suppose you would be right with that. I have put in here that it is problem that is facing our people. It is a very serious one.

I am not suggesting the Government should intervene, or something like that. Maybe to Labour Department; they have arbitration and things like that. But, I mean, in the normal processes, no, I don't think the Government should arbitrarily step in and interfere in something like that.

I think they might be well advised—I think your Committee might be well advised to look at it as they did in England. It is a very important aspect of our business.

Mr. Fortier: I would be very interested to hear whether you feel that feather-bedding in, say, newspaper publishing companies is a particular and special concern to the public, or maybe to the Government, more so than in another industry because, in your definition, newspapers are a public trust.

Mr. Malone: Well, if situations exist, I suppose, in any industry, that result from lack of efficiency or lack of economy, the public is going to pay for it in some way or other.

In the automobile business, whatever, if you turn out a more efficient job, a more economical production, the public will get the benefit of this. I mean, this is the general interest.

So I don't suppose it would have any particular reference to the publishing industry. Except this: that in your previous hearings I know you have expressed concern at the fewer number of papers in the country.

Well, now, I don't think that is a good thing. In Toronto you used to have four and five newspapers. Now we are down to three.

Well, the economics of the situation have dictated that to a large extent. And if we have further mortalities in the newspapers, as many American publishers have stated, in many cases they feel it is due to union conditions.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, and you make the point again that this has been so in the U.S. and in England?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In your experience has this happened in Canada?

Mr. Malone: It varies so greatly. The situation is different in every city and every paper. They all have different contracts. It could be very hard for me to generalize.

Mr. Fortier: Has this happened in any of our newspapers?

Mr. Malone: Put it this way: there are many things we could do which would result in greater efficiency and greater economies if we did not have the existing labour contracts.

We want to introduce new equipment. Well, a lot of equipment we have not been able to get in.

Mr. Fortier: This has happened?

Mr. Malone: Oh, yes, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Where?

Mr. Malone: Well, here the difficulty with, say, switching over to TTS and computers. We could go out and get equipment. Now, whether the union will adapt to that or whether they would say, "We have to have jurisdiction over it"—you get into this problem. It is more trouble than it is worth. So you don't push it as well as you should.

But that is really an area, as I have suggested here to you, I think that is well worth your study. And I would think you should get a pretty highly-qualified man to give you some help on that. It is a legal thing.

There are labour lawyers who are expert on labour contracts. There are a great many of them in the country. But I think it would be well worth your study.

Mr. Fortier: I will just try one other question. Over and above the legal aspects of this relationship, is any one of your newspapers in the group not operating as efficiently as it could if it was not for the policies of one of the craft unions?

Mr. Malone: The answer is yes.

Mr. Fortier: The answer is yes?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is there more than one?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How many?

Mr. Malone: Well, here I would have to give some thought to it.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to answer that...

Mr. Malone: I would say in at least half of our papers we could make greater efficiencies and greater economies if we were able to proceed with new techniques and procedures, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to pursue that, but I don't know if the witness would like me to do so.

Mr. Malone: There are two things. I want to be very frank with you here. I have deliberately suggested that this is a very involved subject. I don't want to stagger you, but this is a tremendously involved subject. And you need a highly-qualified man.

I could touch on it, but I don't want to give some wide, sweeping statements. You need an expert here to come and talk about contracts exactly.

And the circumstances are different in each city and each contract and each union.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to send the Committee a brief on that very point maybe?

Mr. Malone: I do not think that I could be helpful in that, to speak for the industry. I mean, it is a...

The Chairman: Well, there are...

Mr. Malone: I could send you some contracts, all our labour contracts. But I would suggest that you get a competent lawyer to sit down with you to interpret them. All our labour contracts are available to you.

The Chairman: There are few people in the publishing industry in Canada who are more senior than you. And therefore, while we would be interested in a lawyer's views, we would be particularly interested in your views.

Mr. Malone: I don't profess to be an expert in this area. There are people who are better qualified.

I must be very frank. We are in negotiation in three or four cases at the moment in Canada. I mean, here we are negotiating with different unions. And it is a question of interpreting what I say here that has a bearing on these situations.

Mr. Fortier: But your experience in dealing with unions on behalf of any one of your newspapers, and in view of your statement that you could operate more than half of your newspapers more economically if it was not for union practices, I think is very important indeed to this Committee. I think it would help the Committee immensely if you were to comment in this report on this particular aspect which you feel it should apply its mind to rather than working in generalities.

Mr. Malone: Yes. Put it this way: there are areas of efficiency and economies in different newspapers, and I would be glad to be helpful. But it would be a long study. I am not prepared or qualified here this morning to get into it in detail. I have not got the reports, and so on.

Every time you negotiate a contract the clauses are changed, paragraphs are changed. And it is an involved study.

If I could be helpful to the Committee at a later date... I mean, if you were studying union contracts, I do think you need some proper legal advice on it. But if I could be of help at that stage, by all means.

Mr. Fortier: May I suggest again, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Malone be asked to submit his views on problems encountered in any one of his own newspapers with the economies which he feels has—

The Chairman: I think that is a good suggestion. And of course this would be of a confidential nature.

Mr. Malone: I would be prepared to give a list of areas which I think specifically... Say in this union or that union where it is the make-ready clause, or that...

I would be quite happy to list the types of areas where I think economies could be made.

I gather you don't want this tomorrow?

The Chairman: No, no.

May I suggest, Senators and gentlemen that we now adjourn for about three or four minutes to give the reporter a break?

—Short recess

The Chairman: If I might call the meeting back to order.

I think perhaps the questioning now will begin, Mr. Malone, with Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Malone, on page 3 of your brief in paragraph 6, talking about freedom of the press:

"The freedom of the press is also the right of the public to buy a newspaper each day if they wish, to write letters to the editor, or, to start a paper of their own if they don't like it. There is no compulsion involved and it is for this reason that newspapers must to a large degree meet the needs and demands of their readers" et cetera.

Now, yesterday Mr. Blackburn told us that he was controlled in his exercise in a one newspaper town, which is a matter of concern to everybody, including yourselves—the situation.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And he said that the were perhaps disciplined—I don't think that was his word, but the effect of it was—by the fact that there was always the phantom newspaper there; in other words, the knowledge that, if they did not do a satisfactory job running their paper, somebody else would come in and start one.

Now, what was it going to cost to start another newspaper anyway?

Mr. Malone: A very good question.

Senator Prowse: Is this a realistic question? You in the same paragraph say a guy can buy a newspaper if he wants to, and then in the next, after commas, you say "Or he can start his own."

Now, we are not seriously suggesting this as an alternative that is realistically available.

Mr. Malone: It is an alternative, but it is very costly and very risky.

Senator Prowse: All right; let us take my own situation. I come from Edmonton, as you may or may not know.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And I think you have looked at the situation there.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Do you mind telling us what you think it would cost, how many millions a person would have to put into an operation, including what they would lose in he starting before they would end up with any kind of a viable operation.

Mr. Malone: It is not entirely money. It is of a matter of taking it out of the air. I would not think a person would be wise to tackle that market unless they had a pretty competent staff and know-how and had about eight or ten million dollars.

Senator Prowse: As a minimum?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And even though you would walk in without any labour difficulty presumably and establish it with all of the test technical equipment?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: You would still be looking at that kind of investment as a minimum?

Mr. Malone: Yes. You see, you have got to establish a medium that can command a certain volume of advertising to get revenue.

Now, you have to fight for circulation, and the cost of achieving a circulation that could command enough revenue...

For example, if the merchants of Edmonton said, "Here, we will guarantee so much advertising for the next couple of years; we have got some revenue coming in," I would get at it like a shot.

Senator Prowse: And some of them have been almost at that point at times.

Mr. Malone: But look at it from their standpoint. They say, "All right, we are prepared to back you with advertising revenues. How much circulation are you going to give us?" What can I guarantee them?

Senator Prowse: You could give away the paper.

Mr. Malone: Well, I am not in favour of giveaway newspapers. I think if a person buys a paper, he is more apt to pay more attention to it. And he will only buy it and give us good money if he wants it.

Senator Prowse: There also may be there the possibility that it might get contagious.

Mr. Malone: Well, that could be.

No, Edmonton is a growing city. I think some day it will have another paper. I think it should have another paper. But when it is viable and when a paper can go up there, fight its way in, and achieve forty, fifty, sixty thousand circulation, whatever it is going to require to hold their own, is a very tough battle, and a very expensive one.

I think the day will come some time, though.

Senator Prowse: Would you say that a newspaper would have to have an awful lot of real enemies in a community before another paper would have a real chance of getting in, or it would justify the tremendous investment?

Mr. Malone: I would not put it quite that way. I would not say it must have an awful lot of enemies. I would think they must be putting out a pretty poor product to leave the door open. They were not serving the community, it is obvious, and that sort of thing. It would have to fall down pretty badly.

Senator Prowse: Or fall from grace on, say, one election, which is one thing people do get excited about. The size of garbage cans would not do it.

Mr. Malone: No.

Let us take a new paper that wanted to get into a city, and the paper there had 100,000 circulation. He would be starting up, and he would have to achieve at least half that circulation before he could hope to get advertising from the town. This means 50,000 circulation. You are going to have 50,000 people cancel the other paper and switch over?

You have to put out a better product. And this is a tough thing.

Senator Prowse: Let us take a couple that you have some knowledge of. What is the circulation of the Tribune and The Free Press?

Mr. Malone: The Tribune and The Free Press? I can give you exact figures here. The Free Press are running about, what, 140, Bruce?

I don't think we have got the Tribune here, have we?

These are the figures for September through the six summer month period. The total Free Press circulation, 131,9—roughly 132,000; The Tribune, 76,600.

Senator Prowse: They are roughly half there?

Mr. Malone: Yes. Yes, that is their total circulation.

The balance is different in the city. The Free Press has 99,000 in the city, and The Tribune has 47,000. And that is an important factor in retail advertising.

Senator Prowse: That is city advertising. It may be more important.

Mr. Malone: It is important, yes.

Senator Prowse: Can you tell us what the mill line rates are for the two papers?

Mr. Malone: We can give you the Free Press one. I don't think I have the Tribune here.

On your national—and that is general and it is hard to compare with your local—the mill line rate comparison: the Free Press, $3.56; The Tribune, $4.95.

Senator Prowse: And do you have it on your local?

Before I go ahead what I have in mind is, what percentage of your advertising is national? Is it around 11 or 12 per cent, $\frac{1}{2}$, something like that, or higher?

Mr. Malone: I would think the national might be a little more than that.

Senator Prowse: Maybe you could give a figure so we don't guess.

Mr. Malone: While Bruce is working that out, the mill line rate comparison on local or retail advertising is very different between papers because they have different categories: the bulk line contracts, the frequency contracts. And very seldom do two competing papers have exactly the same scale. So it is hard to figure out.

Senator Prowse: So it would be hard to figure out.

Mr. Malone: One paper says that if you advertise so many consecutive days a week you get a discount. The other paper says that they don't have frequency discounts, they have volume discounts.

So it is hard to add it up.

Senator Prowse: But you can get a good enough figure that if I were an advertising agency I could make a decision on it?

Mr. Malone: Yes, that is right.

Senator Prowse: All right, those figures can be put into the record. I don't need them. This is good enough for me.

It is going to cost me roughly $3.50 a mill line rate?

Mr. Malone: Per thousand readers.

Senator Prowse: Per thousand readers for line. Is that what your mill line rate is?

Mr. Malone: Yes, based on a million readers. If you had a million readers, that is the rate.

Senator Prowse: Yes, that is right. And in the Tribune it is going to cost me about $5.00, $4.95, $5.00—who worries about a nickel here?

Why would anybody advertise in the Tribune when they can get so much better value in the other?

Mr. Malone: They are bound to have some exclusive circulation. They are bound to appeal to different areas.

Senator Prowse: Because of a different editorial policy?

Mr. Malone: It might be political outlook. It might be women's pages. It might be that the sports fraternity like this paper, or the paper. And they said, "I got a good return because I think people who are interested in curling read that paper"—and the advertiser wants to reach the people who are interested in curling.

To the paper selling advertising is a highly competitive business. Maybe they sell the products hard, and the Tribune sell their product hard.

They have their advertising manager here. Perhaps he should answer that question. There may be 100 reasons why he should do it.

Senator Prowse: Is the Tribune a Conservative paper?

Mr. Malone: Is the Tribune a Conservative paper? I would say traditionally in its history, yes, it is a Conservative paper. I think that a fair statement.

Mr. Ralph is here. He is a former Tribune man. He could perhaps tell you that.

Senator Prowse: I am a little intrigued by the fact that the Winnipeg Free Press has in effect 100,000 and the Tribune has about 50,000. But the voting pattern would indicate that there are rather more Conservatives than Liberals.

Mr. Malone: Shall I explain that by saying there are bad Liberals at times? Is that the answer?

Senator Prowse: Yes, that is good enough.

Let us take another situation. Let us take Calgary, where you have the Herald and the Albertan. Do you happen to have the figures on those two?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Circulation figures?

Mr. Malone: I do not think we have the Herald. We have the Albertan, though.

The Calgary Albertan circulation, our last figure was—that is, a Monday to Saturday average: 35,265.

Clare, you can tell what the Herald is. Can you tell us what their circulation is?

Mr. Fortier: I have it here: 94,956.

Senator Prowse: Ninety-five thousand in round figures.

Now, what percentage of those are city with the Albertan, do you know—because you know a little bit?

Mr. Malone: Yes. Their city zoned circulation is, the Albertan, 24,000.

Senator Prowse: And the Herald would not appreciate their circulation in numbers even much as you do. You have 11,000 outside?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: The Herald does not really distribute as widely as you in the other areas, do they?

Mr. Malone: Percentage-wise I would think about the same.

Senator Prowse: Yes, but not in numbers?

Mr. Malone: Oh, no, no.

Senator Prowse: No. Even percentage-wise?

Mr. Malone: Have you got the figure there on the country circulation for the Herald?

Mr. Fortier: No.

Senator Prowse: Maybe it is not that important.

Mr. Malone: They have a substantial country circulation.

Senator Prowse: Do you have the mill line comparisons of those two?

Mr. Malone: Mill line? No. I can give you the Albertan.

The Albertan's mill line comparison is $7.06 per million readers. I am sorry, I have not got the Calgary Herald.

Senator Prowse: The Herald is one of the lowest in the country next to the Journal, I think, is it not?

Mr. Malone: It is amongst the lowest.

Senator Prowse: So it would be about half of that probably.

Mr. Malone: I would think so. I mean, I don't want to guess at anything. Yes it would be much lower.

Here is a thing that might explain mill line rates a little bit. The larger the paper the lower the mill line rate.

For example, the Toronto Star, which has the largest circulation in Canada, for years were very proud of the fact they had the lowest mill line rate in Canada.

The Free Press, we are very proud we have the lowest mill line rate. The larger the paper is the lower the mill line rate.

Senator Prowse: So it is not mill line rates alone. It would affect your labour costs, would it not?

Mr. Malone: It would. There was a time 20 or 30 years ago that advertising agencies paid a great deal of attention to mill line rates. It is not as big a factor in advertising selling as it used to be. Why, I don't know. I think it is important.

Senator Prowse: Well, now, in view of this fact that the costs are there, the papers are up, the Tribune and yourselves, are you completely unionized in Winnipeg?

Mr. Malone: No, no. We have some union departments.

Senator Prowse: Where, just in the...

Mr. Malone: We have our press rooms unionized.

Senator Prowse: And the mechanics?

Mr. Malone: And the stereotypé departments are unionized. I think those are the only two.

Senator Prowse: Do you have the typographers too?

Mr. Malone: No, we don't have that. We have no ITU union. No, that is all—just the two.

Senator Everett: Could I ask a question on that point?

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead.

Senator Everett: Did I understand you to say the Winnipeg Free Press had the lowest mill line rate?

Mr. Malone: No. It is amongst the lowest. At one time we did have the lowest. And we are fighting to get at the lowest. It is not. I would think we are in the lowest four.

Senator Everett: Would the Vancouver Sun...

Mr. Malone: They are comparatively low. I have got it here. That is a combined rate. They have both rates out there. You can advertise in one paper or both out in Vancouver.

The combined rate is, though, $3.85 for the combined circulation.

Senator Everett: $3.85?

Mr. Malone: That is the mill line; that is per million readers. That is pretty low.

I don't know what the Toronto Star one is at the moment. It used to be the lowest in Canada. I don't think they are the lowest now. They used to be. Certainly they are amongst the lowest. I am sorry, I have not got those figures.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: So the thing is the mill line rate would tend to reflect the actual paper's cost of production, would it not?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And your advertising is your chief source of income?

Mr. Malone: That is right.

Senator Prowse: So the economic viability of the paper is going to depend on its competitiveness of the mill line rate?

Mr. Malone: Except for that one factor I mentioned. I don't think the mill line rate comparison is as important now in the eyes of advertisers as it used to be. I think it should be, myself.

But often if you talk to an advertising agency, you say, "What about your mill line rate; look at this." And he says, "Oh, there are other factors—demographic information about the age groups and the wage levels of the group." He wants a lot of information now he did not have. And he will take those into consideration.

Whereas, as I say, 25, 30 years ago the mill line rate, that was the only thing to look at.

Senator Prowse: Do you know whether the Tribune is making money?

Mr. Malone: I suspect they are.

Senator Prowse: How about the Albertan?

Mr. Malone: It is getting by. It is not very profitable, but we are not losing money.

For a smaller paper it is tough going. I think anybody would realize that, when you have the mill line rate comparisons, heavy production costs, they are going up, newsprint goes up.

One paper is able to draw a huge volume of advertising in relation to its community, and the other is not.

It is a tough game for a small paper; very tough.

Senator Prowse: Would you say it is probably true that a great deal of your circulation depends on the way your ads cover the desires of the shopping housewife?

Mr. Malone: It is certainly a factor, particularly in the comparison between the morning and the evening field.

I cannot give the exact reason, but the evening field draws the retail advertising. Whether the shopping habits of the wife—she is busy all day; she is running around; and she sits down at night and reads the advertisements; she sits scanning the evening paper; and then does her shopping tomorrow. That seems to be the pattern in Canada.

Now, it is the reverse in England. The big papers are in the morning field. The national paper takes time to deliver it. And the habit has developed largely that they draw the bulk of the advertising in the morning papers.

The large American city, say, New York—there is a tendency back to the morning papers. But in Canada the pattern (with, I think, one exception) is that the emphasis on advertising is in the evening field, the retail. It is a very important aspect.

You take any morning paper in Canada. There are not many of them left. Their support from retail advertising is minimal.

The Albertan draws very little. Even the Globe and Mail with a national picture have very little support from retail advertising. They are highly dependent on the national field.

Senator Prowse: Now, with the Ottawa situation you have just about a fifty-fifty split, have you not?

Mr. Malone: It is very close. And the competition is very rugged, very real.

Senator Prowse: I remember, Mr. Malone, at one time with dairies that were in competition, one of them would agree they would carry a very small amount of butter in one place and they would concentrate on the ice cream market.

And the two dairies then in the next city would reverse that position, and one fellow would carry—the fellow who had the ice cream market in Edmonton, for example, would have the butter market in Calgary.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And the theory was that they kept just a little bit in there so they would clobber the other fellow if he got out of there without it costing them too much.

Do you have any such arrangement as this?

Mr. Malone: No. There is no such deal as that. Here in Ottawa they fight very, very hard for their circulation. I do not think there would be any doubt in our mind that the competition there is very real.

Senator Prowse: Fine; thank you.

Now, you said something that intrigued me: you have no editorial policy as a group. In other words, FP has no editorial policy as such, or any ideas on anything as such.

And yet you said in your verbal statement that the reason you bought papers—or you wanted papers where they will carry some weight and have some influence.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, this is as close as I was able to get it verbatim. What for?

Mr. Malone: Well, you may find it hard to believe, but we believe that newspapers do a service. I thoroughly believe in newspapers. It is an important thing, a national service.

Here Ottawa has a message. We were talking about Ottawa at that time. We negotiated with the Ottawa Journal, a Conservative paper.

To me it is very important that two competing newspapers are maintained here in Ottawa, the national capital. That to me overrides the responsibility of being Conservative or Liberal, or anything else. There are two competing points of view right here, getting into the affairs of Government. I think they should be provocative. They should be disturbing the thinking down here. And I think this is in the national interest.

Now, had we, say, said, "Well, the simple idea is to make money", we could have put our money elsewhere and made a lot more money than we are now.

Ottawa will grow. I think in time it will easily support two good newspapers here. There is not too much room at the moment. They are both doing, I think, a pretty good job. There is not much elbow room. But it is important for them to be maintained.

And when I approached our proprietors with the idea of having the Ottawa Journal join us, this was the point of view I put up to them. I said, "What about it? I can't guarantee that I can make a lot of money for you in this at all, but are you interested in this?"

They said, "Yes." They said, "It will continue as a Conservative paper."

I said, "Fine; as long as it is a good Conservative newspaper, that is fine. We will back it."

Senator Prowse: FP was not in existence and I do not think you had any relationship with them at that time, but as a result of your later association, do you remember when the Bulletin was sold out?

Mr. Malone: In Edmonton, yes.

Senator Prowse: Do you remember what the factors that led to that were?

Mr. Malone: Yes. I can't speak in exact detail but in general terms. Yes, economically they could not make a go of it. They were not getting enough advertising support. They were faced with very excessive union demands which they could not meet.

And they had to decide either to stay in business or fold up. And they could not finance it.

Senator Prowse: I don't want to appear to be cross-examining you.

Mr. Malone: That is all right.

Senator Prowse: And I realize you were not there. But let me just point out one or two things.

The strike was already over. And Campbell had sold the paper to Bell. And Bell ran through Vancouver, and he ran the circulation up from around 16 to 18,000, edging on to 30,000. And the old press just could not get it out in time to put it on the buses for the rural delivery.

Does this ring a bell with you? Have you heard this one?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And if they were to then service the increased circulation they had they were going to have to buy a new press. And if they bought a new press they would need a new building. And if they got a new building the old linotype machines would not stand the move. All those factors happened.

Mr. Malone: They just simply could not finance on the advertising revenues they were getting.

Senator Prowse: And the press problem, the capacity of the equipment. Well, it was not losing money at that point.

Mr. Malone: It was very close to breakeven point. They had run the circulation up at some very considerable cost. They were then faced with "Can we get the equipment in? Can we meet the increases demanded by the union for increased wages?"

It simply could not be done.

Senator Prowse: There was a big capital outlay. He was not going to be able to get a good enough return to justify it in view of the alternative opportunities.

Mr. Malone: In a simple word, it was not a viable operation. If it was, I am quite sure Mr. Bell would not have folded.

Senator Prowse: All right. Let us come back to this business of, in your own words, you buy papers. You have not told us that you buy papers to make money. You have told us that you keep the two papers going and you contribute to keeping the two papers going in Ottawa because you think it is important; and this is a national service.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And when you were asked whether you would buy papers or not, you said you like to get into certain areas because you would have some influence. And I believe that statement.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: But I want to know what for?

Mr. Malone: I see your point.

Senator Prowse: How can you say that you are going to give complete editorial freedom to people, that you have no interest in what the fellow is doing in the way of editorial comment in the local field; but you, as a group, would be buying papers here, or some where, because it would expand your influence?

Mr. Malone: I think I can put it this way: it is not a question of influence; a certain philosophy or anything like that. We are just vain enough to think we can put out good papers; we can serve the community; we can serve the national interest; and that by expanding a thing we can make a contribution to the country.

I am talking in those terms rather than say, we want to influence them to be Liberal or Conservatives. That is the context in which I am talking.

Senator Prowse: The thought occurs to me if I had FP at my disposal and I had an argument with the Government, even though they were saying different things in different papers all across the country, they knew had the capacity to land on them with combined ton of bricks. That would represent some influence.

Mr. Malone: I do not think it is ever like to happen. It never has happened.

Senator Prowse: Has it crossed your mind?

Mr. Malone: I cannot think of an issue. No, it has never crossed my mind.

Senator Prowse: And it is not what you meant by "have some influence"?

Mr. Malone: Again this is a hypothetical question. I suppose you could get some tremendous national issue. I don't know. I really could not think of an issue. Say whether or to go to war or not. I mean, some great national issue. You might conceivably say this is a purpose.

But there again it is really too hypothetical. I could not give you an answer on that.

But we have no thought of this and never have had, that we would use the influence of our papers collectively, or anything like that, in any way, shape or form.

Senator Prowse: All right. Now, Eaton's laid off 200 of their maintenance people and completely got rid of that department effective the 12th January.

Mr. Malone: Yes?

Senator Prowse: When did the Globe and Mail carry the story?

Mr. Malone: I could not tell you, Mr. Prowse might know.

Senator Prowse: We will ask him this afternoon.

Mr. Malone: I think the area you are touching on there is to what extent do the advertisers influence the newspaper policy as to what they say or don't say. And I touched on this for that reason in my brief.

That day has gone. I cannot think of an incident where there has been anything like this.

I am not saying advertising agencies, or anybody, do not approach us and suggest this or that. But the day when advertisers say, "You don't publish that in the paper or else"—I cannot think of an incident in the last 30 years where that has happened.

The instinct would be the reverse. The instinct of editorial policy would be to slap it on the front page to show their independence of the position.

Senator Prowse: Are you aware this has happened?

Mr. Malone: No, I was not.

Senator Prowse: You have never heard of it?

Mr. Malone: No. And I am quite sure it was no deliberate if it did happen.

Senator Prowse: Are you aware of the fact that Eaton's had laid off these 200 employees in Toronto?

Mr. Malone: No, I was not.

But how big an item is that? In every city right across Canada people are laid off—Winnipeg, Vancouver. I mean, is it a big item?

Senator Prowse: The idea I am getting at is this: you are publisher of the Free Press. And I think Eaton's has a pretty big store in Winnipeg.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: It was the whole centre of their operation at one time, I think.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And there has been no directive gone out from your people to find whether a similar thing is contemplated there, where it would have some impact?

Mr. Malone: No, this did not happen.

If you asked Eaton's I would be very happy. If the head of Eaton's were here I am quite sure he would tell you there are many things that appear in our papers he does not like.

No, no, there is no attempt whatever. There may be a slip; I don't know. But there is no deliberate policy whatever.

I brought you down a couple of examples. I thought this question might arise.

Senator Prowse: Let us deal with my case first, and we will have your examples in a minute.

Mr. Malone: Right.

Senator Prowse: The Eaton's story was written first of all, I understand, for the Telegram and never appeared.

Mr. Malone: What was that again?

Senator Prowse: The story of the Eaton's layoff was first written for the Telegram.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And the story never appeared in the Telegram.

No, the Eaton family have an interest in the Telegram. And I am not going to criticize somebody for doing something that I might just feel I ought to do myself.

It was a very small story that appeared some time later, apparently under pressure from some Guild boys who were doing the writing, that it got into the other two papers.

But nobody seems to chase this thing down. And yet everybody comes in here and tells us that nothing is going to interfere with a news story.

And yet any employer who lets off 200 people today, would you not think that ought to be good valid news, particularly if this might be going to every other city?

Mr. Malone: The situation here I am not acquainted with. I don't know the individual story you have in mind, or the date, or anything else. But I can tell you without any hesitation that there is no policy of suppressing news under pressure of any advertiser.

If it was, I would take a very serious view of it—I mean, in terms of FP policy.

I can state no case. And certainly it has never been intentional. If it was, I would take a very active hand. You ask when would head office step in. That is a thing we would step in on.

Senator Prowse: This gets into the question of where you have a person who has the ownership and control of a newspaper but also has other business interests, which must be known to the publisher of his paper.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: For example, you would be well aware of Mr. Bell's other interests?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Isn't that knowledge almost unconsciously going to come back to your loyalty to the general story?

Mr. Malone: That is a fair question. But, no, I have no worries on that score at all. Actually, it should work the other way almost.

I remember Mr. Bell was interested in, and he is on the board of the bank, he is on the board of the CPR, and various things. And invariably it happens that when he is at an important meeting one of our papers comes out and attacks the institution he is on, with no hesitation at all. And he says, "Did you have to do that to me today?"

Senator Prowse: Are you still kicking the CPR?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Real good.

Mr. Malone: Before he ever went on the board we had a terrible editorial in the Free Press against the CPR. And it had no influence whatever. All our writers know that.

Senator Prowse: You are sure your editorial did not influence the CPR, though?

Mr. Malone: I hope it did.

Senator Prowse: Hopefully?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

I said I would give you a couple of examples.

Senator Prowse: Yes, please.

Mr. Malone: This is on the question of what is news, and a paper has to judge it. I don't know. You mentioned 200 people. Here is one story which appeared. There were two different stores that were both up on a charge of false advertising. They were both substantial advertisers of ours. One store was fined $1,000, another was also fined for misleading advertising. And we slapped that right on the front page. So we were possibly throwing away valuable advertising. It went right on that page. We had no hesitation. We banged right in.

I think you will find actually right through the industry this is now the approach. It was not twenty-five or thirty years ago. And could not, quite honestly, tell you of an incident I know of where it has been suppressed.

Back in the thirties we had a little game in the press gallery. We watched very carefully what reports went into which paper; and drew our own conclusions. That was 1930. That was a long time ago.

I could not give you a single instance that I know of anywhere in Canada in any paper.

The day of the influence of the advertiser trying to pressure a paper is gone.

If even an advertiser would get to the point where he would say, "If you run that, I will cancel my advertising," well, we let him cancel his advertising. It is just as simple as that.

Senator Prowse: The situation is he needs you more than you need him?

Mr. Malone: No. I think it is the other way around.

Senator Prowse: No, I think I am right. You just misunderstood.

Mr. Malone: I think I can put it this way: papers now have sufficient independence and strength through advertising that they are able to do it.

Senator Prowse: I mean, you can get along without an advertiser. It is going to hurt you more than it hurts you?

Mr. Malone: That is right. We have other sources to draw on, and other advertising revenue.

Advertising revenue is what has made the papers free and independent.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Malone: That is the truth.

Senator Prowse: It has to be.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: All right. Does FP send stories out? For example, did you write a story, or cause a story to be written recently about NATO which was carried in all the FP papers?

Mr. Malone: I have written on NATO, yes. It was not carried by all the FP papers. I don't want to correct you but...

Senator Prowse: It was carried in the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Malone: I think they carried it. But it is entirely up to the editors. Some papers may feel they want it—the same with any of our group. Say Bruce Hutchison writes an article. They may want to run it. There is no compulsion. If they want a story, and they see it, and like it, and they think it is good, they have the freedom to use it or not.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the group makes certain things available on an interchange basis?

Mr. Malone: The NATO story you are talking about, I was doing some writing on it. Some papers carried it. I think the Colonist carried it out in Victoria. Dick Bower said, "You are writing on it, let me have it." He is interested in it.

I think the Globe and Mail picked it up. But I cannot tell you which ones it went into.

Senator Prowse: But you put out no direction on it?

Mr. Malone: No direction; no suggestion whatever.

Senator Prowse: What common services does the group provide for the papers aside from the right of an exchange of and access to technological change and innovation?

Mr. Malone: Not very much.

Senator Prowse: The editorial end I am particularly interested in.

Mr. Malone: Yes. Certain writers we make available to all the papers on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. The papers have their right to do it.

Take Maurice Western: Maurice writes out of Ottawa, a certain type of copy, not spot news but an interpretive type of thing.

Senator Prowse: In depth.

Mr. Malone: Now, any of our papers that want it, they are at liberty to have it. Some do and some don't.

Senator Prowse: So the group does not provide that kind of thing.

Mr. Malone: No. There are few areas that we do have a common service. We make it available, but we don't say, "Here is the service; you have got to take it." There is none of that.

Senator Prowse: The advantages the group provides, then, are these: technological information, set-up and financial backing. Would that be correct?

Mr. Malone: Yes, and a degree of co-operation in the editorial field. Somebody has a scoop on a story. I would hope they would pass it on to the other members of the group.

Senator Prowse: The group does maintain a bureau in Washington? Or do the individual papers have it? Or do you have both?

Mr. Malone: They have both. We operate a bureau, but they are independent members. There is no manager of a bureau as such running it.

Senator Prowse: I see.

Mr. Malone: Here in Ottawa the members vary. I don't know. I suppose we might have fifteen, sixteen people here at different times. It goes up and it goes down.

We have a couple here from the Vancouver Sun. There is one from Winnipeg. We have one covering the Calgary and Victoria papers.

When I say that, they have somebody they can get in touch with for a direct query. They have a direct responsibility to them. But they also have an obligation to pool their information and knowledge to the benefit of all of us.

Senator Prowse: One of the smaller papers, of course, is the Lethbridge Herald.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: What services would they get from the group that way? Now, please tell me specifically, not hypothetically.

Mr. Malone: They would have access to anything that comes out of Ottawa, out of any of our writers. They would say, "We want Maurice Western or Bruce Hutchison."

Senator Prowse: They can get anybody they ask for?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

The Chairman: When you say "anybody," could they get George Bain?

Mr. Malone: No. You are getting into a different area. He is a specialist writer.

We have a philosophy that we want an individual character for each of our papers. We don't want the Vancouver Sun to look like the Free Press, or the Free Press to look like the Globe and Mail, or anything like that.

To do this you cannot have every writer appearing in every paper. They would all look the same. We have tried to preserve some identity.

For example, George Bain; you mentioned him. George Bain's articles have appeared the odd time in the odd paper. I would be disturbed if they were appearing every day as they were in the Globe and Mail. They would all look like the Globe and Mail after a time.

Do I make my point clear?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Just to make it clear to me, the point is that if I were to buy the Globe and Mail in Toronto—suppose I was taking that regularly—if I arrived in Winnipeg and happened to pick up the Free Press I would not immediately think I was at home with my same paper. Is that what you are telling me?

Mr. Malone: To go back to your original question about Lethbridge; this is where it has a definite benefit. The paper in Lethbridge is not a large paper. They are limited in the amount of news columns they have, and so on.

By coming into the group operation they can draw on a couple of men in London, two or three men in Washington. They can draw on their own direct contact here. And they can pick up, as I say, Weston, Hutchison, or Joyce Fairburn. They could not possibly manage that on their own. They could not afford it. They would have to pay somebody part-time service here.

Let us take another instance. Let us say there is a meeting out in Vancouver, an important meeting. The Lethbridge Herald could not afford to send a correspondent the way out to cover it. Now, all they have to do is to get on the phone to the managing editor, and say, "Could you send us a duplicate of it, please? Have you got a good man covering that?" That is a great advantage.

They may not be able to carry much space on it, but it is a tremendous range. They can go to anywhere in the country to get this

The Chairman: I have one more question on the point of George Bain. Do I take from your answer that the Winnipeg Free Press would then look like the Vancouver Sun; the Vancouver Sun would look like the Globe and Mail, and so on—do I take from that you think there is no place in Canada for national political columnists?

Mr. Malone: Oh, yes. We have them.

The Chairman: Which ones?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Fisher.

The Chairman: But in FP Publications?

Mr. Malone: Yes. Again you get into the thing: are you forcing a national columnist?

I would rather have—well, Maurice Western, Bruce Hutchison, they both write nationally, as it were.

The Chairman: I subscribe to the Globe and Mail. I very seldom read Mr. Western's columns in the Globe. I cannot recall reading them. There has been the odd column by Bruce Hutchison, not on a regular day-to-day basis.

I quite appreciate this is the kind of question that I can ask the Southam people next Tuesday. But you would think in 1971 there would be no room for someone like Charles Lynch?

Mr. Malone: We do emphasize the different character of our papers. If the Globe and Mail wanted any of our other writers, they are at liberty to pick them up, if they think, "Here is a particularly good piece." They have picked up some of them.

The Chairman: Yes, but on a daily column basis?

Mr. Malone: No. It is up to the editor, if they want to build the character.

The Chairman: Supposing the editor of the Vancouver Sun were to say, "We would like to have George Bain every day."

Mr. Malone: The Globe and Mail would not feel too happy about it. Neither would I. I don't mind the odd one. But I would say are you going to downgrade the individual character of the Globe and Mail in the process?

The Chairman: Why would the Globe and Mail be so unhappy?

Mr. Malone: They are rather jealous about their writers. Each of our papers is.

The Chairman: They perhaps do not have any subscribers in Vancouver, though.

Mr. Malone: Oh, yes, there are quite a few, or the "Report on Business."

Senator Prowse: Let us suppose George Bain's articles are written because he knows this is in the Globe and Mail. He writes with that particular thought in mind. Where we have problems in Canada today—and I won't put it into the whole question of "western separatism," at this moment anyway—might not be a useful thing to let the people in the west see what is the daily fare of the people in Toronto in the way of expressions of opinion, and at the same time, vice versa, let the people in Toronto (and in my opinion this might be a lot more important) have the daily fare of seeing what is the important thing to the people in the west?

Mr. Malone: We make an effort on that. And I agree with that.

That is one of the reasons we opened a Quebec bureau. At the moment we feel it is very important for Western Canada to really understand some of the motivating forces in Quebec.

Senator Prowse: Are they going to buy wheat in Quebec?

Mr. Malone: No. But it is a very important thing for this country. Most of our papers rely, through Canadian Press, a solid page of editorial opinion on Quebec Province once a week.

If you ask me how many people in Winnipeg read that, I could not tell you. But I think it is important it should be there.

Senator Prowse: There for them.

21425—3½

Mr. Malone: We make quite an effort on that.

But you get into this other area. We don't go out to make writers national columnists as such. We make them available. We do want to preserve the character. The Globe and Mail is the Globe and Mail. The Free Press is the Free Press. But that does not say we do not try to encourage some degree of co-operation on the stories.

If one man is available on the spot, it doesn't matter who he is, he tries to cover for all of us.

The Chairman: But not on a feature basis?

Mr. Malone: No. You are getting a specialized writer who gives a character to a paper.

George may be here this afternoon. He is a specialized type of writer, shall I say?

The Chairman: He is.

Mr. Malone: He has a peculiar flair, and so on.

Senator Prowse: All right. About the question of staff; how do you recruit? What is the general picture? Is this on an individual basis? Or do you provide it as a group—provide any assistance to papers in obtaining staff?

Mr. Malone: Yes, to some degree.

Senator Prowse: Could you explain that for us?

Mr. Malone: Yes. I am visiting the papers very frequently. They are in touch with me by telephone. And they say, "We need another mechanic" or "We need so-and-so. Do you know of a good one?" And someone says, "We are short of a desk man do you know of a good desk man?"

And I canvass them, and have a list on me. Say I am down in Lethbridge and we have a young chap here who has got a little back-ground and wants to get to a bigger city. I would rather promote him in my own organization than have him leave us. Because we have put some time into him.

We try to help each other that way in all departments, advertising including. We are moving them around. In the last few weeks we moved an advertising man from Toronto to Victoria. They needed an advertising man.

I canvass my own group first and give them an opportunity.

Senator Prowse: How about on the editorial staff?

Mr. Malone: Oh, yes.

Senator Prowse: Do you kind of use the smaller papers as a farm club to get them ready for the big league?

Mr. Malone: I would like to do that more than we are doing. It is not too easily worked out. But there is a fair amount.

In the Globe and Mail I could name two, three, four people who have come from the Free Press. We have people out west in Winnipeg who have come from the Albertan. In Victoria we have got people who came from Winnipeg. And the Vancouver Sun have people who have come from Winnipeg.

There is a fair amount of it. And we try to encourage it.

Senator Prowse: What about the journalism schools in Canada; have they been a fruitful source of supply for you?

Mr. Malone: They have been helpful, yes, and increasingly so. There are more journalism schools developing in the country. And I think they are doing a better job.

I think all of our papers arranged to get students on in the summer so we could have a look at them and give them some practical application.

Senator Prowse: You do that, do you?

Mr. Malone: Yes. The journalism schools often ask our people to lecture. And we participate any time we can. If we have a man who can go out and help them out and give a lecture, we do. They are doing it in Calgary. Peter Heffer goes and lectures on it. We do it in Winnipeg. We try to keep a pretty good liaison.

There is an excellent liaison here in Ottawa with the schools of journalism and the Ottawa Journal. I am sure both papers, the Citizen and the Journal, have students from Carleton in the summer.

It is an increasing and improving field for recruiting, yes.

Senator Prowse: What kind of business arrangements—I am not asking how much you pay them at all, but what kind of business arrangements do you have when you put a man who is a publisher of one of your papers—the chain owns a paper and, I don't know whether you use the term "publisher" for him or whether you use the term

"managing editor," whatever it is—what arrangements do you have with him? Is he on a day-to-day basis? Or is he on a term contract, or an open-end contract, or what?

Mr. Malone: He is on a straight salary, a employee.

Senator Prowse: Subject to termination or normal business practice?

Mr. Malone: That is right. But if he has been with you a long time, you have a greater obligation to him.

Senator Prowse: Yes, this would be your moral feeling about a person.

What I am getting at is the thing earlier where we discussed that where you have selected a man as an editor for a particular paper, and let us suppose he did jump the hoop on you and decide he was going to take a line on something that was completely opposed to what they had done. Let us go a little further and make it simpler for you. Let us suppose the circulation started to fall off rather quickly as a result of his switch.

Would you hesitate to fire him under those circumstances?

Mr. Malone: I would have to know the circumstances. We have never done it.

Senator Prowse: I gave you a pretty good set of circumstances to deal with, Mr. Malone.

Mr. Malone: Yes. I don't doubt that our own circulation department in Winnipeg would be happy to fire me. Last week I wrote some things and we immediately got a lot of snow.

Senator Prowse: They can't can you.

Mr. Malone: But I would say no, the fact that somebody does not like your editorial policy and they cannot fill their subscription, this is a normal part of the business.

If the paper is going to pot, that would be a different thing. You would have to move in.

This has never happened. And it is pretty hard to guess what you would feel. It would be depending on the individual: how long he had been with you; what his age is. But certainly if the paper was not doing its job and falling down, you would have to change it. There is no doubt about that.

Senator Prowse: You would have to change it; and the power is there.

The power is also there, is it not, for you to give them editorial direction if you so decided that you should change your policy in that regard—because what could they do to protect themselves?

Mr. Malone: I think quite a few of them might quit. I would never attempt it. I have ever done it.

Senator Prowse: That is all they could do?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And presumably you could find somebody else.

Mr. Malone: But it is not in our philosophy to ever give direction.

Senator Prowse: I am not suggesting you do, or would.

Mr. Malone: That is right.

Senator Prowse: All I am dealing with is the protection, that the power is there every day, is it not?

Mr. Malone: Quite right, yes.

Senator Prowse: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: May I just ask you a couple of questions, and then I will turn to the other senators?

I will perhaps ask the gentlemen concerned next week—but in your opinion could the Tribune in Winnipeg survive if it was an independent?

I thought you might say to ask Mr. Balfour.

Mr. Malone: I think it could in the particular circumstances there are in Winnipeg.

The Chairman: All right. Let me then ask you, do you think that the Albertan could survive in Calgary if it was an independent?

Mr. Malone: It would be difficult.

The Chairman: Would it be possible?

Mr. Malone: I don't know. It would be very questionable. It is in the morning field, and not getting retail advertising.

Let us assume we come into a recession the coming year, and their advertising is slashed very sharply, and they do not have the natural resources to back them. The power might feel he would have to close up.

If you had a recession this year, with the newspaper operation I am quite sure we would be prepared to carry it through for a while.

The Chairman: For how long?

Mr. Malone: Well, how long is "long"?

The Chairman: You said a few minutes ago the competition in Ottawa between the Citizen and the Journal is rugged. I think that was the word you used.

Mr. Malone: I think that is a fair expression.

The Chairman: I think it is, yes.

Do you think the competition in Winnipeg between the Tribune and the Free Press is as rugged as the competition here in Ottawa?

Mr. Malone: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: Do you think that the competition in Calgary between the Albertan and the Herald is as rugged as the competition here in Ottawa?

Mr. Malone: I would say they are both fighting very hard, yes. I would think it is. It is a more lopsided thing here. They are not in directly competing fields.

In Ottawa there are two evening papers; Winnipeg, two evening papers. Now you have a morning and an evening combination in Calgary. They are not selling quite as directly opposite each other. But there is very real competition up there.

The Chairman: So you think the competition is real in Winnipeg and in Calgary?

Mr. Malone: No doubt in my mind. You should talk to my advertising manager about this.

The Chairman: The reason I put the question the way I have is that we have received representations which would indicate that the competition in those cities, in the opinion of some people, is not as real as the competition here in Ottawa. And I am interested to have your comment. And you have given it to me. So thank you.

I would like to ask just one more question before I turn to one of the senators.

You said at page 13 in Section 25 of your brief—you are commenting that I said (I think it was the original speech I made in the Senate):

"... there was some confusion or mystery as to just who owned and directed the newspapers in Canada."

And you said "There is no mystery about this. This information is readily available to the public."

Mr. Malone: Yes.

The Chairman: You then went on and said:

"The names of our various editors, publishers and managers are also on record" and so on.

Do you think, Mr. Malone, that the average reader of the Globe and Mail, for example, is aware that the Globe and Mail is an FP paper?

Mr. Malone: I think anybody who is interested in it—if they are interested in the ownership of a newspaper, yes, they would know it.

The Chairman: Do you think they should be interested in the ownership of a newspaper?

The Chairman: But do you think then, that being so, that the Globe and Mail assists them in being aware of that ownership?

The point I am making is that I look at the masthead of the Globe and Mail from this morning:

"The Globe and Mail Canada's National Newspaper is published every weekday at 140 King St. W., Toronto 110, by The Globe and Mail Limited. The Globe founded 1844; The Mail founded 1872" Cable address Toronglo. Telephone 368-7851

"R. Howard Webster,
Chairman of the Board.

James L. Cooper,
President and Publisher.

Earle B. Richards,
Vice-President and General Manager.

Richard J. Doyle, Editor.
Thursday, January 22, 1970"

Would it not be in the public interest to include on that masthead somewhere a reference to the fact that the Globe and Mail is an FP publication?

Mr. Malone: It might be. I don't think it is a factor.

The Chairman: You don't think it would be in the public interest?

Mr. Malone: No. I see no point one way or the other. It is well known in every association, every advertising group, it is published by FP Publications—anybody who wants to know. I don't think it is a factor one way or the other.

The Chairman: What would be wrong with putting "FP Publications" on there?

Mr. Malone: Nothing at all. If I thought there was any advantage of doing it, I would do it.

The Chairman: May I express a personal opinion—I am not expressing the Committee opinion—yes, I think it would be in the public interest.

Mr. Malone: Well, we might take note that.

The Chairman: I do not think the readers of the Globe and Mail realize it is an FP publication. And I am sure the Globe and Mail, as has appeared in their brief (we will deal with this this afternoon) is not ashamed of the fact it is an FP publication.

Mr. Malone: Not at all.

The Chairman: You are not ashamed of the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Malone: Certainly not.

The Chairman: I am not speaking for the Committee. This is my own opinion.

Mr. Malone: No, the thought never even occurred to me.

The Chairman: May I turn to Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: In order that I can establish my priorities, is it understood that Mr. Malone will be here this afternoon?

The Chairman: The schedule for this afternoon is the Globe and Mail at four-thirty, the Journal at three-thirty. We have the Winnipeg Free Press at two-thirty.

And I think that, instead of making the two-thirty presentation a separate presentation on the part of the Free Press, we will simply carry on as we are now through the particular time, if it is necessary. If we come to deal with the Journal and the Globe and Mail earlier than that, we will.

But with the forebearance of the witness, we would like you to come back at two-thirty.

Mr. Malone: I will be available. I will be sitting on the side. I am here all afternoon.

The Chairman: At three-thirty we will turn to the Journal and at four-thirty to the Globe and Mail.

Does that answer your question?

Senator McElman: Yes. Thank you very much.

At page 48, Section 93, you refer to the Albuquerque model" in your reference to the agency type of operation. Could you briefly explain what is the Albuquerque model?

Mr. Malone: What I am dealing with there is this development—I think it started in the United States—of the agency type of operation. There is a great number of variations in

Let us say for example there are two newspapers and they say "All right, we will use the press facility, one stereotype facility."

Senator McElman: I understand that, sir. I am getting at the Albuquerque model, the original.

Mr. Malone: As I understand, that is the basis where they have a separate mechanical department. It prints for this paper, and it prints for that paper, and charges them both for their respective share of the cost. It costs so much to produce a press plate. They produced twenty-four of these for that paper and they charge them on that ratio.

It is a separate mechanical function. It does the work, charging the actual out-of-pocket expenses. That was the basis.

As I tried to indicate, there are many variations of that. You might have a paper here, one paper owned two papers, but they will contract out the editorial function to a management team completely different, and abdicate all responsibility for the editorial policy. So that the other group will have separate news services, separate reporters, separate editors, and they will say "We will contract and run that editorial department only"—either for a fee or on a profit-sharing basis, whatever it is. That is another variation.

There is another variation out in Vancouver where on the basis there the central company owns the two. And in that case they share expenses. They proportion them out again.

There has been a book published on this—I am afraid I cannot tell you the title of it—on the many variations. But they are all based on this original form developed at Albuquerque, where a central plant did the mechanical job for two separate newspapers.

Does that answer your question?

Senator McElman: Yes.

I take it from your further comments that in principle you do not think this is a bad thing in any sense?

Mr. Malone: I beg your pardon?

Senator McElman: I take it in principle you do not think this is a bad thing, that it is a trend?

Mr. Malone: It has its advantages and it has its disadvantages. If it were possible, I would say it would be better to have two completely separate organizations. But in the circumstances surrounding that particular case, I think it is perhaps the best way.

Senator McElman: Currently there is one such in Canada; is that correct?

Mr. Malone: Yes. That is the only one I know of. Yes, that is right.

Senator McElman: It is a trend apparently developing in the United States. Do you see a trend perhaps coming for Canada in this respect?

Mr. Malone: It could be. It depends entirely on the economic development.

If competition is such for advertising revenues and so on that it meant that there was not going to be room for two or three papers in a town, it might force us into that. I would hope it would not. But, if it does, I would think it would be preferable than having only one paper in a town. At least you would have competitive editorial voices.

Senator McElman: I want to carry this through. It could be a means of maintaining independence and a break of the extension of chain or group ownership.

Mr. Malone: I don't think it would necessarily break chain ownership.

Senator McElman: I mean, the extension of it.

Mr. Malone: The extension of—yes, that could be. I would see this possibly developing in the circumstances.

You see, here is a city, and there obviously was not room for two or three papers. And you say, "Now, what is the alternative?"

Either they fold up and go bust, or the other paper buys the other one out, or they attempt to maintain competitive voices through some agency arrangement.

I cannot forecast with a crystal ball what the next five or ten years will bring. But if cable or something forced the situation, we may be pushed into that area of thinking. And to me it would be preferable than seeing a paper close right down.

Senator McElman: Yes, right.

You have expressed yourself on concentration and multi-media ownership. I don't think you dealt with ownership of media by conglomerates to any degree.

There are developments both within this nation and the States whereby conglomerates whose interests outside the media area are very extensive—the media element of the conglomerate is minimal relative to the total picture; their principal interests are elsewhere...

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: What is your feeling about this trend?

Mr. Malone: I would not like to see newspapers, either groups or individually, in conglomerates where it was a secondary consideration.

Here our proprietors have outside interests, some substantial outside interests, but our primary function is still the newspaper.

Maybe this is a biased view of a newspaperman. I would hate to see that ever subordinated to some other great complex of shipbuilding or something like that. I would not ever want to be a factory operation.

Does that answer your question?

Senator McElman: Yes.

At one point in your testimony you exhorted Government, I believe, not to place any restrictions on who can own a newspaper.

With the danger of the conglomerate situation in mind, just as an example, would you be opposed if somewhere in the structure there were a body before which there were held public hearings prior to a sale-purchase agreement being confirmed of a newspaper, similar perhaps to what the CRTC is doing in broadcasting?

Mr. Malone: I would be very opposed to that.

Senator McElman: How, then, would the public interest be protected to prevent stock conglomerates, at the national level or international level, from picking up stock newspapers?

I am thinking of the ITT/ABC case in the States—you are probably familiar with it—where finally the Justice Department stepped in and said, no, ITT will not gobble up ABC as well as what they already have.

Mr. Malone: I would think there could be a point developed—I am hoping it won't, and don't see it at the moment, but theoretically you could reach a point where the Government would be justified in stepping in.

There was a charge, you remember, prior to the war that German influence had a very substantial backing in the French newspapers. Where national security is involved, I would say if that did exist and it has been written about for some time, the Government would be justified in stepping in to the ownership.

I do not see this happening here. I would hope it never would happen.

But if the national interest was at stake, if the newspapers through the Combines Investigation were acting against the public interest, yes, it would be justified, in my view. Else I would hate to see it unless it was warranted and clearly needed.

Senator McElman: We currently have, of course, the Combines Investigation legislation.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: But it clearly does not apply in the sort of situation I am speaking of where such a purchase might be in the making. It does in the United States.

I was just trying to get to, do you think that this would be a wrong intervention by the state—by any state?

Mr. Malone: If in extreme circumstances, no. I would hope it would not, but it could happen. I am talking theoretically now. This is a hypothetical question again.

Say the Mafia moved in and bought up the newspapers of Canada. I should say certainly the Government should step in in whatever way they could—whether they had to pass new acts or not, or whatever they wanted—there was any danger of that type of thing.

Senator Prowse: Suppose there is not a law that would allow them to really step in at this stage.

Mr. Malone: No existing law, you mean?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Malone: I would say Parliament would be entitled to pass laws.

Senator Prowse: Would you think we ought to anticipate a situation like this and be ready for it?

Mr. Malone: No, I do not.

Senator Prowse: You mean, we are going to let the dog bite and then close the door after the horse has gone—to get my metaphors mixed?

Mr. Malone: Surely you pass laws to deal with existing situations. If you pass laws in case something might happen—That situation does not exist in Canada.

You asked me my opinion, and I say if the circumstances got to that extreme, I would say yes, the Government should step in. But his situation does not exist in Canada. And in my opinion it is not likely to.

Senator Prowse: You put in your articles of association a provision—not that anybody was doing it at the time, but that only a Canadian citizen could take the shares of FP.

Mr. Malone: We were looking 50 years ahead, I hope.

Senator Prowse: Would it be wrong for government to look ahead, if it is good for business?

Mr. Malone: You may recall that at one time the Government had in mind taxing advertising of foreign owners. When that first came up we were very concerned about it. And I saw the Prime Minister at that time. And I said I felt this was wrong. I said, "If you are worried about it, this is something the newspapers themselves should be worrying about."

And I talked to our proprietors at that time. But that was what precipitated it.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Malone: In my mind there is no question that I myself or our proprietors would never sell out to anything against the public interest, or foreign ownership, or anything else.

But I said, "If you are worried about it, don't put a government regulation in; we will do our best ourselves. Let us ourselves defend this position."

To me I don't think the Government should step in except in most extreme cases.

The Chairman: When was it that the Government had a tax on advertising in mind?

Mr. Malone: It was under debate here in the House. I don't remember when it was.

Senator Prowse: Well, you have the income tax, which is the reverse situation now.

The Chairman: I was wondering what Mr. Malone had in mind when he said that.

I suspect what you had in mind was the paper delivered at a Liberal convention. That is a far cry from the House. This is a minor point.

Mr. Malone: You are quite right. It was a matter of some active discussion to the country at the time.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: There is one section of your brief that I would just like to clarify. It is at the bottom of page 34 on to 35. Dealing with press councils, you say:

"I suggest to you that just because they have a press council in England or that all the newspapers in Canada do not publish all the government handouts or promote government policies, it does not necessarily follow that we should have a press council in Canada."

Has there been any suggestion from any quarter that any thought of a press council originated from the fact that newspapers do not publish all government handouts or promote government policies?

Mr. Malone: I said earlier in my brief there and verbally this morning that what might be considered a good paper and a paper doing its duty and responsible in the view of a reader or the public generally might be quite different from what a government or legislator might think.

He would say, "Well, you did not cover my speech properly. You did not do this and that" and that type of thing. This is a natural thing.

We are here to serve the public. In the views of government they may feel the paper is falling down and criticizing: they don't understand; they don't publish this or that. But this is a natural state of affairs.

And my thought there was that government is traditionally critical of the press; and the press criticizes them. I would hate to see that used as a reason for setting up a press council, saying, "Well, we are not getting very good coverage across the country. Therefore we will have a press council and get better." That is really what I was trying to imply here.

Senator McElman: There was no interference, then?

Mr. Malone: No, not as such. But I would hate to see that develop in the Government's mind: they saying the press is being critical of us and we will fix it by having a press council.

Senator Prowse: Would you think that of us?

Mr. Malone: I have not met a member of the Legislature yet who is happy about the newspapers.

Senator Prowse: But we have learned to live with it.

The Chairman: Where was that quote from, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Starting off at the bottom of page 34, Section 73, and on to page 35.

The Chairman: I am not sure that you directly answered Senator McElman's question. Because I must say when I read that section I took from it that you were suggesting there was some form of government pressure for a press council because the papers are not promoting government policies and so on. And I think we should make it perfectly clear on the record that you did not suggest that.

Mr. Malone: No.

The Chairman. It is a hypothetical suggestion. You are saying, if that happened.

Mr. Malone: I wonder if I could amplify it in this way. We have often been criticized from government sources that we are not using government handouts, and so on. And what I am trying to say is that I hope that would not be taken as a reason in the Government's mind as to why we should have a press council. That is all I am saying there.

It does not matter what the department is. They have their PR departments; and hand out releases. And our editors have to judge what is the news of the day. There might be great demand, and they can only give up this much space.

The Chairman: I am not quarrelling with it. I am simply saying I think it is important for the members of this Committee to have it on the record that there has been no pressure from the Government for a press council on this basis.

Mr. Malone: None whatever, no. I am simply saying I hope that would not be taken as a reason for a press council.

The Chairman: I understand.
Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Any more than there has been no pressure from the CMA because you do not carry all industry handouts?

Mr. Malone: The Government have a bit more power than the CMA. That is what is worrying me.

Senator Prowse: That worries the CMA too.

Senator McElman: Just a matter of interest: there appears to be an aversion to the use of the word "chain" as opposed to "group." Is there a sensitivity here?

Mr. Malone: No. I have not got it. I have noted that, too. Somebody made a remark here yesterday on that. I was here for a few minutes, and they brought that out. I have views one way or the other.

Senator McElman: In your testimony today you suggested, "We collect and sell news." Does this denote a different philosophy from that expressed by Mr. Blackburn yesterday that the newspaper is hired by the public as an agent to collect and disseminate news?

Mr. Malone: As an agent for collecting news—I would not put it quite in that interpretation.

I think I know what Mr. Blackburn is saying there—that we are an agent for the public to collect and distribute our news.

I have looked at it differently, in this way, that our product is a newspaper, news, and we collect it and we sell it. That is our business.

As a means to do that we also sell advertising. And the revenue from advertising makes it possible to put out a paper and sell it news. It is a means to an end, and a tremendous means to an end. It means life and death to us, and our freedom.

But our primary product is to collect and sell news to our readers. And we have got to produce the kind of news, or mirror events that are going on, that they are prepared to put up ten cents each day and buy it. We must answer to them. And if you don't put out the product they want they won't buy your paper. That is our primary business.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

The Chairman: May I ask you, Mr. Malone, in Section 103 on page 52, and I quote:

"I would add that we must also guard against any trend towards 'permissive' reporting in our permissive society."

You made reference to that this morning. I am not clear what "permissive reporting" is.

Mr. Malone: Put it this way: here I think you would all agree certain standards, morals, whatever it is, there is a certain permissiveness in our society today which has developed, I think, in the last five or ten years—to disregard them, it is not important, and so on.

I would hope that this easy-going in the matter of principles and facts, would never seep into our papers. Facts are very real, very sacred things to us. I do not want somebody to say big, wide, sweeping things; and certain principles and standards—they don't count any more.

The Chairman: What is "permissive reporting"? I understand a "permissive society." In other words permissive reporting then (and correct me if I misunderstand you) is simply not reporting the facts?

Mr. Malone: I don't want to appear a square in this.

The Chairman: No, and I am not quarrelling with you.

Mr. Malone: But I give you a simple example. With younger people today four-letter words are very common. Now, do we reach a point where four-letter words are acceptable or permissible in our papers?

I would hate to feel that was the kind of thing we were putting out. I don't want to see this trend. I may be old-fashioned, but I still believe that we have certain principles and means of reporting that we follow with accuracy, and we don't get into this area that anything goes.

Senator Prowse: Or a series on the art of seduction?

Mr. Malone: That is right.

Senator Prowse: Which appears in some newspapers.

The Chairman: May I quote from Section 52:

"A television program must hold a mass audience at all times. It cannot afford to put any pictures or words on the air if they are not generally acceptable to a majority of the watchers."

I meant to preface my question by making some reference (and I hope I am not being unfair here; and, if I am, please correct me) to the Winnipeg Free Press tradition of, shall we say, if not being critical, at least being a watchdog of the CBC.

But isn't that particular sentence a justification or a rationale for the CBC, because they can afford to put pictures or words on the air if they are not generally acceptable to the majority of the watchers?

Mr. Malone: I wonder if they can really. The CBC must be conscious of their rating, or aware of their existing audience, as well as any other station, any independent station. If they had a huge subsidy and nobody is looking at them, that subsidy would not be justified.

The Chairman: Do you not think the CBC does, at times, put on programs which do not have a majority appeal?

Mr. Malone: Yes, they do.

The Chairman: Do you think that is in the public interest?

Mr. Malone: To some degree, yes. But it is a question of how much, and how big a subsidy is justified.

The Chairman: I would also like to turn to page 9, Sections 18 and 19:

"It has sometimes been suggested that big advertisers have a secret and sinister influence on the policies of newspapers."

Who made that suggestion, Mr. Malone?

Mr. Malone: This is a very frequent charge that we get. Sometimes you get it from readers. But it has been a fairly common view.

Are you saying the suggestion here is that your Committee has said it?

The Chairman: No.

Mr. Malone: No. It never has.

The Chairman: No.

Mr. Malone: But this is a commonly accepted view. I am sure you have all heard it—that big advertisers have an influence, yes.

Senator Prowse: A popular misconception.

Senator Beaubien: We had a case about Eaton's this morning.

Senator Prowse: That was a little different. I was not suggesting an advertiser; I was suggesting managerial concern.

The Chairman: Also in Section 19, the first sentence again:

"It has also been suggested from time to time that because newspapers enjoy a wide freedom and carry a grave public responsibility they should be licensed."

I would ask you the same question: who made that suggestion?

Mr. Malone: That is again a concept...

The Chairman: Do you hear that suggestion made as frequently as the suggestion in Section 18 about the big advertisers?

Mr. Malone: No.

The Chairman: But you do hear it from time to time?

Mr. Malone: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: I would be interested in knowing who has made that suggestion. I am talking about No. 19 now.

Mr. Malone: Generally somebody who is very annoyed with you.

The Chairman: I see.

Mr. Malone: They say, "You people should not be allowed to publish; you should have a licence," and so on. We get this thrown at us.

The Chairman: I have only one other question, and I am going to turn to Mr. Fortier.

In Section 18 you said that the policies of all your papers "often run directly against the grain of the interests known as Big Business."

Now, give me several examples of recent interest where you're ..

Mr. Malone: I could pick almost every day of the week that some of our papers are attacking big interests.

The Chairman: You don't say your editorials; you say "policies."

Mr. Malone: Take the—one at the moment I have not checked our papers, but I would say almost all of our papers have given the very extensive coverage. I know what we said in the Free Press. And this is very current. You asked about current ones.

I could go back almost every week, and you will find that our papers are attacking what they conscientiously feel is any bad influence of big business.

The Chairman: Would you comment on the quotation I am going to read? It is from the July, 1969, issue of The Canadian Forum, by Desmond Morton. He says:

"The ownership and control of the media in Canada is clutched tightly in the grip of our economic elite."

And then he goes on:

"It does not matter whether the North Bay Nugget belongs to Roy Thomson, Max Bell, or a local drive-in merchant. They are all without a single exception in the same kind of hands. They all belong to the Canadian business community. And they all do what that community wants."

I would be interested in your comments on that.

Mr. Malone: No, I don't think I would agree with that.

A paper must mirror the society that serves. I mean, it reflects what is going on in that community. It is a part of that town. And they have a responsibility. And the people in that town, it is their paper to that degree.

But to say that it does not matter who owns it, I don't agree with that at all. It does make a difference who owns it, if a man is seriously interested in producing a good paper and is working at it. There may be good owners and bad owners. It can make quite a difference.

The Chairman: He says they all belong to the Canadian business community. I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. Malone: Fair enough. Some do; some don't.

The Chairman: He says they all do what that business community wants. And you would not agree with that obviously?

Mr. Malone: No.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: You referred, Mr. Malone, earlier in the conversation that you would not see any need for government action or legislation before a problem arises. On page 50 at No. 97 you say:

"Before any more Canadian dailies get into economic difficulties or are silenced for economic reasons, some action would be prudent in the public interest. Action should be taken before it is too late."

In view of your previous remarks, you are suggesting action, and I am assuming it is action by government at this particular point. Is this in fact what you are recommending here? And what in fact would you recommend as far as assistance is concerned?

Mr. Malone: You are talking of two different actions. In the first instance, what we are talking of, as I understood, is whether you would license papers or have to get the permission of the Government? That was the question of the Government I was talking about here.

In this instance here I think that the Government would be entitled to study something about the agency operation. They are studying this in Washington at the moment. They are faced with exactly the same problem: is the agency operation good or bad? Are you going to permit them? Is this permissible under the Combines Act?

I would think the Government would be entitled to study that if they are concerned that there is going to be greater mortality of papers in Canada; they are going to disappear. I think they might well study that area.

Senator Sparrow: Have you particular recommendations on this point?

Mr. Malone: No, I have not. But I think the Government should give it very serious consideration; if there are economic developments here where more papers would disappear, that they should say, "How can we preserve independent editorial voices?"

They are studying that in Washington, and I would hope the Government here would keep in touch with that.

Senator Sparrow: In other words, this Committee or the Government should not be ignoring the newspapers as such; and committing such as this should be playing a valuable part so far as looking to the future of this industry is concerned?

Mr. Malone: Yes. I would hope this Committee, quite apart from the aspect of studying whether the newspapers are doing their job or producing the right kind of paper—I would hope you would also put equal time into how do we preserve an independent press in Canada and do the things that we should be doing? That is an area which I think might be well worth exploring.

Senator Sparrow: Under the heading, I think, the Combines Act and in discussion you suggested as well that you thought one hundred per cent ownership of newspapers would be a bad thing.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: What would happen, though, if in fact there was no provision to in fact stop that, and it became one hundred per cent owned by some group or chain or individual. It is pretty late to do anything at that point, is it not?

Is there some area you might suggest where legislation could be brought forward, either better legislation under the Combines Act or some special legislation where this in fact could not happen?

Mr. Malone: No, I don't think I could suggest any action there. I don't think it could happen. I don't think any publishing group in this country would draw unto itself public criticism to that degree. It would destroy them. They all understand this.

If at a certain point somebody tries to grab up all the papers, the public, the readers, would turn against it. I cannot see a situation where anybody would want to get one hundred per cent of the papers in Canada. To me it is a hypothetical thing.

If it did happen, the Government should step in. But I don't think it could happen. Now what would warrant it, other than Combines, acting against the public interest by controlling advertising rates, or anything—the Combines can act in that area.

They took a very hard look at our operation in Vancouver. We were not part of it then, but when that agency operation was developed there, it was a question of were two companies going to survive out there. They worked out the agency operation. The Combines people took a very hard look at it. They went right through it. And they were entitled to.

And they came to the conclusion that while they did not like it naturally it was a means of preserving two papers out there. And they have the power under the Combines Act to look into that: is it working in the public interest?

But other than that I don't think there is anything I can suggest at the moment that your Committee might feel you should project, or anything else.

Does that answer you?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Senator McElman: There is one section of the brief under testimony, going back to this "permissive" bit, that I think could be misinterpreted by those who might want to misinterpret it.

The Chairman: Section 103?

Senator McElman: Yes.

It is important in that it ties in with a reference to the newspapers, public trust. And I quote it exactly:

"I would add that we must also guard against any trend towards 'permissive' reporting in our permissive society."

You have made it very clear you are referring to the four-letter word type of thing, and so on.

Mr. Malone: That type of thing, yes.

Senator McElman: And the type of thing that Senator Prowse spoke of. But I think the record should be very clear in your interest, sir. You are not here suggesting that the so-called underground newspapers should be held back in any fashion. If society accepts them, so what, let it accept.

Mr. Malone: I would go further. I do not think it is just a question of society accepting it. I think it is a question of the courts accepting it. You get libel, slander. They must answer the law of the land. But nothing beyond that.

If they can put a paper out and take our readers away from us, away they go.

Senator McElman: There is no reference to underground press?

Mr. Malone: Not at all.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Malone. We will adjourn now. We are grateful to you. I would ask if you would be here at two-thirty. We will then resume questioning.

The Committee adjourned.
(Upon resuming at 2:35 p.m.)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, should like to resume the session I think until three thirty. I will put it this way, as long as necessary but no longer than three thirty. We shall continue to deal with F. P. Publications and The Winnipeg Free Press and the hopefully we can turn our attention at three thirty to the Ottawa Journal.

I think, Mr. Malone, that Senator Everett would like to begin the questioning this afternoon.

Senator Everett: Mr. Malone, would you tell me what the authorized and issued capital is of the Sun Publishing Company Limited?

Mr. Malone: I am afraid I can't. I think you have the financial sheet here. Have you got one?

Yes, the authorized share capital is two million, five hundred thousand.

Senator Everett: Common shares?

Mr. Malone: No, shares not capitalized. There are two classes of shares, A shares and B shares. There are 375,000 A shares and 375,000 B shares.

Senator Everett: Authorized or issued?

Mr. Malone: Issued.

Senator Everett: What does F. P. own these?

Mr. Malone: I believe the latest figures are—I have got them right here. As of December 31st, 1969, of the non-voting shares F. P. owned 123,000.

Senator Everett: That would be A shares?

Mr. Malone: That is A shares.

Senator Everett: 123,000 "A"?

Mr. Malone: Yes, and 313,466 "B".

Senator Everett: Who owns the remainder of the A and B shares?

Mr. Malone: They are a scattered group.

Senator Everett: Let us deal with the B shares then.

Mr. Malone: Oh, it is quite a long list.

Senator Everett: I see.

Mr. Malone: There are small bits and pieces. Fred Brown owns a group but there is no significant control holding at all.

Senator Everett: I think we know the newspaper interest of F. P. Publications. Can you tell me what other media interests does F. P. Publications and/or its subsidiaries have?

Mr. Malone: Media, I take it by that that you mean broadcast or something of that nature?

Senator Everett: Suppose I use "media" in the terms that it is used in this Committee which is a pretty wide definition?

Mr. Malone: Yes. The only thing we have of is, we have a holding investment in Selkirk but our shares are non-voting and we have no directorship or anything like that at all. We have no control position whatever, not even a vote.

Then we have—I think it is about twelve per cent—of Victoria Cablevision, twelve and one-half per cent and we are not represented on the Board there and no control position there either, but these are the only two areas of any active company we have.

We have two applications in for—you asked indirect—two applications pending for Cablevision in Regina and Saskatoon, but they have never even been heard so there is nothing there at all.

Senator Everett: That is Central T.V.?

Mr. Malone: The names are Central Cablevision and the other interest in F. P. is nearly all job printing. They are not "media", as you would interpret it.

Senator Everett: Would they be separate companies?

Mr. Malone: In most cases, yes.

Senator Everett: Are there subsidiaries?

Mr. Malone: It forms part of Lethbridge, a small job printing company which forms part of the newspaper. It is a separate company but a subsidiary.

Senator Everett: Of the Lethbridge Herald Company Limited?

Mr. Malone: Yes. I will give you the precise name. No, as I say, it is not a subsidiary. I have got the corporate chart here, if you are interested in it.

In Victoria, for example, we have the Commonwealth Printer, a job printing company up there, which in turn is a subsidiary of the Victoria Press, which is the newspaper division but they are formed as separate companies. In some cases subsidiaries and some directly owned.

Senator Everett: Would you give us a copy of the corporate chart?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: Is there an outfit called CATV Limited in Calgary in which you have an interest?

Mr. Malone: No, we have agreed to go into a syndicate up there but that again is not in operation. They have never got a licence or so on.

No, the only two operating companies are the two I mentioned. One is Victoria Cablevision where we have no position and Selkirk where we hold no position in terms of voting or control. They are the only two operating ones.

Senator Everett: Mr. Malone, you mentioned the predicament of the farm press briefly in your remarks this morning and also in your brief. Since you operate the largest farm newspaper in Canada, would you care to enlarge on that?

Mr. Malone: Yes, I would. I would be glad to. Here is what concerns me. At one time this was a very important segment of the press of Canada and there has been a continuous mortality of these papers. As I say I did not come prepared to deal with this specifically, but rather F.P. and the Free Press, but I have a list here of the papers that have gone down and folded up.

The Canadian Countryman, 174,000 circulation.

The Farmers' Magazine, 100,000 circulation.

National Home Monthly, 317,000 circulation.

Country Gentlemen, Saskatchewan Farmer and Stock Men, 50,000.

Farmers' Advocate, 150,000.

Farmers' Ranch Review, 92,000.

Family Herald Weekly Star, 400,000.

Now, these have all gone down and disappeared for economic reasons.

Also, prior to 1950 the Ottawa Farm Journal went, the Farmer went, the Farm and Dairy went and the Farmer Home went. This is a tremendous mortality. There are really only three national farm papers left. It seems to me this should be a matter of very considerable concern.

Senator Prowse: When did they go out? Can you give us the dates they went out?

Mr. Malone: Yes. The Farmers' Advocate, June, 1965; the Farmers' Ranch Review, May, 1966; the Family Herald, September, 1968. The others were prior to that, back in the nineteen fifties, but there has been a deterioration.

Now then, the matter I am concerned about at the moment is this: we have the largest farm paper and when the Farmers' Advocate and then subsequently the Family Herald and Weekly Star went down, we honoured their subscription list. We took it over and honoured the list and sent out papers so that the subscriber was not deprived of his subscription and so on.

Now, in each case perhaps the leading factor in the economic difficulty was the increase in postal rates and the great inroad on advertising through the broadcasting media; and in both of these instances the government has a very active hand and I think they should have some concern for this. What is their responsibility?

This press served a very, very useful purpose. I doubt if the people here in the room know much about it. These papers are not sold in the cities. You do not see them in the streets. They are almost one hundred per cent mail subscription to these country areas, way up in the northern areas, the agriculture areas, small towns, villages and so on and they have rendered a very great service over the years.

Many areas were not served by daily newspapers and they had up until recently very limited broadcasting facilities and they were very much dependent upon these papers for information and the news and I very quickly, a day or two ago, made a note of some of the columns that were run in these papers that were of direct benefit to the farmer.

"Farming with your pencil"—trying to explain to them how to calculate whether they are operating at a loss or at a profit, your depreciation and so on. It is really a class in arithmetic on farm accounting that is getting more and more important today.

We have "cattle information news", trying to keep them in touch with markets.

"Markets that advance", trying to tell them what the various commodity markets are.

"Weekly hog reports". "Livestock market summaries". "Livestock reports and comments". Various farming texts touching on new developments, new techniques, new inventions or products that are coming out of the market. "Livestock parades"; "veterinary answering column", where they can write in and ask for veterinary services.

We have even a legal column where the farmer removed away out has a simple legal problem—a very big one to him—He can write in and we have lawyers trying to answer him the best we can.

"Query columns" and "health column" and so on.

Now, that is the nature of these paper together with details of scientific developments in agriculture.

This is the type of thing, I do not suppose anybody in this room would even bother reading because it is not to their interest but it is of vital interest to these farmers.

Now, our paper in the last year or two which, as I say, is the largest in Canada, has not been operating at a profit and suddenly we are hit with a half a million dollar increase in the postal rates. Now, what do you do?

We have a responsibility in this thing. We believe in this paper. We are prepared to carry it on. It is not a profitable thing and has the government some responsibility in the area? We feel that they have misjudged the very badly and I have given some comment in the brief and I do hope that you will have a minute to read it.

On the postal rates in an effort to effect economies in the postal department, there have been studies made trying to work out unit cost. They have divided this up with each class of mail carrying its own share or there a subsidy involved or are they operating at a loss but there have been references in the House to a subsidy through postal rates. We have always incidentally been against that. We do not believe we are getting a subsidy and we do not believe we ever have. It is a question of how you play with figures. Everybody has their own statistics, it were. It is a question of how you work these out.

Here is a quick example. The costs divided up into delivered mail—there was handling at the post office. There was sorting, there was rucking, there is bagging, there is delivery and there is the postman delivering at the other end and so on. You divide this up with the number of items of mail and pay their fair share of costs and you assess this in some relationship.

Well now, in the case of a farm paper—and do not think this is appreciated—the post office does not sort our paper. We do all the sorting ourselves at our own expense in our own mailing room. We put them in postal bags with the correct postal labels on and the papers never to to the post office. They do not go in postal trucks. They go in our trucks and any times at overtime rates. They are put right on to a freight car, but now we are being charged on a postal rate for the handling, sorting and delivery which I feel is completely unfair.

Now, you get to the other end. It goes on a freight car...

Senator Everett: Excuse me. Have you seen the figures on which the Department based the figures of having assessed against...

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: You have seen those figures?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: Have you figures to count the post office figures?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: Would you file them with the Committee?

Mr. Malone: You are pushing us as to what access to those figures was. Yes, I think I can provide figures for you.

Again, you get to the delivery end of the paper. The farm paper is not delivered by a postman going down the street. They don't do that. The farmer goes into the post office and picks them up, but again the farm paper is being charged a proportion of post delivery which is not in fact existing; but all of these things have been worked out on a unit cost and to me it is very unfair.

In many cases, as I say, the increase suddenly administered by the government amounted in some cases to two hundred per cent up to four hundred per cent and that is a very big factor in the production of these papers, a very big part of your costs.

I would like to think that the Committee here would exercise themselves about it and begin to get some figures. I will give you whatever figures we have got, but you would have to get figures from the post office itself. I have figures which have been given to me in some degree of confidence which were supposed to be the post office figures. I will let you have them, but I will check them out first.

We know what the actual cost is in our own case. We know there is at present a bulletin up in the post office department trying to show what they are charging, how they arrive at it. As a matter of fact I think your Committee would have to go into it. We have not got the access to all that information.

Senator Everett: But you can give whatever information you have?

Mr. Malone: Yes. I do think it is important.

Senator Everett: Did you suffer much in the way of subscription cancellations in the Free Press Prairie Farmer?

Mr. Malone: Yes. They are not getting cancellations. A man has a paper and he has paid for it at the end of the year. He just simply doesn't renew. He doesn't write in and say, "Cancel". He just does not renew it and to me because you have a paper operating at a break even position and you are trying to cover half a million dollars, trying to get your rates up, at that point, he does not renew.

Senator Everett: But you have not suffered?

Mr. Malone: Oh yes. The circulation has gone down.

Senator Everett: Markedly?

Mr. Malone: Oh yes. Well, here is a study when we took on the Farmers' Advocate and honoured their subscriptions. Putting the two of them together we ended up with a circulation of four hundred and seventy-seven thousand. That dropped down to four hundred and eighteen thousand, so...

Senator Everett: Wait a minute. You just bought the subscription list of the Farmers' Advocate?

Mr. Malone: That is right.

Senator Everett: You would expect many people would not renew just because of the change?

Mr. Malone: Not necessarily. There would be some duplication, of course, but our actual subscription list has dropped, quite apart from any duplication. It is down below what you might normally expect.

Senator Everett: Was it dropping before the postal rate increase?

Mr. Malone: Both before and afterwards and in point of fact, we are not pressing it as hard because we are losing money on every piece of paper we put out through the post office so it is a relation we have. It is an advantage almost.

We are maintaining circulation to command whatever advertising we can but we are not pushing our circulation. Instead of sending out three or four renewal notices, we are sending out one and either they renew or we cannot afford to push it anymore.

Senator Everett: You conclude that the farm press is important?

Mr. Malone: I do.

Senator Everett: And should be maintained?

Mr. Malone: Yes, very much so.

Senator Everett: Well, what point are you making: that the government is overcharging for its service?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: Or that the government should undercharge for its service?

Mr. Malone: No, no.

Senator Everett: Or that the government should go further and subsidize the farm press and maintain it?

Mr. Malone: No, no, they are overcharging us and I think very seriously. Everybody agrees we must maintain postal service in Canada. There must be a post office here and so on. Now, you are going to have that basic service there regardless, for your first-class mail and so on.

Now then, any out-of-pocket expense to handle second class mail and to take care of farm papers I think the paper should pay, but they are not doing that. What they are doing is dividing the over-all cost of the postal service and charging a great chunk of that to the farm press for services we do not receive at all. They do not sort out papers. They do not bag them...

Senator Everett: That is your own complaint?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And they are not going to give it?

Mr. Malone: Pardon?

Senator Prowse: They are not going to give it?

Mr. Malone: I don't know.

Senator Prowse: They are going to have the same expense whether you put a paper out or not?

Mr. Malone: Yes, that is the point.

Senator Everett: If the government were to lower its postal rate to the figure you say, fair...

Mr. Malone: Yes?

Senator Everett: Would that save the farm publications?

Mr. Malone: I think it would have quite an effect and not only the farm press. There are many other papers have been in the same position, quite apart from the farm press. They have simply had to fold up. They cannot meet their payments.

You see, unlike the daily newspapers there are one hundred per cent dependent on the service so the government has got you by the neck on this thing. They control everything whether they put you out of business or not. I think they are being far too excessive in their charges here.

Senator Everett: I wonder if we could move on to another subject.

Senator Beaubien: Could I ask a question here? Have you put up your rates, Mr. Malone?

Mr. Malone: Yes. We are putting them up gradually. We went up fifty cents a year. I think a few months...

Senator Beaubien: From what?

Mr. Malone: We are now at $3.00 a year. It is a weekly paper.

Senator Beaubien: From $2.50?

Mr. Malone: Yes. And I think the increase pending now will go to $3.50. We are sending it up about fifty cents.

Senator Prowse: That is not a very big increase.

Mr. Malone: No, it is not. If you pay a postal increase of four hundred per cent, we cannot increase our subscription rates four hundred per cent.

The Chairman: Are you increasing your advertising rates?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

The Chairman: At about the same ratio?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: What is your circulation?

Mr. Malone: The circulation is just under half a million, four hundred and ninety thousand. We were up about six hundred thousand, that was the figure you asked, Senator Perrett. It was running up close to six hundred thousand. We have gone down to four hundred and eighty thousand.

Senator McElman: And these additional costs, about half a million, would represent a dollar per subscriber?

Mr. Malone: Yes, about.

Senator McElman: Added on top of the $500 now?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: So this would be about thirty-three and a third per cent increase?

Mr. Malone: Yes, not of the postal rates or what they used to be.

Senator McElman: No, I am talking about the relationship to your subscription rates.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: A dollar on top of the $500?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: A dollar on $2.50?

Senator McElman: So the four hundred per cent relationship does not come out in relation to the other, of course?

Mr. Malone: No, only in relationship to the previous postal rate. Ours has increased three hundred and eighty per cent. I think that is the closest figure.

21425-41

Senator McElman: How many issues do they have a year?

Mr. Malone: Fifty-two.

Senator McElman: Two cents a copy?

Mr. Malone: Yes. You multiply that out. It is a big round sum.

Senator McElman: Yes. I am trying to relate it to the additional costs per copy. If you expect this is going to cut your circulation very appreciably, then would it be proper to suggest that the farmers do not put the same weight on the calibre of the service you are giving that you do?

Mr. Malone: That could be an interpretation too. There is a greater demand for their time also in the broadcast industry and I think you have discussed previously in your Committee here—there is a difference between the broadcast media and the newspaper in terms of the record and you want figures about marketing. You cannot flash these on the screen and give the same service.

If I may digress for just a minute here. In the earlier days the government recognized the importance of the public being informed and getting the news out to distant areas of this country; their theory was that they should make a second class rate, the lowest rate possible that carried its own weight. It should not be loaded with any additional costs. That prevailed and was well recognized in the national interest to get news and keep our people informed.

You had settlements in the earlier days in the West that were new Canadians knowing nothing about Ottawa or knowing nothing about their provincial government, their own marketing conditions or anything else.

There was not government news services as there are now with increased use of bulletins and that sort of thing. That principle seemingly has been abandoned completely and they say you must be loaded with some part of our costs the same as the first-class mail.

We are not asking for a subsidy here. All we are saying is that we will pay any out-of-pocket expenses. If the government will argue this is a subsidy—all right, who has it been subsidizing? Has it been subsidizing the farmer who gets that paper or is it subsidizing the paper—I don't know; but I contend that the original principle was right and now it has been abandoned, and the penalty is you will have no farm press in Canada. I would like to hope you would give some thought to that.

Senator McElman: I am not trying to downgrade your paper.

Mr. Malone: No.

Senator McElman: I was brought up on the Family Herald.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: And I really miss it very greatly. Let us try to relate it in another fashion.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, are you finished?

Senator McElman: No. I am still on the same subject, if I may, these costs.

The Chairman: Fine. All right.

Senator McElman: The price charged for your newspaper, not the farm paper, how much has it appreciated, well, let us say, since the War?

Mr. Malone: The increase in newsprint costs?

Senator McElman: No, subscription rate.

Mr. Malone: The mail rates or subscription rates of the daily paper have all gone up. We have all lost subscriptions over it. I cannot tell you at the moment exactly what the increases were. I can find out. It is no trick. We publish them.

Senator McElman: These increases have been related to your costs?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: But up to this point, not related to postal rate costs increases?

Mr. Malone: Oh, yes. If you have an increase in your postal rates, we have to go up too.

Senator McElman: I say up to this point, these, what you consider to be major increases to your subscribers, have been largely due to other cost increases—newsprint, labour, wages and so on?

Mr. Malone: I will put it this way. The postal increases have become quite an increasing problem themselves. They were not the only factor, but they are an increasing factor.

Senator McElman: What I am trying to get at is: the increase of subscription rate to your subscribers up to the point of the current major increase in postal rates...

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: This has been more related to other costs, has it not?

Mr. Malone: That is right. Newsprint increases and cost production; but now with the increases in postal rates, the effect is on our mail subscribers, not the country dealer.

With a daily paper, some go to the town some go to the news dealer, some go to the boy in the street. Some people receive it by mail. They are people that have been affected. We have had to put their costs up.

Senator McElman: You believe there should be no subscriber resistance to a rate increase for a subscription which results from newsprint costs, but there should be a resistance to a subscription rate increase which results from an increase in postal rates, which reflects an increase in Government costs in putting mail to the citizen?

Mr. Malone: The subscriber will resist an increase. He doesn't really understand where it is from.

Senator McElman: No, I am not saying what he resists, but what you believe he should resist.

Mr. Malone: I am afraid I don't really know what you are getting at here.

The Chairman: Put the question again Senator McElman, please?

Senator McElman: Do you believe yourself that the subscribers should have a great resistance to an increased subscription rate which results from postal rate increases, turn reflecting increased costs to government? Should he have greater resistance to that than he should have to your increases in subscription rates, which reflects newsprint cost, labour costs and the whole ball of wax that you have?

Mr. Malone: I think the answer to that is do not think the subscriber differentiates that extent. If we have to increase our rates there, we say, "We are sorry. We are going to have to increase fifty cents or a dollar", and we can then try to explain to him why. The costs have gone up. Newsprint has gone up and where it is a case of the postal rate going up, we say that, but I do not detect any difference in his mind. I do not think he differentiates. He does not blame the postal department or the newsprint company or anything like that. He receives the increase and he reflects that when he does not renew his paper.

Senator McElman: That deals with the subscriber. Now, as the publisher, do you believe there should be a greater resistance to a postal rate increase, reflecting increased cost of government than there should be to an increase in your subscription rate reflecting a newsprint cost and other related things?

Mr. Malone: Yes, sir. Where it is iniquitous, I think this is not an equitable increase in the postal rate. That is why I should say there would be resistance to it. It is not an equitable increase that we are getting, at all.

Senator Prowse: I think you are talking about two different things.

Senator McElman: Let us just forget whether it is equitable or not for the moment.

Mr. Malone: You are asking me: should we resist an increase due to postal rates or due to newsprint cost. Now, in my view we would resist a postal increase because we feel it is iniquitous. We feel it is far too large and cannot be justified.

Senator McElman: I am having a hard time to get you to understand.

Mr. Malone: Yes. I am trying to answer you but I am afraid I do not understand.

Senator McElman: Forget anything that may be inequitable at the moment.

Mr. Malone: All right.

Senator McElman: Let us say that the government costs have gone up.

Mr. Malone: Are you talking about the postal department now?

Senator McElman: Yes, and surely the costs in everything have gone up.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator McElman: The postal department pays wages too and we have been quite aware of that during the strike and threatened strike in the last short while.

So, government costs, I think we can assume, have gone up in the post office department and they increased the rate. This has caused you to either absorb the cost or pass it on to your subscriber through increased subscription rates. Now, that is one apple. The other apple is your newsprint costs go up, your wage and salary costs go up, your equipment costs go up and so on. You have a subscription rate increase on that basis. Are they apples and oranges or are they apples?

Mr. Malone: I think that if you are asking: will we resist a government increase simply because it is a government increase, no. We treat them both the same.

The only difference in this is that we feel in the postal thing that this particular increase is out of proportion and not warranted.

Say your postal rates have gone up due to an eight per cent increase in salaries in the postal department. This is understandable and I do not object to that, but this was a four hundred per cent increase.

Senator McElman: Your first sentence gave me the answer on apples. Then we get back into apples and oranges again.

Mr. Malone: We are not resisting simply because it is a government increase.

The Chairman: As delighted as I am to be in this fruit market, I prefer to get back to Senator Everett again.

Senator Prowse: May I ask one question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: As I gather, your objection to the postal increase is that that rate gives them an income in excess of any increased costs they have had? Is that not it basically?

Mr. Malone: That is right, and we feel it is unwarranted.

Senator Prowse: You say their bookkeeping has been bad on that?

Mr. Malone: That is right.

Senator Prowse: And that is our basis?

Mr. Malone: Yes, that is it.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Going on from there, Mr. Malone, to the Winnipeg Free Press. Could you tell me what rate you charge on the average for retail advertising?

Mr. Malone: On an average—I do not know that we can give an average. I have the rate card here. I do not think we have ever averaged it out.

Senator Everett: Let us take an advertiser who buys say twenty-five thousand lines per year.

Mr. Malone: Here you are. This is on contract. I can give you it right down, if you want. For one thousand lines it is forty cents per line; twenty-five hundred lines—thirty-nine cents per line; a five thousand line contract—thirty-eight cents; a seven thousand, five hundred line contract—thirty-seven cents; and a ten thousand line contract—thirty-six and a half cents.

Senator Everett: Does it go on from there?

Mr. Malone: No. Those are our published rates under the contract. In cases of...

Senator Everett: Ten thousand lines is what?

Mr. Malone: That is our highest public contract.

Senator Everett: That is...

Mr. Malone: Thirty-six and a half cents.

Senator Everett: It goes on from there?

Mr. Malone: In the case of a very large say department store, they are using millions of lines. These are normal things. You negotiate each of these. They are jointly negotiated at the end of each year for a year's term. These are not normal advertising, put out in your rate card, where you are dealing with two or three customers only. In that category, they are negotiated contracts each year, depending on what volume they are going to use.

Whether they are going to use a million or two million lines, you are dealing in very big figures here.

Senator Everett: I am taking this point from looking at some information that we have, not referring specifically and dealing with the Winnipeg Free Press, but to all newspapers. The department stores in this country which, I guess, are just three or four stores and maybe a few more...

Mr. Malone: Yes, not many of them.

Senator Everett: Very few of them.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: ...are getting a large subsidy from the newspapers at the cost of the other advertisers; that is the national advertisers and the local advertisers, and also at the cost of the person who buys the paper.

Mr. Malone: No, I wouldn't think that. I don't want to correct you—that is a thing that is often said but I would say—and I know the details in many of our papers here—that this is a profitable thing. We do not give advertising away to the bigger department stores or anybody else. It pays its way and there is profit in it.

Senator Everett: I wonder if it would be a help to the publishers saying Eaton's are paying for advertising in all your newspapers?

Mr. Malone: Well, it might, but they are profitable. Believe me, we do not give advertising away to anybody for nothing so it is a profitable operation.

Senator Everett: I am thinking more specifically than the Free Press because I cannot find those figures here. I have figured here but they are not ones that could really tell the story. I am thinking specifically...

Mr. Malone: These rates are not published as a rule.

Senator Everett: There seems to have been a great deal of difference between local advertising rates and those of a department store's advertising rate to the point it would appear the department stores are enjoying a tremendous advantage.

Mr. Malone: No, they are not. Certainly not in our papers. I cannot speak for the other papers because I really do not know the rates. There are great volume discounts that you get. When you have a million or two million lines there is a very, very substantial discount. I can say this in the case of our papers where I know the rate—that in some cases is the advertising given away below cost or where we are not making some money out of it.

I cannot speak for other papers.

Senator Everett: But you do not publish that rate? In the case of most of your advertising you publish the rate?

Mr. Malone: We do not publish their rates. We publish a scale of rates. If you happen to know what the advertiser is using, if he is using ten thousand lines you can tell what is ate is. We do not publish individual advertisers' rates.

Senator Everett: Once he gets over ten thousand you negotiate that?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: Is that true of all your papers?

Mr. Malone: They negotiate a year's contract with them. They approach them and say now, "What do you think you are going to use the next year?" They say, "We will use one million or one and a half or two million next year", and then they negotiate the rate; and if your normal rate structure has come up, we put their rate structure up too proportionately.

I may say the department store may say, "We want a special type of promotion. We want to bring out a "during the summer thing". They will try to negotiate a special rate. It is very competitive, but I can assure you in our own paper—and they are the only ones I know the rates of in that category—that we are not subsidizing anybody. The readers are not subsidizing nor are the other advertisers. This is profitable.

As I say, I cannot speak for the other papers. I simply do not know the rates. Does that answer your question?

Senator Everett: Yes. I think that answers the question. I would like to deal for a moment with the position of Pacific Press in the Vancouver market as it affects advertising. Could you tell me on an average line what you get, what rate is charged by the Vancouver Sun and what rate is charged by the Vancouver Province and what the combined rate is?

Mr. Malone: Yes. They both publish their rate cards. I have it right here. They publish their rate cards both in combination and separately. The Sun and Province combination rate—this is a general advertising rate—is $1.40 a line.

Senator Everett: Is that together?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: That is on what lineage?

Mr. Malone: That is your flat rate with no contract. Now, there are contract rates not listed here. This is out of Standard Rate and Data but they both publish rate cards. I mean,

I will send them down to you. I do not happen to have them here. They were not called for and I did not bring them, but they publish rate cards.

Senator Everett: Let us take the individual. That is a dual rate.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: What is the individual rate?

Mr. Malone: As I say, I have not got the rate cards here.

Senator Everett: You cannot tell me that?

Mr. Malone: No, but they both publish rate cards and they publish them...

The Chairman: The flat rate would be for each paper, would it not?

Mr. Malone: No, I don't think so.

The Chairman: It is just a combined rate. That is all they have there.

Mr. Malone: Yes. That is what I was looking for. They are not here.

The Chairman: Perhaps Mr. Keate could tell us the single rates.

Mr. Malone: Can you talk from your memory on that, Mr. Keate?

Mr. Keate: I am sorry. I have not got it with me.

Mr. Malone: I will mail both rate cards to you. I am sorry we haven't got that. I did not know you were particularly interested in this. They were not called for so I have not got them with me.

Senator Everett: Would you happen to know what the rough difference is between advertising in the two papers individually and advertising in the papers jointly?

Mr. Malone: No. There is a discount.

Senator Everett: I wonder if Mr. Keate would know that.

Mr. Malone: I don't think Mr. Keate would know.

Mr. Keate: No.

Mr. Malone: I think what you are getting here is: we have a rate for one paper and a rate for the other. We may say, "Here is a savings to you to go in both papers." We are giving them an attractive rate to try and get them into both papers and the reason is very simple. You only have to set the ad once.

Senator Everett: You say you only have to set the ad once. Do you as a newspaper buy plates from another newspaper at no cost to the advertiser?

Mr. Malone: No, I wish that was the case. That was the thing I was touching on.

Senator Everett: At no cost to the advertiser, I say?

Mr. Malone: Well, that may be, but they are a very costly thing to the paper.

Senator Everett: It may be costly to the paper, but they are paying for the service?

Mr. Malone: That is right, but if we only have to set the advertising once and it is going in jointly, there is a savings to us and we can pass that on with a discount in the combined rate, which we do, to the advertiser.

You see, if an advertisement comes in from a local store in Vancouver, now, it is only going to go into one paper and it costs us so much to set it and proof it and read it and correct it and so on. Now, you charge your rate for that; but if you say we are going to put it together in the other paper, we do not have to re-set the stuff over again and proof it and so on so we can use the same type so there is a savings of costs and we pass this on to the advertiser in substantial discounts.

I do not know whether it runs, about twenty per cent or in that order. I do not want to go on record. I have not got the figures with me.

Senator Everett: The only reason I am sort of askance is that I know of no newspaper that gives an advertiser a discount for providing his own mats. If it is such an advantage to a newspaper, I would have thought they would have passed something on to the advertiser.

Mr. Malone: No, in the case of national advertising a mat comes and we do not have to set it. We cast it. Now, in the case of local advertising where they may supply part of a mat and a signature and so on, under the union regulation, we must set that and it is a costly business. It is hand set.

Let us say you take a local advertiser out of a nearby town who will say run that ad.

We cannot go over and get the mats from that other paper and just cast it up. We have got to set it ourselves. I know it is very wasteful and uneconomic, but we have to do it.

Senator Everett: In the case of a couple Mr. Irving's papers, which operate in the same town, the lift rate was nine cents?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: An agate line.

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: It would seem to be reasonable to effect cost of saving between the two?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: In other words, you could advertise in one or the other?

Mr. Malone: That is right.

Senator Everett: The combined rate that was nine cents, less the sum of the two individual rates and surely somebody knows what the...

Mr. Malone: There is no mystery about it. I am sorry I have not got the figures here, but there is a substantial discount, I think, perhaps it would be in the vicinity of twenty per cent, which is given to that advertiser going in both papers reflecting the savings we have obtained by putting it in both papers and not having to set it twice.

The Chairman: May I just ask you a point, following on Senator Everett's question. You were examining the Canadian Advertising Rates and Data of January, 1970, which I think it is fair to say, is a standard volume used by advertising agencies in purchasing space.

Am I to understand from your—I agree— cursory study of that rate card that it does not contain the rate for an advertiser who wishes to use only the Sun or only the Province?

Mr. Malone: No. Separate rates are made request.

The Chairman: In other words, if I am an advertiser and I want to use the Sun only, I have to make a special request?

Mr. Malone: No. It is available to all agencies. We mail out the rate cards to all agencies. They all have them. This particular magazine has not got it.

The Chairman: Does the rate card of Pacific Press indicate the price of an advertisement in the Sun as distinct from the Province?

Mr. Malone: On the rate card, yes, as far as know. I would have to get one and look at it.

The Chairman: Can you get one of those on file? Do we not have one on file? Perhaps we can get it later this afternoon?

Mr. Malone: If not, I will send you one.

Mr. Keate: I have sent to the Ottawa Journal for one.

The Chairman: Thank you so much. Do you want to carry on, Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Perhaps I could defer questioning until that rate card comes?

The Chairman: Yes, because I have some questions and Senator Everett has some. Perhaps we can return.

We will return to Senator Everett. In the meantime I think Senator Sparrow had some questions?

Senator Sparrow: No.

The Chairman: I am sorry. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: While we are talking about the Pacific Press Company, Mr. Malone, when you purchased the Cromie interest in the Pacific Press, did you first approach the Southam people?

Mr. Malone: No. I think it actually came to them as a surprise.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to ask you whether or not the fact that Southam owned the other newspaper in Vancouver was instrumental in your decision to go in?

Mr. Malone: No, no, not at all. We were interested in Vancouver. As a matter of fact many years ago we made an offer to buy it then—I think about ten years previously—we made an attempt to buy that paper. At that time the Pacific Press did not even exist.

Mr. Fortier: The Members of the Committee, I think, would be very interested in hearing in detail how this Pacific Press agency agreement, which is the only one of its kind in Canada, operates?

Maybe I can ask you a series of questions. For example, how do you assess the charges as between the two newspapers?

Mr. Malone: A formula. You can break down some departments very accurately. Let us say the stereo department. We have to have certain types of equipment up there which must turn out so many plates representing pages. They turned out so many plates in a twenty-four hour period for the Province, and so many plates for the Sun. You equate them and say, "All right, what was the total production of that department. Here is the ratio."

Mr. Fortier: Pro rated?

Mr. Malone: So you can arrive at a pretty accurate formula there.

Senator Everett: May I interrupt here? Does not Pacific Press own the assets of the two papers?

Mr. Malone: Yes, that is correct.

Senator Everett: So what would be the reason for them breaking it down between each other?

Mr. Malone: There is simply bookkeeping. We want to know how the papers are going. They pool their profits and losses, but you must know how the paper is doing. "Is it profitable or unprofitable?" They each produce separate balance sheets. We get an accounting at the end of each month of how the Sun operation is going. You see, some departments are not common ..

Senator Everett: That operation then is really a form of branch accounting for Pacific Press?

Mr. Malone: That is right.

Senator Everett: They do their own cost accounting; the Province Publishing Company and the Sun Publishing?

Mr. Malone: You see, some departments are not common. They each have separate advertising departments, separate editorial departments and separate circulation departments.

Senator Everett: But they are all owned by Pacific Press?

Mr. Malone: Yes, that is right. Now, then, for example, we have no say on the circulation cost of the Province, but we are responsible for the circulation cost of the Vancouver Sun.

Senator Everett: When you say, "we", about whom are you talking?

Mr. Malone: The Sun Publishing Company. It is a separate company in which we are the principal owners.

Senator Everett: Yes, I appreciate that.

Mr. Malone: We have a directors' meeting every month or so. They bring in the operating costs. We go over them very carefully. We check them each month. We see each month's statement come in. We see if the circulation costs have gone up or if newsprint costs have gone up. It is broken right down in detail.

Now, in the common department, the mechanical department, we try to assess those pretty accurately against one another as to what the actual requirement was.

Senator Everett: Is the entire entity known as the Sun?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: Is it operated entirely by Pacific Press or does the Sun Publishing Company have some conduct of the operations?

Mr. Malone: Now, if we put it this way. Here is the Pacific Press which owns both papers. Now, then, the persons who publish the papers are two distinct entities. One is the Southam Corporation and the other is the Sun Publishing Company. They both publish the paper for Pacific Press.

It is complicated I know, but have I made myself clear?

Senator Everett: In the over-all management . .

Mr. Malone: Yes, in the directing of policy and principle and circulation.

Senator Everett: In many terms it is purely Pacific Press?

Mr. Malone: That is right. Now, then, we have no say whatever as to expenses in terms of circulation, advertising and so on of the Province. They have no say in our operation in what we do.

We do have a joint say in the mechanical production and we have a joint board. We have one half of the directors and Southam have half of the directors and we meet and we deal with the mechanical problems.

We see if our operating costs are going or newsprint is going up. That is the way we deal with this.

Senator Everett: Would a reporter on the Sun work for Pacific Press?

Mr. Malone: No. In theory he works for . .

Senator Everett: He works for the Vancouver Sun?

Mr. Malone: Yes. They hire him and so on. He may be paid by Pacific Press, accounting wise.

Senator Everett: I am saying he works for the Sun?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: And the Sun is owned by Pacific Press?

Mr. Malone: Yes, that is right. I would like to be clear . .

Let us say if we hire a reporter at the Vancouver Sun, Pacific Press as such has no say in it. It is entirely up to the Sun. They hire that reporter. They may discharge him or may direct his work. They have full control over that. There is no central control of Pacific Press of the functions of the editorial, advertising or circulation.

Mr. Keate is here. He is directly responsible for those three functions, circulation, advertising and editorial.

Senator Everett: But the payments for those functions comes from Pacific Press?

Mr. Malone: Yes. There is one accounting department. They issue the pay cheques.

Senator Everett: I think I understand.

Mr. Malone: It is complicated. It took me a little while to get it through my head too. It is a curious structure, an agency operation.

Mr. Fortier: Pacific Press signs the pay cheques for the reporter?

Mr. Malone: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Then it is charged back to either the Sun Publishing Company or Southam. Is that correct?

Mr. Malone: When you say, "it is charged back to", it shows on the break-down of the expenses of the Sun and the expenses of the Province. There is one central bookkeeping organization.

Mr. Fortier: Pacific Press?

Mr. Malone: They take in all the money which goes to all the costs and expenses. They balance it up. It is the operating financial institution.

Mr. Fortier: In very simple layman's terms, is it possible that Southam would pay a share for a portion of a reporter's pay who works for F. P.

Mr. Malone: In theory this would be right, yes. The same way we do too.

Mr. Fortier: Vice versa?

Mr. Malone: Yes, because again in the final analysis the profits and losses are shared equally between the two people who own Pacific Press.

If one paper has a loss, it is divided equally among them. If they have a profit, it is shared equally among the two owners, but no one paper has control over both the circulation or both advertising or both editorial departments. There is considerable jealousy, I might say.

We have some very interesting directors' meetings. It is not simply central control and we all go along. They fight for their positions very hard.

Mr. Fortier: If in any given year the Province had a very serious loss—let us not say in any given year—let us say a period of three years the Province had a very serious loss, which was subsidized in part by the Sun...

Mr. Malone: Yes?

Mr. Fortier: What would you do?

Mr. Malone: It is a very difficult situation. All we can do is this: express our views.

Mr. Fortier: That is a distinct possibility.

Mr. Malone: Yes, quite right. All we can do is express our views at the joint board meeting of Pacific Press in which we have fifty per cent of the representation, but we cannot control it.

It is beyond our control as far as the Sun Publishing Company is concerned or F. P. is concerned.

Mr. Fortier: Would you envisage the day when eventually you will say, "To heck with the agency agreement. I am going to go my way and you go your way."?

Mr. Malone: No. I do not know how that can ever be done out there. All you can do is try to make your voice heard a bit.

Mr. Fortier: It is not a case that ...

Mr. Malone: You could sell it, I suppose, or just walk out of the thing.

Mr. Fortier: Is it not a fact in order to prevent such a situation arising, the two newspapers are helping one another to maintain a steady position?

Mr. Malone: Yes, I think that is quite true. With Vancouver when the arrangement was first made—this arrangement was responsible for keeping two newspapers going in Vancouver and without it I think it would have been down to one, which would have been a tragedy.

Mr. Fortier: And it is still so today?

Mr. Malone: That is right. A third paper started up and made a good effort at it and they were not able to survive.

I think Mr. Balfour would confirm that. He will be talking to you later in the week. He will confirm the same things I was telling you.

It is not a usual arrangement. We feel that we know how to run a paper and we would like to run it our own way, but we only have half a voice. There are difficulties in it, but in the circumstances I think still that it is perhaps the best arrangement for Vancouver.

I cannot see any improvement in the situation at the moment.

The Chairman: Why would it be down to one paper without that arrangement?

Mr. Malone: Well, they could not survive.

The Chairman: Look at the situation in Calgary where two newspapers are able to survive and look at the situation in Winnipeg where two newspapers are able to survive so why not in Vancouver, which is a much bigger city than either of those?

Mr. Malone: Well, when the arrangement was made up originally, I think it is quite obvious that the Province was in a position where it could not have continued without this agency operation. Whether you could split them up today and make them both buyable, I doubt it.

Senator Everett: You say you take off individual statements for each of the operations?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: I know this is a branch statement but is the Province losing money now?

Mr. Malone: As I say, it is not in a profitable position. I do not want to engage in doubletalk. It is not our paper. Does that answer your question?

Senator Everett: No.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Balfour is here. He is responsible.

The Chairman: Mr. Balfour will be here next Tuesday.

Senator Everett: I would enjoy having Mr. Balfour up there too because I think it is a most interesting situation. That is why my questions about the rate card and the lift rate.

Mr. Malone: Fine. I will see that you get it.

Senator Everett: You are saying that Vancouver would otherwise lose one paper, which would be the Province morning paper?

Mr. Malone: According to the present situation there, yes. That is quite correct.

Senator Everett: I am just wondering whether the Vancouver advertisers at any rate are paying an inordinately high price in order to maintain the Province?

Mr. Malone: No, I don't think so. I think your comparison there is...

Senator Everett: I think you will agree this Committee should look into that?

Mr. Malone: Yes.

Senator Everett: To see if that is the case because this is a most unusual arrangement.

Mr. Malone: Absolutely. I think the comparison on rates with other centres gives you a proper perspective of it. They are not out of line with say what other cities of that size are paying for advertising having that many thousand circulation.

The rate is not discriminatory. Through joint publication in the Province it is possible to keep two papers going out there.

Senator Everett: I agree that the rate of the Sun is not discriminatory. I am just wondering whether the rate of the Province is.

Mr. Malone: The combined rate here is as gave your earlier. On the joint rate, the mill line rate of both papers out there, which available to the advertiser in Vancouver, $3.85. Well, now, Victoria, a much smaller town, is $5.37. The Winnipeg Tribune, $4.90 so it is not a high cost picture.

Senator Everett: What is the mill line rate of the Province?

Mr. Malone: As I say, I have not got the Province figures here. I did not know you would want to ask for them separately. I will mail them to you.

Senator Everett: May I say I am not concerned about the Sun?

Mr. Malone: I understand your position.

Senator Everett: It is whether you own the Sun are giving Southam a lift?

Mr. Malone: Well, frankly, yes, I think you are. Is that your answer?

Senator Everett: How long are you prepared to give them a lift?

Mr. Malone: No. Southam have a heavy interest in Pacific Press and through that arrangement it is possible for the Province to keep on going and supply that second paper out there.

The Chairman: May I suggest we perhaps terminate this discussion until the rate card arrives, which, I understand, will not be too long from now.

I think it being three thirty that we should now adjourn to the discussion with the Ottawa Journal.

Does anyone have any other questions for Mr. Malone? He is going to be here. If there are any other questions for Mr. Malone at the moment, I am prepared to entertain them.

Mr. Fortier: I have one more.

The Chairman: Yes, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: In your verbal presentation this morning, Mr. Malone, in speaking of the resources of the F. P. group and speaking of correspondents in various parts of the globe, you referred to F. P. having a correspondent in China.

Now, our research has indicated that your man in China was really the Globe and Mail's man and that is the way the Globe and Mail advertises.

Mr. Malone: Yes, it is a F. P. man. He writes primarily for the Globe and Mail. We have access to him.

Mr. Fortier: Is he a group employee?

Mr. Malone: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Fortier: Is he a group employee?

Mr. Malone: No, no. He is paid by the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Fortier: By the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Malone: Yes. We use his copy from time to time. We had some very good pictures through all our chain. I mean it is available and the other papers have access to Asian correspondents of their own.

Fred Sparks of the Globe and Mail can separate from the Globe and Mail and separate men.

Senator Prowse: Who do you pay for the staff, the Globe and Mail or him?

Mr. Malone: It varies. The other papers do not pay as such for him. The Globe and Mail pays his salary. They have the stories and use them. The other papers do not have to pay him for it.

For example, the Lethbridge Herald got it for free.

Senator Prowse: They got it for free?

Mr. Malone: That is an advantage to the Lethbridge Herald.

The Chairman: I do not want to terminate this discussion, but I would like Mr. Smith to come forward. Mr. Malone you can sit here or you can move over.

Mr. Malone: I will move over here.

Submission of the Ottawa Journal, Mr. Norman Smith, President and Editor, Mr. W. H. Metcalfe, Managing Editor and Mr. Lucien Lalonde, Vice-President, General Manager and Secretary-Treasurer.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, these are the representatives of the Ottawa Journal.

Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Norman Smith, President and Editor of the Ottawa Journal. On my immediate left is Mr. Bill Metcalfe, Managing Editor. On Mr. Smith's right is Lucien Lalonde, Vice-President, General Manager and Secretary-Treasurer.

We have received your written brief, Mr. Smith. It has been read and studied by the Senators. I know you have been here for several of these hearings so I will not repeat all the things I usually say at this time.

Please proceed with your statement.

Norman Smith, President and Editor of the Ottawa Journal: I will not take more than about five or six minutes in what is called the voluntary statement at the opening, but I would like to explain about the brief and why it touches rather personally on the history of the Journal.

Your circulated questions make clear your concern that nearly half of Canada's papers are group owned. I share that concern, but in reply to your request that I put in a brief, I have reviewed our experience to show that perhaps in many cases the individual owner may have faced the immediate or eventual choice—not of remaining independent or joining a group—but of joining a group or going out of business.

I recall also in 1967 the Journal was a public company. A very thin majority of its shares was held by a group of its officers and employees, including Senator O'Leary and myself, but most of those shares were held on a good deal of money borrowed from the bank. The Journal had to make good profits to enable us to pay the bank interest, let alone something on the principal. And our control, if you would excuse the term, of the company, was slender.

We were also faced with the problem of how we would buy other shares as some of our group died or felt they had to sell. Many of them were men of very little means. None was a man of any real means. If the revenue were to have seriously fallen off, we would have found ourselves and the newspaper in a precarious position. Any cutting in quality to save expense would aid our competitor, the Ottawa Citizen, a well-off Southam paper, not likely to impair its quality to ease our embarrassment.

Our decision to sell was a difficult one, a sad one. I do not say that the sale was an economic necessity. It was certainly an economic precaution. Great resources and great reserves are needed to preserve a newspaper's independence and standards against a newspaper who has great resources and reserves.

Now, your Committee has asked whether a group paper retains control of its editorial policies. In my brief I have stated the guarantee of that which was in the agreement of sale. Its key sentence was that the then Mr. O'Leary and myself and now I quote:

"will have exclusive control and direction of the Journal's editorial course and its news columns will be maintained in their tradition of accuracy and fairness".

Upon Mr. O'Leary's eventual retirement, which we hope will not occur for some years, the control and direction of the Journal's editorial policy will pass to Norman Smith, as the paper's Editor in Chief. That pledge has been carried out.

The Committee has asked other questions about groups or multiple ownership. Will they grow, you ask? With regret I expect so. I do not see how your Committee can or should recommend the breaking up of existing groups, but if a reasonable and democratic way of checking their growth can be devised, I suspect parliament and people would like to consider it, but it will be a very complicated thing to work out.

You ask, "Are groups socially desirable?". Well, we all live every day amid things we wish were different. Ideally the country should have one hundred good newspapers under one hundred different publishers and editors, all of them economically equal without subsidy to serve their community and country.

But the question remains: in today's conditions could anything short of government subsidy, which too is socially undesirable, enable them all to survive? I do not think so.

Finally, as to multiple ownership you ask whether it is a good thing that newspapers, radio and television stations be owned by one owner? I do not think it is in the public interest that one company should blanket the field of communications in one area through control of all or a dominant portion of its press, radio and television.

On the vital matter of freedom of the press, I perhaps expand too much in my brief, that is in the submitted brief, but I feel strongly about what is and what is not freedom of the press.

I do not regard freedom of the press as a special privilege of newspapers, but believe it to be only an extension of the fundamental right of every person to have access to facts that concern him and the right to state his opinions and hear the opinions of others.

I believe though that the press should be responsible and in fact earn and re-earn its freedom every day from the public. Press freedom should be a public decision, zealously guarded. Everyone should know and appreciate what it is. I do not think freedom of the press is endangering Canada now. I do not think this Committee's study is an invasion of the freedom of the press. I do not think it an infringement of freedom of the press to legislate that Canadian newspapers must be Canadian-owned.

I do not think the establishment of a Press Council would necessarily be a blow to freedom of the press, though I do not think such a Council would do much good. I do, however, believe all who would improve the press, including this Committee, should be wary lest with the best of intentions they insert the wedge of government influence that could become control.

Concern has been expressed by Senator Davey and others whether the press is always in good taste or whether it all contributes to unity or whether it fully informs the public. I am worried about these questions lest anything this Committee might conclude could encourage some information czar five or ten years hence to determine for the press and public what is a responsible press.

What is good taste? What is full information? What is national unity? I am aware that there is all through the writing and the speeches of Senator Davey and others a reassurance that your interest is to maintain freedom of the press and I believe this.

My caution rather is what precedents you might here set which can be used quite differently by people who can follow you. I believe only by the assault and battery of ideas in democracy work and only by the assault and battery of news and opinions will the press be a virile force in democracy.

I conclude: I think this Committee's proceeding should usefully remind us all that the public has a right to take a good, hard look at the press from time to time. Our freedom depends upon the public's opinion of us and that will be governed by its judgment of how responsibly we exercise that freedom; but I am convinced that government should leave the running of the press to the press.

If some of us are making more money than good for us, tax us. If we gang up or monopolize against the public interest, crack down. If we are seditious or libellous or otherwise unlawful, hail us into Court, but as to that we put in our papers, good, bad, indent or incomplete, let the public be the judge. Men of politics, I believe, should not shape the press, not if it is to be free.

I think, sir, that is the summary that I could be content with, but I have with me, as you have said, Mr. Lalond, our Vice-President and General Manager and Mr. Bill Metcalfe, our Managing Editor and I am sure if there are questions that you put to me that I cannot answer—I am sure there will be—I will be glad to ask either of them to help you out.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. Smith, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen. I think it is appropriate that as we begin this discussion of the Ottawa Journal, the Committee should be graced by the presence of Senator O'Leary. We welcome him and as the Senators will realize, and perhaps others in the room should know, Senator O'Leary is to appear as a witness before our Committee. I believe it is the eighteenth of February, and not only to discuss the Ottawa Journal but as well we are anxious to have his views on the entire media spectrum. We are particularly pleased he is here now. Welcome.

We will begin the questioning, Mr. Smith, with Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am very impressed with your submission, Mr. Smith.

Mr. Smith: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: It is one of the most eloquent we have heard since these hearings began.

If you were publishing a newspaper in Edmonton or Halifax or Winnipeg, would it be a different kind of newspaper than the Ottawa Journal?

Mr. Smith: I hope so.

Mr. Fortier: What are the special or particular circumstances in Ottawa which dictate this kind of newspaper which this community needs?

Mr. Smith: Well, I would say first that every newspaper should be shaped somewhat by the community it is in and that is why I answered, I hope not flippantly—"I hope so". I believe a paper should be very closely identified to its community in its nature, in its utterances, in the things it regards as of importance.

Now, going on to the question you asked; what should shape a paper in Ottawa? There are a number of things that should shape it. We would have, of course, first to say the fact that it is the seat of Parliament and the seat of the Civil Service and of the Courts and the other fringe benefits of government life. We should, therefore, in Ottawa try to be a paper of some record as to what is going on that is of importance.

We should have people writing editorials who, if only because they are here and they have the good fortune to be able to rub elbows with members of the Government and Government service, we should have editorial writers and reporters and others who are pretty well acquainted and would know what they are talking about.

Now, before any Senator goes on to ask me, "Well, do I think we do all these things?"—of course, I do not think we do all the things we should. We are now limited. The limitation of the "should" factor is surely in part a limitation of the size of the city, of the population of the city, of the market, of its circulation, of the type of paper that will be read.

There is a good paper, in my view, in Toronto, called the Globe and Mail, which is coming as close as any paper in Canada to being or coming very close to being a paper of record. I would suggest they can afford to do that, not simply because they want to do that up there—we would love to do it—but they can afford to do it because the minority of the people in a large community like that want a solid paper of record and will read it and they draw on Ontario, and to some extent other provinces. The minority is large enough to still make it economic for them to put out a good newspaper. In a smaller city of any size the minority that is interested in this kind of thing is not large enough to make it economical.

Mr. Fortier: But in specific terms, how does the Journal perform this function of reporting and interpreting the opinions of Parliament, of the federal political scene.

Mr. Smith: Well, one answer to that, I suppose, is you would be a better judge of that than I am. We feel that we are doing it as best we can and within these limitations, these limitations of size and the different economic ones to which I have referred.

If we put out a vastly improved paper of greater content, of greater use of text and so on—although the Journal runs quite a lot of text—I doubt very much if our circulation would go up. I doubt if it would go up and I would not be surprised if it would go down; that is, if the other paper continued to put out the kind of paper which the average Canadian—and in this I do not mean to be maligning the average Canadian—but the kind of paper that the average Canadian wants to read—

They are not going to read text. You and I may hope they would. I may be interested in text and we do, I think, run in the Journal possibly more text, speeches and comments, than any other paper, but I am not kidding myself, they are not read.

Mr. Fortier: You said that possibly I—this is the Papal “I”—you were suggesting that the members of the Committee and the researchers would be better judges. You have led with your cheek and I will follow that up, if I may. Our researchers have made a study of the coverage by the Journal of the Ottawa political scene and their conclusions are inescapable and those conclusions are: you appear to make very extensive use of Canadian Press dispatches.

Mr. Smith: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In reporting what occurs in and around the Hill?

Mr. Smith: Right.

Mr. Fortier: More specifically, I have here the first pages of the two sections of your Friday, October 24, 1969, edition, which was the day of the opening of Parliament.

The Chairman: The day following.

Mr. Fortier: The day following the opening of Parliament. The Journal's front page and second page contain no staff written stories at all. There were seven stories by Canadian Press. The only staff written story of any kind on the two front pages is a small item about the weather forecast for the next day's football game.

You have asked me what do I think. I cite this fact and I ask you for your comments.

Mr. Smith: If I may say so, it is a perfectly good question. Perhaps wrongly, it does not embarrass me somehow. I think when you think about the opening of Parliament and that kind of day, there was a great deal of routine and formality and what you might call straight news that is occurring on the Hill on that occasion. Canadian Press is no second-rate outfit. It has got a number of people in Ottawa. It has got the kind of staff a sufficient number, so that one man can become, not necessarily an expert, but it becomes rather an authority on a particular field.

The C. P. people can then fan out and cover such a day as that and cover it pretty well, and we think effectively and we think fairly.

The Journal has two people in the Press Gallery directly of its own. Three people, but two in a regular way, and we can send out someone to cover some of the main, straight Parliamentary stories, a debate in the Commons. We can do it. There is no question and sometimes we do, but we would, in doing that, realize that Canadian Press is going to cover this as well. We would check through the story to see whether it seems to be well before we would count on it completely and instead of sending another man to write the same story that C. P. does, we try—not necessarily on opening day—to have our reporter write in the news from their viewpoint, that is from the viewpoint of the Ottawa paper, the Ottawa Journal, which is the viewpoint you are asking about now.

Mr. Fortier: As a member of Canadian Press, you depend through the wire service on stories which occur in cities across Canada, where there are newspaper members of Canadian Press and I would have thought that similarly in cities other than Ottawa and throughout Canada, there would be members of the Canadian Press who would particularly rely on the Journal for a whole written story rather than on the Canadian Press dispatch from Ottawa.

Mr. Smith: I am sure they do and the Canadian Press, I have reason to believe, uses a large number of Journal stories from time to time. You would find them, I think, in many Journals. You picked a good key day there. You have every right for picking that day, if I may say so, but you could have picked a day when the Journal has had many as five or six of its own stories...

Mr. Fortier: I am sure I could.

Mr. Smith: On those occasions, I am sure the Canadian Press has been using that copy and sending it out to the others; but there is a little difference I think in filling the position of an Ottawa paper or of the Ottawa Journal with other cities in using the Canadian Press, and that is, as you say, we would depend on the Canadian Press sending out news from Edmonton and so on.

There would have to be a number of people of Canadian Press in Ottawa. This is their longest writing staff. This is the heart of C.P. reporting. It is what C.P. is all about, to try to present this national picture. I think it does it well so we are in a position where we think we can use it and we would make a mistake unnecessarily to write our own stories, if we think theirs are right.

Mr. Fortier: Are other reporters assigned to cover public service as distinct from government and politics at the Journal?

Mr. Smith: Yes, sir. We have four or five that you may call—not exactly senior reporters because what do you call “senior reporters”—four or five very experienced reporters in addition to the Press Gallery, people who have a city beat and a departmental beat. We try to maintain particular interest in one type of department and one another.

I do not wish to be and I hope I do not sound boastful here but as I have said in my preliminary answer, we know our coverage is a solid square, but we think that, relatively speaking, for a paper of our size and in our community, it is not bad.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to say as has been suggested to some members of the Committee, you are making more extensive use today of Canadian Press dispatches emanating from Ottawa than you did ten years ago?

Mr. Smith: I do not know whether that is so so I cannot say whether it is fair. I do not believe it is so, but if it is so I presume that there is no reason for that, other than the fact that the Canadian Press has improved immensely in its strength.

It had very good men before, people like Jack Sanderson and Clyde Blackburn—the members around and the Senators will recall them—but it is a very large staff now and it is in effect operating around the clock. It is able to put out a much more thorough report. I think the C.P. report out of Ottawa is really a outstanding report of capital news. I think you would find difficulty in putting out, generally speaking, the over-all coverage of Canada and Canadian news from Parliament better than the C.P. puts out; even if you got a many more doing it and doing it for an independent paper.

Mr. Fortier: Are we to understand that as matters now stand you can conceive of no way in which the Canadian Press can be improved?

Mr. Smith: No.

The Chairman: I do not think the witness said that, in fairness.

Mr. Smith: I hope I did not say that because I am sure that any service can be improved. Goodness knows my own writing could be improved as I discover every night later in the evening when I read the damn thing on my own chesterfield.

The Canadian Press services can be improved.

Mr. Fortier: Can you tell us...

Mr. Smith: We count on C.P. for these things for the reasons I have given you. May I just suggest that one of the reasons perhaps we count on C.P., maybe should be approved by the Senators, and that is we tend to work parochially and in looking at Parliament we tend to look at Parliament just as Ottawa would.

We try not to write Parliament just from the point of view of the Ottawa Citizen and what is interesting to him because it is juicy or scandalous or something. C.P.—we want all the news of Parliament, so to speak, but C.P. does look at Parliament as a national organization and its balance therefore has to be pretty broad, and I think perhaps to do that, it is not a bad thing and if we did not, you might find there was a plethora of stories in the Journal reporting in a way that did not suit you as well as C.P. does.

Mr. Fortier: The Committee is considering, amongst other things associated with the press, the calibre of the service given to its member newspapers by the Canadian Press. In your own experience, can you tell the members of the Committee how Canadian Press can be improved?

Mr. Smith: I suspect you already know this, but you are wondering whether I am going to admit it so I will.

I should declare self-interest or prejudice or whatever it is here because I happen to be Vice-President of C.P. and I also worked with the C.P. for ten years before I got into the Journal so that I think C.P. is pretty good for obvious reasons.

How could it be improved? I think, sir, you asked John Dauphinee and Harry Sutherland when they were here on the stand and I think they too said that they did not feel they were putting out an ideal service.

They did stress to you that they were always interested in suggestions from other papers on how it could be improved and this was always being sought. The Canadian Press service is not a unit of itself, as you know. It is an organ of all of the papers and Canadian Press asks its members, "How does this service not please you and in what way?", so I think that does not answer your question, but if I can answer it—how can it be improved...

I think that is a long question and I would rather duck it at this point, not because I do not think it can be improved, but it is rather a thing one would have to balance.

May I leave it at that now? If you feel I am ducking it, come back at me again and I will try again.

Mr. Fortier: Were you here yesterday afternoon, I believe you were, when Mr. Gratton testified...

Mr. Smith: I was here yesterday morning. I spent yesterday afternoon wondering what I was going to say to you today.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gratton in his presentation yesterday afternoon concluded that in the point of view of the French newspaper, the members of the Canadian Press group, that the services were not all that they could be from the point of view of time, for example.

He said that he considered that the Journal and Citizen were his competitors in the field of newspapers in Ottawa. He said he was at a disadvantage with his competitors in that very often he had to translate the Canadian Press dispatches, which you, of course, could edit, as you see fit and publish much more quickly.

That is a fact, is it not?

Mr. Smith: I would think so.

Mr. Fortier: Have you any suggestions as to how this can be remedied, short of a French Canadian Press?

Mr. Smith: Well, this is really a question for the Canadian Press, but if I may assume for a minute and try to answer it for the Canadian Press.

I think that perhaps a short answer is that five years ago if you had asked me that question, the Canadian Press would have been pretty embarrassed about it. A lot of progress has been made in the last five years and I think that if you check with people like Claud Ryan and others, I think that Claud with that lovely dimple of his, will smile and say, he would like it much better but that has probably improved more in the last five years than he believed it would.

Mr. Fortier: He told us that.

Mr. Smith: Did he? There was a good, long way to go. I think Aurele Gratton is quite right when he says he is at that disadvantage. It is not an easy problem to gear the Canadian Press, which has a hundred and one members or whatever it is, to a completely bilingual system. It would be highly uneconomical and so on, but it is getting there, I think.

Mr. Fortier: We will leave the Canadian Press for the time being, but we will stay the same bilingual note, if I may. More than forty per cent of the greater Ottawa population is French-speaking and the Journal, from my point of view, I believe, is editorially sympathetic to the special problems of French-Canadian in Canada in general and Ottawa in particular.

Can you tell the Committee how your newspaper specifically serves this segment of the community?

Mr. Smith: I am glad, Mr. Fortier, if I may say so, that you did include generously in the preamble you found our paper is sympathetic. I think you said, to the French side.

I raise that because it may be that that is my main answer to you.

We have been, I think, in the Journal, with some people, who write letters to the editor, call rather violently pro-French and in stronger terms than that and this despite the fact that we have been "pro-French"—despite the fact much of our circulation is in Carleton County and so on where there are no many French-speaking Canadians.

We do this simply because it happens to be our national policy. We believe in this. We have supported the B and B recommendations, not all of them, but pretty considerably.

We have raised our voice repeatedly against the City of Ottawa editorially in dragging its feet with such things as signs and things like that. These things we have done.

I have a feeling this is the way a paper can best serve or that is one way.

Another way: I think we try to see that any important meetings in Hull or in French-speaking areas in Ottawa are covered. I assure you that we ask these societies from time to time or organizations to keep us informed, to tip us off.

I assure you—maybe, I think, it is only forgetfulness. They often do not. This is understandable. I am trying to sneak up sideways to your story: how do we cover it?

Mr. Fortier: Only by bilingual editorials?

Mr. Smith: I was just going to say: I think I will put the question that you were too polite to put. That is, how many bilingual reporters do we have?

We do not have enough but we do have more than we did a few years ago and we do make a real effort to try to get more, but it is not easy and it is not just because of economics. It is not just because we would not be able to pay them or would not pay them enough.

Bill Metcalfe has had this happen to him repeatedly. He has a good man and he is working well and he likes it and he comes to us and he says, "Look, I have got an offer of a job in the Government, one way or another in a bilingual kind of position and also it is going to be pretty exciting. I know there is a good future and I am going."

No city in Canada, I guess, has the same demand for bilingual reporters and newspaper people right now as in Ottawa. Everybody in Ottawa—everybody in government service wants these people, so we do not have as many as we should.

Some reporters are certainly being encouraged and helped by Mr. Metcalfe to try to take a French course and this kind of thing. I think we are getting better. We are going to try to keep getting better but in the short run that is it.

Mr. Fortier: You are up against the government, in effect?

Mr. Smith: In a lot of ways.

Mr. Fortier: Speaking of reporters, is there a lot of raiding of reporters between the Citizen and the Journal?

Mr. Smith: I would have guessed not. It seems to me that there are a number of quite good papers outside of Ottawa that realize that good reporters the Journal trains and they tend to steal them. The Journal trains them very well and then some archful man like Jim Cooper and B. Honderich says, "Look, you are doing very well. How would you like to come up to us?" But I do not think that there is a lot of raiding between the two papers.

If you want a more direct answer on that, I am sure Bill Metcalfe would give it to you.

Mr. Metcalfe: No, I have been here nine years and I have never made an approach to anybody whatever on the Citizen.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have a no-raiding agreement with the Citizen?

Mr. Metcalfe: No, none whatsoever, but I am trying to think. There are former members of our staff now working for the Citizen, but I do not think that any of them went directly there. Perhaps one or two went. I think they left our staff and they went elsewhere and then moved to the Citizen.

Maybe one reporter on the Citizen went directly from our paper.

Mr. Fortier: We have been told that the Journal in Ottawa does not campaign very hard for circulation in the city and the Citizen in return has no vigorous circulation drive in the surrounding districts. Would you care to comment on that?

Senator Prowse: Call me for a witness on the first one.

Mr. Smith: As the Chairman said a couple of times earlier today, I would like to know who asked that question or made that comment because he is mad.

Mr. Fortier: I think you should be given a chance to reply.

Mr. Smith: I have replied.

The Chairman: You replied very well.

Mr. Fortier: There is vigorous competition between the two newspapers in Ottawa?

Mr. Smith: So vigorous that about once every two weeks my 'phone, amongst everybody else's, is called by saying, "This is the Journal. Would you like to subscribe to the Journal?"

The Chairman: Do you think that those 'phone calls represent the best public relations in the world?

Mr. Smith: I think they do not represent good public relations at all but I regret to inform you that they sell papers.

The Chairman: Well, that is a good answer.

Mr. Smith: It continually amazes me the number of people who are not buying a paper will buy it if they are called on the telephone.

Senator Prowse: Often enough.

The Chairman: I am prepared to have Mr. Fortier carry on but I would point out to him that we want to begin another newspaper at four thirty.

There may be other Senators who have questions. I am not saying you should terminate.

Mr. Fortier: No. I will give somebody else a chance.

Senator Prowse: Did F. P. buy you or did you merge with them?

Mr. Smith: They bought us.

Senator Prowse: This was a straight out purchase by F. P.?

Mr. Smith: A straight purchase.

Senator Prowse: Was there any exchange of shares or anything like that?

Mr. Smith: No.

Senator Prowse: The thing I am interested in is this: you said you were not in a position where you had to sell, as I understand it, but in 1959 this sale took place?

Mr. Smith: Yes.

Senator Prowse: You were concerned that you might lose control because your individual members, who were in the control position, might not be able to buy shares which could become available which could throw the control to somebody else. Is that a correct interpretation?

Mr. Smith: That is part of it, Senator. Also, we were concerned—I think it is almost correct for me to say that every one of our group who could re-sell—there were eighteen or twenty of us—I think it is correct to say every one of us were into the bank on the shares and some of us, including this one, was a long way into the bank.

Senator Prowse: You are among friends. Go ahead.

Mr. Smith: I am through. That is all it is. It was not just a question of what would happen supposing some of the older or some other employee left. It was not just that. It was knowing that for this paper or all newspaper back then the future was not too assured economically. We were still in one of these kind of rubs.

Senator Prowse: Figuring out what they might do?

Mr. Smith: Yes. So the theory was—well, is it better to assure that this Journal goes on or is it better to hope that it will go on and some of us will enjoy the privilege of being able to lead it on which God knows, we would like to have done.

It didn't seem to me—and I will not blame this decision on other people—I will just speak for myself, but other people, I think shared it right through our team. It seemed to me this would be a selfish solution to risk hanging on to the point of a fire sale or something of that kind.

Senator Prowse: Yes?

Mr. Smith: And the Senate is interested in avoiding monopolies.

Senator Prowse: We may or may not be.

Mr. Smith: You might be...or holding on to property so long that it was getting so tight that the only conceivable buyer might be the Southam News Publishing Company.

Senator Prowse: Are they the enemy here?

Mr. Smith: Yes, not so much the real enemy but enemy from my point of view psychologically anyway. It was hard enough if I may say so, for Senator O'Leary, hard enough for Gratton and for me, to sell the paper at all and face the criticism we knew we were getting from our friends for selling but it would have been unbearable to sell. "You sold it to the opposition and you took from Ottawa the situation of having two English papers at the site of political conflict. You let it go over to the one..."

Senator Prowse: The friends who have the right to criticize you were not willing to buy you out of your difficulty. I should not say that. I apologize for my question.

Mr. Smith: I think that is a fair question. I think anything is fair in a Senate inquiry.

Senator Prowse: That occurred to you?

Mr. Smith: Even if the friends had been willing to come in and say: "Well, all right John or George wants to sell his one thousand shares or something, we will buy them,"—but that doesn't get you to first base, towards the large stock of resources in strength and know-how that you have to have if you are buying new presses and building a building.

These little bits of money here and there were not going to help.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the thing that was worrying you was—pardon me, I am not trying to put words in your mouth—but it may save time.

The picture I get is that you were in a position where there was a possibility you might need to make some very extended expenditures and you were already committed, from your brief, to the point where you did not have the resources and you did not know how you were going to be able to finance them without maybe losing the paper together and depriving Ottawa of a competitive situation. Is that a fair statement?

Mr. Smith: That is an accurate statement, Senator. It is fair and it is accurate.

Senator Prowse: Now, the thing that I am interested in is this: you were making money then. Do you make more money as a result of being a member of a group than you would as a private company? I am trying to find out the financing of a group or the rationale of group ownership.

Mr. Smith: Let me speak for my part of it first. It seems to me the last annual profit—were a public company—I think it was $42,000.00. I am here to tell you that a profit of $142,000.00 in big newspaper leagues is a profit at all.

Senator Prowse: It is a pretty small percentage.

Mr. Smith: For instance, talking about the hazards you outlined, you overlooked something. Supposing a strike might have hit us. Suppose it might have hit both papers. We could not have any of this kind of defence.

Now, this is my feeling about the situation as to profit that we were in. I should say, that we felt we couldn't risk it further and we sold at a time and in the way that we felt and to the extent that words can guarantee things, it would be maintained according to its principles so splendidly set out by Senator O'Leary. They would maintain its staff. It would maintain its political policies or any policy its editors wanted to espouse.

We decided well, in this way we can keep the Journal. Now, if you then ask, "Well, are the new owners doing better financially, I would suggest you ask the new owners and leave me out of that part of it."

Senator Prowse: From the paper itself, are you able to offer any editorial services as a result of your membership in the group that you were unable to offer as an independent had you maintained private ownership?

Mr. Smith: Oh yes. We have greater facilities to buy features. There is more money in the bank. You can think of some of the people we have got, the New York Times Service which I think we used very effectively, if I may say so. James Reston and people like this. The Manchester Guardian, we tie up with. This again, I think, is a kind of intellectual service, which is a good one.

We are able to use columnists of the kind of Mr. Westell and so on. We are also—maybe I will let it go at that.

I think—not so much because of being in the group—but of having the financial nightmares behind you, you may now spend what money your paper is earning with some confidence and you may use it to buy more features.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you can take a risk because you do not have to be too concerned if it happens to be bad judgment or you get left out. Is this what it is?

Mr. Smith: This is very much what it is. Speaking of rainy days, may I insert a comment here. I went up at lunch time today to the Victoria building office of this Committee and I was amused. I have no idea what his has got to do with the subject but I will finish it anyway.

I went to the office and I was told to get off the elevator and go along the hall. The first door I came to was the Senate Committee on Poverty. The next door was the Senate Committee on News Media, so I said, "By God, I could have been going into the other one."

Senator Prowse: My recollection is you went past the one on media and ended up in the one on poverty?

Mr. Smith: I might have.

Senator Prowse: In other words, in your particular arrangement anyway, you have maintained your complete editorial independence under an agreement of purchase. Is this generally true?

Mr. Smith: Senator, I reduced that part of my statement to as few as possible words so it would be utterly clear and unambiguous, that pledge of editor independence has been completely kept.

The Chairman: Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: Mr. Chairman, in the brief, Mr. Smith, you referred to the idea of a press council and suggest that it not be a code-bound council and you said "More people should question our judgment. Experts should expose our mistakes". Now, what type of person would you consider an expert and in what manner would he expose our mistakes?

Mr. Smith: Well, a lot of them are from out of town. Apart from that...

Senator Phillips: There are a lot of people from out of town. Would you consider them all experts?

Mr. Smith: I think what I mean—I am sorry it wasn't clear—was that the press makes a lot of boasts of all the letters to the editor we run and how we let anybody say what is the matter with us and so on.

That is a fair boast but I do not think it is as good as it should be and I think one of the reasons is that not enough of the right people write letters.

We get this right in Ottawa particularly when for one reason or another members of Parliament or perhaps members of the Senate or members of the Civil Service—that is more understandable—or doctors or lawyers or businessmen will say, "Oh, that was a lot of nonsense that you talked yesterday."

Well, I say, "Write us a letter."

"No, I wouldn't be seen writing a letter to the press."

I guess what I meant was that experts are people—that was a stupid word to use—I mean people who have a right to an opinion. I do not mean because of their social status, but because of their knowledge. They should write us and they should say, "Look, you are not only a damn fool paper but you are a damn fool paper for this reason and they should expose our errors and if they know—we have told them—if they will write us a letter, even if they don't want to sign it, we will run it.

I think the public should be more encouraged and the responsible people in the public should be more encouraged to take a role in exposing the errors of the press.

I have a hunch that if I have to run—and will run one of those letters—excuse the "I" but I have to make the decision on letters to the editor, if I had to run four letters in succession exposing that we were really factually wrong and wrong in other ways too—particularly if it is my own editorials—presumably I am going to write more carefully on the fifth day and so on.

This is where I think that the public has a chance to improve the press more but it is not using it.

There is a move to improve the quality and it is improving notably. The Globe and Mail has, if I may say so, a first-class collection of letters.

I see that the Toronto Star is going to move into this field more extensively. We get some good letters but we do not quite get the letters that we would like to get and that perhaps for understandable reasons that many are members in Parliament or in the Civil Service in Parliament and they feel they should not.

Senator Phillips: On page nine, Mr. Smith you referred to a government with a zeal for management of information. I presume that your thought—probably I am reading between the lines and not interpreting you correctly—that you are opposed to the information agency as presently being considered by the Government?

Mr. Smith: Where are we, sir?

Senator Phillips: Page nine, at the top page nine of your brief.

The Chairman: Starting the third line, government with zeal.

Mr. Smith: I do not think that was directed so much to a particular information agency but I think within reason, if the government can improve and consolidate and edit and make more accurate the news it gives out and increase the accessibility of news to the Press Gallery and the people who want to get it, I think there is nothing wrong with that.

I think I probably had in mind more an extension of some of the statements about how the press should do more of this and more of that and it should inform more fully or it should do something to maintain unity or not to maintain unity.

Any extension of this into a government Committee or into the government, if the government were to survey the press to see whether it is doing this as well as it should think that would be a mistake. That could become an infringement on freedom of the press.

Senator Phillips: One short question, if I may, Mr. Chairman, before we close. On your opening remarks you referred to the fact that Mr. Malone would set forth the relationship between your company and its parent company and I notice your brief was submitted on December 22nd. This is January 22nd and I am curious as to how you knew what one of the out of town experts was going to say before he said that.

Mr. Smith: Senator, I am glad you asked that. It was set out in your letter and in your guidelines that you were going to be asking F.P. to report on the thing, on the corporate affairs and its relation and its general conduct of the group, so to speak.

It was set out in your guidelines, in your letter to me, a very nice letter, if I may say that, that we would like you to talk about anything you like but also about your relations with F.P.

Now, you have refrained from asking but I will tell you that to this point so far as I know, Dick Malone has not read the brief that I have given to you. I didn't send him my brief.

Senator Phillips: That is the answer.

Mr. Smith: I knew this may have been your question. I did not send him my brief nor did I ask for it. This was done completely independently for the reasons I suspect you people would want to hear from me.

As I said, I did not send it to him and so far as I know he has not ever read it. I do not know how he would have because I did not send it to anybody in Winnipeg. I am not filing with words here.

This is an independent submission and I suggest to you it is pretty considerably to the credit, if I may say so, of the head of the group, so to speak, that he has not asked even to see what was going to be in this brief.

Senator Phillips: Thank you.

Senator McElman: It has been suggested by me, Mr. Smith, that the nebulous thing, "freedom of the press", should be enshrined in the constitution. As a capital newspaper journalist of record, how would you react to such a proposition?

Mr. Smith: Well, it is enshrined in the constitution of the United States very early, article two or three or something. I do not know that helps things. If you enshrine it, you give it a special right and I am not so sure the press should have a special right.

My conception of the proper definition of the freedom of the press would be that it is only an extension to the press, to the printing media, of the public's right to freedom of speech and once you start excepting and enshrining in the constitution the freedom of the press then (a) you are treating it separately and specially and (b) you could be inviting abuse of it.

I do not think we should invite abuse of the freedom of the press.

Senator Prowse: You also accept interpretation?

Mr. Smith: Yes, exactly. Who is to decide when is the press free and when it is not and so on. Someone presumably must interpret that particular clause and it could be interpreted quite differently, according to the times and according to the particular emotional fervor that is sweeping across the country for a minute or two, one way or the other.

Whereas if you leave it in the law as it is,—that is to say not in the law—if we are simply carrying on, as best we can, the extension of the public's right to talk and to act and so on, then my guess is that I would leave it like that.

But, I should say I am awfully glad that you are going to be, as of course you would, hearing from Gratton O'Leary, which I must call him, because he knows more and feels more things in his mind and in his pores than certainly than me and most anybody else in Canada, but since you have happened to have asked me this question, no, I would not enshrine it.

Senator McElman: In what you described simply as an extension of the freedom of the individual,—you would apply the same principle, I take it, to the right of the journalist to protect his source of information in the courts. The same principle would apply?

Mr. Smith: I have a feeling the journalist has the right to protect his source of information and the court has the right in certain circumstances to put him in jail, if it sees fit.

Senator Prowse: May I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Well, I am anxious to begin the next brief.

Senator Prowse: Just one question.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator Prowse: Do you feel that the present situation, where the risk of jail is there and there is no opportunity for a person abusing the privilege, may be a better thing for the protection of the public than the legal protection of the right to non-disclosure of sources would be?

Do I make myself clear?

Mr. Smith: Yes, you do. I am trying to be clear in my answer, which is much harder.

I think that if the thought is present in the mind of a reporter that if he does not get things right he is going to have to attribute it to somebody, and he must be able reasonably to document it, is going to be a worthwhile restrainer on him; otherwise I could imagine that anybody told me anything and I could write it but I was not told by an informed source and so on—and if I could get away on that by not having to reveal my sources it is going to make for a less responsible press.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator McElman: You have heard the discussion today of the agency that Pacific Press has. At the time of the sale of the Journal to the group, if such arrangement had been suggested for Ottawa, would you have participated?

Mr. Smith: I would have looked very closely into it. I might have.

Senator McElman: If you had...

Mr. Smith: I might have, yes.

Senator McElman: How would you? You have already told us that you were concerned about the people of Ottawa's feelings even about the sale. How would you?

Mr. Smith: The people of Ottawa would have reacted to such an arrangement—I guess they would have been as confused as the people of Vancouver and as annoyed for a while, but a lot of these feelings are out of ignorance of what the situation is.

I have the feeling over a period of half a year or so we might have explained just what this would mean.

I am not saying I would have done it because I do not know enough about it. I know the circumstances, but I have not thought of applying them to the circumstances in Ottawa. I think that is why I cannot answer your question. I think I understand somewhat the situation in Vancouver but I have not thought of applying that to Ottawa. Frankly it never occurred to us. It did not come up.

Senator McElman: In principle, would you think that this type of arrangement, if it were to become the trend in Canada, would be inherently good or bad for the industry and for the public?

Mr. Smith: I would suppose it might be good for both, not that it is particularly desirable but it might be good, if only by that means in some areas, you would maintain two papers rather than one. We get ourselves into balancing two things. Which do we want most? Do we want more papers? Do we want as many papers as we can have? That is the whole thing.

Or do we want absolutely as few groups as we can have and as small groups as we can have and as little joint agency production as the kind you mean?

I am not sure which is greater. My feeling is that the aim should be to have as many papers as you can maintain, as can be managed. Keep papers going and I think it may say so, somebody was asking this morning or yesterday, "Well, how far can you go? How far can you go in that?" "How far would you extend your paper or chain?"

Now, if you look at that for a minute. You might say, "All right not past twenty-two, eighteen or thirty-six."

Well supposing the very next case that came up was in a small town and that person had no chance of going along and no independent person wanted to buy it but one of the groups said "Well, all right, we think this sort of thing will go. We will maintain it and we will buy it."

This situation you will come up to and it will come up to. Now, is it a bad thing that that particular group now has four instead of thirteen?

I kind of think it is. I do not like the idea of extending groups as I have said in the brief, but on the other hand I think it is a worse thing if any legislation or a public consciousness were to dictate that this must happen and so then this town loses its paper

Senator Everett: Are you saying that the paper could be maintained even though it is losing money by the chain?

Mr. Smith: Presumably it can be having a better chance of being maintained. There is a share of know-how here, surely, and it may be removed from the old business of a state taxation and so on.

Senator Everett: Let us not talk about a state tax or any other reason like that, but just if on the straight operation, it cannot maintain itself. It is losing money. And the chain buys it and cannot turn it around into a profit. Do you think it should be maintained?

Mr. Smith: I think this question arose out of the first one: that is, might it be maintained on the joint basis as in Vancouver?

Senator Everett: Not even on the joint basis. It could be a newspaper in an individual town.

Mr. Smith: Yes, and the chain decides to maintain it.

I think that any chain that I know of, if it decides to maintain it, is going to be damn sure it is not going to lose its shirt. It believes it will have a reasonable chance to put out a paper and not lose any money and maybe make a little.

Therefore, I think if the chain is increased and does maintain that paper, it is better than having the paper being lost.

Senator Everett: If the paper were a chronic loser even under the management of chains, you would agree then it should be shut down?

Mr. Smith: Yes. I would agree that it is the right of the chain to shut it down.

Senator Everett: Do you think that chains should shut it down?

Mr. Smith: Well, I do not own a chain. I do not think I would say it should be shut down. I think it should be left to the judgment of the group to decide or the chain to decide.

Senator Everett: Do you mean that advertisers in other cities and other communities would be subsidizing a newspaper in another community?

Mr. Smith: Well, you could put it another way. They would also be subsidizing the citizens of a community to have a paper.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, are you through with your questioning?

Senator McElman: Not entirely.

The Chairman: I am most anxious to get on to the next submission. But by all means finish up. I think that perhaps Senator McElman's questions will complete the discussion with the Journal.

Go ahead.

Senator McElman: Mr. Smith, late in 1969, I believe it was, November or December, there appeared in the Journal a report of an address that you gave at the University of Waterloo and the clipping I have is headed, "Society must expose ills before it can ease them."

You were speaking about challenges and attacks upon established institutions of the nation and including attacks upon the established press. At one point you said, "Perhaps the press was wearing a halo of freedom of the press at too jaunty an angle to suit its own vanity. Perhaps we had been regarding what we like to call the Fourth Estate as a private rather than a public preserve."

Does that comment reflect the growing influence of chain ownership or stress upon the economic over the traditional service aspect of publishing?

I am sorry to extract something from this by itself but I do not think I have quoted out of context.

Mr. Smith: Would you mind giving me even the first sentence?

The Chairman: Here is the clipping.

Mr. Smith: I do not think it is in the context of groups at all.

Senator McElman: No, I do not suggest it was. I was asking if this had any bearing.

The Chairman: Do you want to put the question again now he has it in front of him, Senator?

Senator McElman: I simply asked if this comment reflects the growing independence of chain ownership or does it put stress upon the economic over the service aspect of publishing?

Mr. Smith: I do not think it really refers to either. I think that one sometimes hears newspaper people raising the question of freedom of the press in defence of things that are not related to the freedom of the press.

I think they do more harm to the conception of freedom of the press by doing that than they realize.

Freedom of the press, I think, is—when I said we may be wearing a halo at too jaunty an angle, in the first place that is one of those flights of words reporters go into. Excuse me. It is hard to define. I think I meant in that that we were reaching too fancifully sometimes to excuse our shortcomings under the heading of, "Well, this is our freedom of the press and leave us alone." Does that answer your question?

Senator McElman: The only other thing I would like to say, Mr. Chairman, is that I was very interested in the suggestion that more people should write letters to the editor and I am entirely confident that they would be welcomed by you but there are those who have tried that and still can show the bruises. Not here, sir, but in some other areas.

Mr. Smith: Well, that's life.

The Chairman: Perhaps in thanking you, Mr. Smith, I could be forgiven if I quote just one other sentence of the speech you made at the University of Waterloo. You said and I quote:

"No harm will be done if the Davey Committee gives us a bit of hell and perhaps even good."

I was grateful for that comment at the time.

Mr. Smith: Well, do not take me too seriously.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Ladies and gentlemen and Senators. We will adjourn for about five minutes and at five to five we will reconvene to hear the brief from the Globe and Mail.

SHORT RECESS

(Upon commencing at 5:00 p.m.)

Presentation of the Globe and Mail and the appearance, James L. Cooper, President and Publisher, Earle B. Richards, Vice-President and General Manager, Richard J. Doyle, Editor, George Bain, Columnist.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, we are running not too far behind schedule. We are going to receive the brief from the Globe and Mail. Sitting on my immediate right is the President and Editor, Mr. James L. Cooper. On his right is Earle Richards, Vice-President and General Manager. The editor of the paper, Mr. Richard J. Doyle, is sitting to my immediate left and on his left is correspondent, George Bain.

I think, Mr. Cooper, with your forbearance, before we begin to discuss the Globe and Mail, we may just take a word in completion on the Pacific Press matter which we were discussing this morning.

I think, Mr. Malone, that you were going to obtain I think what was called a flat rate for buying advertising in combination. I think you were going to secure or attempt to secure for us the individual rates for the Sun and for the Province.

Mr. Laking: I think you will probably know we are most scrupulous in not over-stepping each other's newspapers. I think Mr. Malone probably has it.

Mr. Malone: No, they are not available in the Journal. We sent over for them. I thought we might have a set there. We have telephoned Vancouver and asked them to mail them to you.

The Chairman: I used the point about the agency referring to Standard Rate and Data which was this publication, Canadian Advertising Rates and Data and this is the current issue which you looked at. As you discovered and I discovered at the same time it does not have the rates for the Sun and the Province but only the combined rates.

When I suggested to you that advertising agencies use this as the basis of purchasing advertising, you said that you mail individual rate cards to the agencies.

Mr. Malone: As far as I am aware, that is correct.

The Chairman: While we have been meeting here this afternoon, our staff has been busy. We have telephoned three advertising agencies in Toronto. We phoned Goodis, Goldberg and we phoned Vickers and Benson and we phoned Foster Advertising.

In each case we spoke to the Media Department. I should not say, "we". Our staff, however, spoke to the Media Department and tried to secure these rates for placing advertisements singly in the Sun or in the Province and I am informed by our staff that at none of these agencies did they have this information on file.

We spoke in each case to a senior member in their Media Department. Comments were made in each case that they could get the information from the Rep but they did not save them on file and according to the note I was given, it would be rare they would want to insert an advertisement on an individual basis. So the question I must ask is this:—and apologize to the Globe and Mail people for resuming on their time and so the question I would put to you, Mr. Malone, or indeed to Mr. Keate who is with you is: to what extent do national advertisers use the Sun and not the Province?

Mr. Malone: I guess it is not too often. There is a pretty substantial discount.

The Chairman: Does it ever happen?

Mr. Malone: I would not say it never happens. I could not give you a one hundred per cent answer on that, but it would be very seldom it happens.

I am surprised they have not got the rates. We have advertisers all through Toronto, Montreal, New York, wherever they want, and the rate is available.

Senator Prowse: They are obviously not trying to sell it.

The Chairman: I think Senator Prowse makes the point. Would it be fair to conclude—and I am not trying to embarrass you or put words into your mouth—but would it be fair to conclude that the representatives of P.P. really do not try very hard to sell the Sun alone and conversely the reps from Sutherland?

Mr. Malone: We try to sell them in both. We want them to go in both, but the rates are available. There is no restriction on the rates, but it is much more attractive to go in both and we try to sell them both and as was remarked in there, the advertising office of the Sun does not operate under F.P. We operate a joint office in Toronto selling both papers. We deliberately go out...

The Chairman: That is R. C. Voigt?

Mr. Malone: We try to sell both papers but you can get an ad in either paper without any difficulty at all.

The Chairman: So then this Mr. R. C. Voigt, who is the manager representing Pacific Press in Toronto?

Mr. Malone: Yes, he was selling in both papers or individual papers.

The Chairman: Does he sell any other papers besides?

Mr. Malone:...

The Chairman: He sells only for Pacific Press in Toronto?

Mr. Malone: I will see that the rates are sent.

The Chairman: I would still be most interested in receiving those rates.

Senator Prowse: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: This question may look like it is being kind to somebody. I am wondering if the reason for that would be as far as national advertisers are concerned they are obviously looking for as big an area as they can get and normally they want mass coverage and what I would be interested in is: when you get to the local advertiser, I can see a local advertiser deciding what paper would fit his purposes, but I am not sure I can see it for a national advertiser.

The Chairman: I think the real question, Mr. Malone, is whether or not there is a real competition for advertising dollars in the newspaper business in Vancouver at the national level.

Mr. Malone: It is much more competitive on the local level. At the national level, the paper serves different areas to some degree. For example, there is better service up in this part of the province with the morning paper and better for the national advertiser in that field. We try to sell both papers and make it as attractive as we can to get both papers.

The Chairman: I do not want to labour the point and we look forward to hearing from you.

Now, Senators, turning to the Globe and Mail.

I would say to Mr. Cooper, in compliance with our written request we received the brief from the Globe and Mail three weeks in advance and in fact I think more than three weeks in advance. It has been circulated and studied by the members of the Committee and I think for purposes of our discussion today, we can take the brief as read.

I will now offer you some time, ten or fifteen minutes, to expand upon or explain your brief, to amplify it and to talk about anything else that may be on your mind, sir.

Following that the Senators would like to question you on the contents of your brief and on the other things you might say today and perhaps the other things which may be interesting them.

Mr. James L. Cooper, President and Publisher, The Toronto Globe and Mail: Thank you. Well, Mr. Chairman and Honourable Senators, I wonder if I might first of all complete the introduction made by Senator Davey and that is that the last name was George Bain whom he described as our Ottawa correspondent.

It possibly is not very well known here but George is much more than that. He is associate editor of the paper and we take that title very seriously. He is in touch with us very, very frequently indeed and I thought it only courtesy now we are trespassing on his home-ground that he should sit up here because of the high office he does hold.

On my extreme right we have Mr. Bob Campbell who is our director of sales and promotion and he is also a hell of a good magic lantern operator; the point being that after our session is finished here, your very able Miss Barrie has most efficiently arranged that in the room immediately beneath us we can go to view a film. I think it's about a sixteen minute presentation, which would be far better than anything I could say because it tells the short story of the only extra edition that we have published in our career.

That happens to be on the death of Senator Robert Kennedy or rather the shooting of Senator Kennedy. It was an American story. That was not the point. It was a story that occurred at the time and for the first time we could bring everybody back and start all over again and produce an extra edition.

It tells that shortly and then goes into describe how something like a total of fifty thousand people contribute to the Globe and Mail each day with a daily total of something like a million words and far better than anything I can say, shows just what goes into a newspaper.

It is not a hard-sell commercial, but you will find it very entertaining. And I promise if anybody doesn't like it, they can come to me and I will give them their money back.

Senator Prowse: It would be worth more than we pay for it though.

Mr. Cooper: Yes. You can see by my white hair I am an old man and have been forty-seven years in the profession of newspapers.

I have been preaching the virtue of brevity and at this advanced age and at this late stage of the afternoon, I am not going to change that at all. I think you will rejoice to know that I do not propose to amplify my brief at all. There are a lot of subjects you would be delighted to talk about with you and if you omit one or two of the good ones maybe I might chip in right on my own; but I still think that it's far more important than you, as Senators, should question us about what you want to know, not just what we would like you to know. I may say with great respect to all the presentations that have been made here, I have found these questions much more interesting than the briefs.

I have led with my chin in saying that but there it is; but in the great new newspaper participatory journalism, let us get together. All I can say gentlemen is, "Shoot".

The Chairman: Senators, I am going to avail myself of the opportunity of speaking first and I only have three questions relating to this morning's presentation of Mr. Malone.

Perhaps I can introduce one of them apologizing to George Bain for not more appropriately indicating his title of which, of course, I was aware. I do apologize.

Mr. Bain: I owe you many apologies.

The Chairman: As to the questions: this morning, in your absence, Mr. Bain, I was asking Mr. Malone about the attitude of F. P. Publications to an Ottawa columnist who appeared in all of their publications and because of my familiarity with your column and its general excellence, I used you as an example. I said, "Why not reproduce George Bain's column in all of the F. P. papers?"

Mr. Malone's answer—and I hope he will interrupt me if I do not in fairness give a gist of his comment, was that he thinks it is important that each one of the F. P. Publications has a personality of its own so that the Globe and Mail in Toronto, for example, could not easily be mistaken for the Sun in Vancouver or for the Free Press in Winnipeg.

He also said secondly that the Globe and Mail is very jealous of George Bain and would not like to see him appearing regularly.

on a daily basis in all of the other F. P. publications.

I think I have quoted him correctly. I think you were here. Would you comment on this? Did Mr. Malone directly assert that you would be jealous of George Bain's column appearing in other F. P. publications?

Mr. Cooper: I think that by and large that would be true. The Globe and Mail for a long time has had the tradition of trying to be a little different and a little more independent newspaper and the point really is that this dates from the days when we were not associated with any newspaper at all and we always refused steadfastly to syndicate our material. The point being we did try to be a national newspaper and we did try to sell in every major city in the country and it would be a little stupid to give away some of our prize stories to the opposition, so that has built up this tradition.

Now that we are happily married, we are not quite as tough as that and I know Norman Smith. He is such a charmer, as you know. He spoke so eloquently about the Globe and Mail today and he came to see me and I weakened and said, "Yes, he could use George Bain about once a week or so but no more because we did not want Norman to lose it."

I think this is trying to keep the character of the Globe and Mail and trying to have it a little different from other papers across the country. We do not readily give it away.

The Chairman: You would agree Mr. Keate is an equally charming fellow. Suppose he came to you and said, "We would like to use George Bain once a week in Vancouver."

Mr. Cooper: I am not sure—no. Well, each man to his own taste. One man's meat is another man's poison.

I will remember that Mr. Keate was interested for a long time in Dennis Braithwaite. We had the same arrangement there. He did not abuse it or overdo it and we were glad to have him use Dennis Braithwaite.

Now, Arthur Irwin of the Victoria paper is involved with Richard J. Needham. He is most keen on using Needham and I am happy that the men can be dispersed in rationed doses across the country to give people the appetite to buy the Globe and Mail across Canada.

The Chairman: Do you think that rationed doses of Richard J. Needham is all they can stand in Victoria?

Mr. Cooper: I do not know. I think he seems to be appreciated more in Victoria than in some parts of Ontario.

The Chairman: The second question I would like to ask which relates out of this morning was the comment—again I hope I am not misquoting Mr. Malone—that the Globe and Mail takes a stronger editorial position than either the Star or Telegram. Would you agree with him?

Mr. Cooper: Stronger in what way? I do not quite follow where the strength lies; in the strength of our opinion or in the affect of that opinion?

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Malone made the comment. Perhaps I can put it to Mr. Doyle.

Mr. Cooper: No. I should be very annoyed with Mr. Doyle if I did not think we were stronger. I am not sure that I am the man to say that.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Doyle, can you give me an example of the editorial position of the Globe and Mail being stronger than the Star and Telegram?

Mr. Doyle: I do not think I would like to. I think that the Globe's editorial position is usually very firm or responds very quickly to given situations and has a consistency which may give it an extra measure of firmness.

The Chairman: I am not quarreling with you, but would you not think it is equally true of the Toronto Star and the Toronto Telegram?

Mr. Doyle: I think they both have strong editorial positions.

The Chairman: I am not trying to embarrass you. I said this morning I thought it was a very strange comment and that is why I am pursuing it.

The third and last thing which I would like to pursue from this morning was the comments of Mr. Malone. You will recall, I am sure, my asking him about the Globe and Mail mast-head. I would like to put that same question to you.

I will not read the mast-head now, but this morning's mast-head in the Globe and Mail and indeed the mast-head every day, I see absolutely no reference of any kind to your association with F. P. Publications. It is apparent from your brief that you are not embarrassed by the association. I think you are proud of it. It is equally apparent that F. P. Publications are proud of the Globe and Mail

Would it not be in the public interest to indicate in your mast-head that this paper is a member of F. P. Publications?

Mr. Cooper: That reminds me of the story of the man who was going to work on Monday morning, if I may say, with respect for the presence of one or two ladies, and he thought that he had lost his manhood because he had never even thought of it. And frankly that is the answer. I had not even thought of it.

The Chairman: Had you thought of it, Mr. Doyle?

Mr. Doyle: I hadn't either.

Senator Prowse: Think about it.

Mr. Cooper: If I am not too old now, Mr. Chairman, I will think about it.

The Chairman: Well, I am sure there are some things you are not too old to think about. And this question of the F.P. Publications in the masthead is certainly one of them. For someone who has subscribed to the Globe and Mail for as long as I can remember, I was under the impression and I think the citizens of Toronto—if I may quote a phrase used last evening here by Mr. Heine, the editor of the London Free Press—he referred repeatedly to the politically sophisticated electorate in the London area. I think those in Toronto are at least as sophisticated. I do not think the citizens of Toronto know that the Globe and Mail is a F.P. paper. I think they would be interested. I think you should consider it.

Mr. Cooper: On our front page we have never hidden it. We put an announcement on the front page. As I say I have not thought of it. I am not quite sure of the virtue but as I say, to hell with virtue, we will think of the act.

The Chairman: I am not at all suggesting that you are trying to hide it.

I have some other questions but I think perhaps I should now turn to the Senators.

I think Senator Prowse is first.

Senator Prowse: When did you become part of the F.P. family?

Mr. Cooper: In late 1965.

Senator Prowse: From your point of view have you noticed any benefits from belonging to the family?

Mr. Cooper: Well, as I said in my brief, it is rather an intangible benefit but the greatest benefit has been, as Mr. Smith put it far more eloquently than I can, there has disappeared that fear of what is going to happen in the event of a forced sale and in the event of death because we did have quite a time in 1952 when George McCullough died.

Senator Prowse: With Mr. Webster as your owner, surely you would not have that problem?

Mr. Cooper: The problem about...

Senator Prowse: Worrying about financial insecurity, the type of thing Mr. Smith was talking about.

Mr. Cooper: No, but if Mr. Webster died that was the problem.

Senator Prowse: Well, who is in there? Not Mr. Webster still there?

Mr. Cooper: He is in F.P., yes.

Senator Prowse: Your problem is if he died you would have to worry about whether his heirs would decide to carry on?

Mr. Cooper: Yes, what would happen to the Globe and Mail in the event of Mr. Webster's death? This was at the time before merger.

Senator Prowse: So that as it is now you have the continuity of a corporation instead of the philanthropy of an individual owner.

Mr. Cooper: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Has it enabled you to give any service to your readers that you were unable to give before?

Mr. Cooper: I do not know quite how to phrase that. We have gone ahead as if we were still completely independent and not a group at all so I have done things and to the extent that I have not been stopped to the extent that we have continued a form of progression, on which I was most keen, certainly have benefited, but this is a negative form of benefit, if you follow me.

There has been no harassment. There has been no pulling in. There has been no running up for all the ambitions that we had and can get very glorious and describe some ness to you, but there has been no interruption.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you are enjoying the kind of paper you took pleasure in and pride in, am I correct?

Mr. Cooper: Yes. We are proud but never satisfied.

Senator Prowse: Has there been any change that you have been able to be more satisfied since?

Mr. Cooper: I think so, yes.

Senator Prowse: Can you describe the areas in which there was an increase of satisfaction?

Mr. Cooper: Yes. On account of the corporate side of the business, I was very proud indeed of having launched Canada's first daily business newspaper.

If you recall, when I took over we published a report on business purely as a section in the paper and the great cross I have to bear in life now is I could never get anyone in Canada to call it, "Report on Business". They always say that business thing or the business section.

One of the first things I did was to increase publication to three times a week and then I got cold feet and we took a survey and the survey people, the research people, came back and said most emphatically that we could not pass as a daily newspaper, that the businessmen had too much to read and he did not want anything more over his desk so I held back for some time.

Later on we took the chance and we went to five days a week and it has been the most successful thing we have done in recent years.

Senator Prowse: You call yourself a national newspaper. How much of your circulation on a daily basis is outside of Metropolitan Toronto?

Mr. Cooper: Oh, outside Metropolitan Toronto, about half of it.

Senator Prowse: Pardon?

Mr. Cooper: About half of it.

Senator Prowse: Well, how much of it is, for example, west of Sault Ste. Marie or east of Montreal or east of Cornwall, let me put it that way.

Mr. Cooper: This is the daily paper?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Cooper: Not the Report on Business. The Report on Business is all sold separately and we have twenty thousand.

I will run them down very quickly, if I may. Newfoundland, 136; Nova Scotia, 791; Prince Edward Island, 86; Senator McElman will be glad to note in New Brunswick we have 640; in Manitoba, 2112; Saskatchewan, 548; Alberta, 950; and British Columbia, 842; and the total—this is outside Ontario—is seven thousand, something.

On top of that—this is seven thousand during the week, it would be about nine thousand or ten thousand on Saturdays and then there is another twenty thousand on the "Report on Business".

The Chairman: I think you did not give us the Quebec figure.

Mr. Cooper: 2,060.

Senator Prowse: On the 15th of December the T. Eaton Company in your city of Toronto decided to dispense with the services of, I think it was, 196 or about 200 of their maintenance employees and they were going to replace them with a contract with another company which actually paid wages scales considerably less.

Have you carried any story on this at all?

Mr. Cooper: If I may, sir, with great respect, I do not think the answer to that is just a simple, "Yes", or "No".

Let me just give you a very slight indication of the background. There is a story that is carried in the New Lead which is a Guild publication.

I did not hear of it until two days ago just as I was on my way over here. Mr. Doyle has gone into the subject and I would be glad to have him talk to you.

There is one point I would like to make about it and that is this. Let me say first of all, it is refreshing to find that the New Lead people are taking an interest in the quality of the paper rather than just in salaries and hours. I think that is very pleasing to see. I am not at all impressed by their product. I think they should have produced something better which would reflect on their editorial skills. The point is what is in it is what matters and that is the question of news judgment. How good was that story?

I am not imputing any motive at all with the Guild, none at all, but I would point out two things. This concerns maintenance workers. Some time ago the Toronto Telegram replaced its maintenance workers, who were members of the Guild, by contracting out in a similar instance.

Right now at the moment the Toronto Star is in the process of moving to a new building and it is talking to the Guild about what happens to the maintenance workers, so you can see a Guild member, writing about this, as we all are influenced in our news values in what we are interested in, may not be completely objective in this story and there are other facets to it.

As to the merits of the story as such, I would like Mr. Doyle to explain them to you.

Mr. Doyle: First of all, if I may and if Mr. Cooper will forgive me, I would like to amplify one of the last sentences in which you talked about the objectivity of the Guild member.

I think perhaps you meant to say perhaps the objectivity of the Guild member writing in the Guild publication.

I do not think there is any question of the objectivity of Guild reporters when he is working on his own job.

Mr. Cooper: No.

Mr. Doyle: This is, as Mr. Cooper indicated, a continuing story. What is happening to not just the maintenance workers but to other groups of employees in the farming out process. It is a story we have carried on a number of occasions and I think most recently in this particular area in having to do with the Toronto-Dominion Centre and the large maintenance employee system that was set up to serve that particular complex.

The man in our organization who is an authority on this is our chief labour reporter, Wilfred List. Wilfred heard about this particular situation at Eaton's, the one of which you speak, roughly, I would say, about ten days ago, or he heard the rumbling about it. It had been going on for some time. It was not that big an operation. It was not shooting off any fireworks early in December. It wasn't shooting off many fireworks at that particular time but there was something there.

He did in fact look into it. And he came back and talked about it to the appropriate people at our place and he outlined the facts as he saw them which were not entirely as they had been reported in the New Lead, but indicates there is something there for our interest.

He said, however, the real story had to be told in the context of what is happening in several other firms. He listed a number of firms. He said he wanted to have a good look at the Globe and Mail among other papers. He mentioned the other two papers as well. He said he particularly wanted to look at the federal government because the federal government has been involved in this.

He wanted to do these several things but at the particular time he was coming down with the flu. That is neither here nor there—there are other people who can do the assignments.

The point is: the story is being worked on whatever he finds.

I cannot attempt to give you what his analysis of the situation will be, but it was in the works before the New Lead story appeared and it is still in the works.

I would like to add a kind of footnote, if I may. I have heard in the brief submitted to the Newspaper Guild, it was stated the members were pleased they would be getting away from—I think they called it—shotgun journalism where every city editor wanted the story yesterday. They hailed this as a progressive move in a newspaper and thought we should take it a lot further, and I agree with them.

We should do far more research. We should do far more planning. We should put far less emphasis on whether we are first, and more on whether we are right and whether we are thorough, whether we should cover this particular story.

Senator Prowse: In other words this is going to be more than a story of two hundred people who have been let go by one firm?

Mr. Doyle: Precisely. I do not think there are two hundred people. There are some there who are being transferred to the other companies. There are some that are choosing to go into retirement because retirement is their advantage. If they take retirement, they get severance benefits so if you do not have too long to go on your contract, it balances the thing.

He is looking into that situation and he is looking into a number of other companies as I say a number of other institutions including the government to see what the situation will be.

Senator Prowse: In other words, this story has not just been neglected or forgotten?

Mr. Doyle: No, it has not, sir.

Senator Prowse: Thank you for your information.

Now, what are you able to give to the chain, and the other people and the other newspapers in your chain or your group? I am primarily interested in the editorial aspect. The business end—perhaps somebody else could deal with that. I am interested in the role and providing people with the widest possible dissemination of news.

Mr. Cooper: Well, senator, we, as you now, don't just throw the Globe and Mail in the field or all over the place, but we have left it more or less to the individual publishers to ask us for what they would like.

Senator Prowse: Well, what do you get; do you get any benefit from the chain or group ownership?

Mr. Cooper: On editorial matters?

Senator Prowse: Yes. In the way of news services or facilities that would enable you to turn out or provide your readers with more information than you were able to do before you belonged to a group.

Mr. Cooper: Well, we wouldn't use a great deal of their material, as I said in my brief. We would now and again use Mr. Bruce Hutchison, and on other occasions—I well recall on the anniversary of D-Day we were sick for someone to write about the anniversary, and that was the occasion that we used Mr. Malone's article and then we took it to the editorial page; that is quite a different matter.

The greatest thing I think has been the progress quite properly in the Ottawa Bureau where we now have at the moment men who are doing such a good job here and we combine facilities because it so happens the transfer of the Norlite Building into a press building was just about that time. They were going their separate way and we were going our separate way, and this seemed to be a good occasion to join forces, and as a result of joining those forces we have a librarian, and we do have the girl answering the telephone as who takes the messages which I am afraid are often from irate subscribers who can't get the circulation office for the non-delivery of their paper.

This combination, the setting up of a library, this kind of mutual breaking-off and rubbing-off together is one of the virtues.

Senator Prowse: Then you wouldn't be able to do that unless you belonged to a group?

Mr. Cooper: Well, we wouldn't have had such great benefit, and although I was very keen I think I might still have gone with the expense of a librarian because I think that is an important part of our service.

Senator Prowse: Now, with the matter of recruitment of staff, what policy do you follow there? Where do you recruit your staff?

Mr. Cooper: Well, it is a complete cross-section. Being a Toronto newspaper we can attract people from other newspapers, people who want to come into a bigger city. We do have some from the schools of journalism and we do get quite a number from the universities directed to us. One of the good things is people with sociological degrees coming into the profession now and we like to give them on-the-job training in the office, and every summer we have about twelve of them come in. Out of that twelve I think this year we have about six coming back from that number.

Senator Prowse: What training do you give them? What provisions do you have for training them?

Mr. Cooper: You mean the students in the summer?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Cooper: They are given courses involving libel and what-have-you by one of our senior editors and they have a weekly session with the managing editor, and Mr. Doyle has them—this may interest you in view of your previous question, but he has them into the editorial board only one at a time. We do that generally.

As for the regular staff, we have an office rule that goes for all departments, and we pay half the fees for anyone who wants to improve himself by taking courses. That is largely a great benefit to people who come to us from other countries who may have language difficulties or communication difficulties.

We have sent... I remember Joan Hollobon, to Columbia in New York, to study medical reporting and David Spurgeon was there before. David Spurgeon definitely was doing the medical beat; spent three months in the hospital without doing anything.

There are many other seminars that we send to. We send someone to Western almost every year to the business school and we encourage this generally, but by and large we have found that if a man is good and the best form of training he can get is that we give him the time and the opportunity to deal in depth with the stories that we try to report in the Globe and Mail.

Now, with all due respect to the previous publisher here, I think the days of the highly individualized personal publisher newspaper went out with William Randolph Hearst and Lord Beaverbrook, perhaps.

Sex and crime, food and fashion, all the old sounding boards are not good enough any more. People want the sociological studies, they want reporting in depth on education, on culture, politics, and no matter how many number of things.

Our readers, at least we hope, are scattered over a larger area and are a little more sophisticated and educated to this kind of access on high attitudes. That isn't enough because they want a reasoned type of editorial. They want the background in depth in order to make up their opinions, and they want most of all—I am not joking about this part—participation. It is quite an elite who want to join us in discussing things, either letters to the editor or a newspaper article.

Newspapers have a new dimension now. They used to be opinions on the news but now we have interpretation of the news which is a very useful service because your writing can be a little more illuminating, a little more contentious, which we would like it to be in the newspaper columns.

Senator Prowse: Well, how do you deal with the situation, clearly defining for the public—supposing I pick up a newspaper and I read it, and so I know whether I am reading fact or whether I am reading an opinion, or a mixture?

Mr. Cooper: Well, we have page 6 which is opinion—which is editorial opinion. Page 7, which is interpretation. The rest of the news we try to keep as fair as we can. I was going to say objective, but I should never use that word.

And on Saturday we have separate pages to cover the provinces and other things, and obviously news comments from these different areas.

The Chairman: May I ask a question on this point?

Mr. Cooper: Yes.

The Chairman: You say in your brief that the Globe and Mail is independent politically then you go on to say by no means neutral. That phrase "by no means neutral" struck me as being rather familiar, and sure enough there it was in Professor Merrill's book "The Elite Press" which spoke so favourably of the Winnipeg Free Press and of the Globe and Mail.

It says that you are independent politically. You chose those very words "by no means neutral." It goes on to say in the very next sentence: "Ideologically the paper is to the right but certainly to the thoughtful and calm right."

Would you, Mr. Cooper, describe the Globe and Mail as being ideologically to the right?

Mr. Cooper: No, because the longer I live the more I can never find where the centre is.

The Chairman: So you disagree with Professor Merrill?

Mr. Cooper: I don't necessarily disagree with him. I just don't know just where the right and where the centre are. I don't know whether we are right, centre, or extreme left and there is one thing I love, and that is to get a letter saying "Krushchev Cooper, you communist," on the same day that I get a letter which says "All you publishers are Ba Street bastions."

The Chairman: So you don't agree that the paper is to the right?

Mr. Cooper: Well, I think wherever the centre is there you find the Globe and Mail.

The Chairman: You think to the centre, therefore Professor Merrill is wrong?

Mr. Cooper: Well, I don't know.

Senator Prowse: Well, you take sides depending on how you like them at the time.

Mr. Cooper: Personal things never enter into it.

Senator Prowse: I mean, rather than direct yourself to editorialize you judge the various things that come up then take your stand on the basis of what you think are the merits of the piece without worrying about whether you are to the right or the left of the centre?

Mr. Cooper: Yes, except it is an old thing—there was a long seminar last year which was promoted by the London School of Economics on how editorial policy is reached.

We were very flattered that we were asked to take part in it.

The Globe and Mail has a kind of formalism, a formal character and tradition, and hardly ever have to discuss a fixed idea, that we will do about it, because we know before we talk about it. We more or less have an attitude on things which means—we have to keep up with the traditions of the Globe and Mail.

We have the liberty of the subject and things like that.

Senator Prowse: Well, that leads me to the suggestion, when people say, and we have told people here that tell me that they don't have any trouble talking to editors because they think the same way you do; I mean the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Cooper: Well, I can tell you that we agree.

Senator Prowse: Do you have editorial differences?

Mr. Cooper: Yes. I think I will pass that on to Mr. Doyle.

Mr. Doyle: We work with an editorial board of five or six people, depending on the particular news at the particular time. The members of the board spend roughly two hours prior to our daily editorial conference looking over their own newspaper and other newspapers coming into the office, including over periodicals, standard radio broadcasting, particularly their own particular specialties. During that same period of time I am usually preparing a list of things that have attracted my attention either the night before or on my way to work or whatever it may be. Also during that same period I have a brief conference with the publisher on matters relating to editorial policy, matters relating to every facet of the operation of the paper.

By the time I come to the conference I have a list of subjects, and I will introduce the subject and usually throw it in the direction of a particular individual because most of your subjects are divided up according to the area of specialty of the writer.

We will discuss the thing and we will discuss what the particular ramifications of the various events as far as our standard policy is concerned—the policy that we followed in the past in that particular situation, how did it change, if it did change, and is there any particular reason why we should write again on the subject. In that rare situation where you can say "I can't find a parallel for this—this is something that we haven't touched before in any way, shape or form", we usually get into a discussion of whether we know enough to write about it. If we don't, we perhaps detail a man from the board to take some time and find out himself or maybe we know of course that we can trust our own institution or a writer from outside our own institution to get us an answer.

If that is the case we go ahead with it, or with the subject. We may have arguments; we may have very vigorous arguments amongst our own company, and there may be some shouting, but I think it is safe to say here, and repeat it, that no individual is compelled if he believes very differently. Most editorial writers I have worked with—and I only know the Globe and Mail because I have not worked for any other newspaper—most of the people are quite professional, and if your subject that particular day doesn't necessarily quite agree with the line they usually take, I will allow their point. I will argue mine and tell you what I think, but I also say that I will allow your point and I agree that you should write that way, but they much prefer to write it themselves.

In that respect, I feel we have control. And if there is going to be a degree of differences with our own opinions, we will generally agree.

As I said, on most subjects we can come to a general agreement, but we only have one rule: we say that if we change in any marked degree we must acknowledge in the editorial itself this difference in the position we have taken before, and we must give our reasons for changing. This can become a pretty laborious exercise sometimes, particularly if you are changing who you are going to support in a national election, and perhaps the editorial can become a bit tedious.

It is necessary for us as well as for our readers, I think, to say things this way.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you get out of your pattern and explain why?

Mr. Doyle: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Doyle, the Globe and Mail did switch its national selection in the federal election in 1963. When Mr. Bassett was here before Christmas he was telling us that the Telegram also switched parties and made the same switch you did in an election.

He told us that it cost the Telegram 10,000 readers. What was your experience at the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Doyle: I know it cost us one member of the Senate but he did come back. I don't think it had a very perceptible change in circulation, but perhaps we had a few irate readers leave us and a few others join us.

The Chairman: It is not intended as a facetious question, but why would the Telegram lose 10,000 readers and you lose only a few?

Mr. Doyle: Well, I think there is a good answer for that. I don't think we are identified in our readers' eyes any more as a party newspaper. We support parties in elections and as we said in an editorial footnote not long ago that as far as national elections are concerned we are back trying to sharpen our knives to get after those who were elected.

We have a position of being almost constantly in opposition so people don't buy us. They think we are biased, or because they are Tory members or Liberal members, or members of the NDP.

Senator Prowse: Do you follow a policy which has been attributed to the London Times but because I am not a regular reader of that I wouldn't know, and that is that there seems to be an attitude that a powerful newspaper has a responsibility to be a little critical of government at all times regardless of what system it might be.

Is this a problem of policy or not?

Mr. Doyle: I think you do have a responsibility, to a certain extent, to be in opposition on your editorial page. I think you have a responsibility to say so when you think something is correct, but I don't think you can ever say "I don't know."

Maybe some do now, even those with general party support, to encourage that responsibility by pointing out what in their judgment is in error, or what in their judgment is wrongdoing.

Mr. Cooper: Just as a matter of policy with the Globe and Mail, if we make a mistake we will admit it, if it is our mistake; and to this extent I was over-simplifying when I said the Telegram had had people on maintenance who were in the Guild and I would correct it by saying that the Telegram after consultation with the Guild reversed their decision.

But my point is still good; that there is interest in the Guild in maintenance work which indeed might colour their sense news.

Senator Prowse: Well, I think this is the thing that I was getting at. With that, I have had people who have said that it was the policy on their paper in editorials that they would never require an editorial writer to write on a subject where he was expressing an opinion to which he was opposed, gather from what you said your men took a professional attitude, and that is that what had to be written, unless it was a matter of great interest with them, they then would write a professional article explaining what was the consensus of your group opinion. Is that correct?

Mr. Doyle: Yes, that is correct.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you do expect people to become prima donnas or take the attitude...

Mr. Doyle: I don't regard them as prima donnas, but if they say they would rather write I think then that is a matter of their conscience, and I respect that.

Senator Prowse: You say you would accept that?

Mr. Doyle: Yes. And as I said, on occasions they do. One occasion that I recall that differed with Mr. Cooper was the question whether we should destroy the housing Toronto Island one year or the next. Mr. Cooper was very strongly opposed on that subject, and we took very strongly opposed positions; Mr. Cooper's based on costs and lack of housing in his particular case, very good causes, and I said, "Well, fine, I'm going to back out." And I did. Then the editorial writer put in a couple of words that made it look a little better and put it in the paper. It was the policy of the paper that people often say, "Why don't you have byline editorials as they do in newspapers in Quebec?" We do have byline newspapers—byline in there at the top of the masthead and it is the byline of the publisher of the paper. So that what appears above the following is the consensus of the viewpoint of the paper so I don't think a person who says, "Well, right, I don't think I agree with that," particularly; I would rather write it myself in any way demeaning himself in doing that.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you regard him as a writer and not because he is expressing his particular opinion and that mains anonymous to the public anyway; is it correct?

Mr. Doyle: Well, he remains anonymous to the public. He is hired as a writer but I do place very high stock on the opinion of the members who are on the board which is why these "High Noons" don't come up too often.

You have people whose intelligence you respect. You can walk in being fairly convinced of the editorial line that we are going to take, and eventually turn on my head by someone else producing facts that will knock me down, and I might also add that it is an infrequent thing with our editorial board to get out away from your typewriter to write an editorial and watch an editorial writer go down to the floor to check a few facts with the reporter who covered the story last night which leads to the editorial today, who in possibly fifteen or twenty minutes would come back and say, "I have a new subject."

This is just not the case, and we allow for things we don't know yet, haven't been written yet, and those are things which we accept.

Senator Prowse: Do you ever use a signed editorial in the editorial pages themselves?

Mr. Doyle: No. I say they are signed by the proprietors of the paper, but in addition to that we do have...

Senator Prowse: In other words, it is always the expression of the paper on the editorial page or in that section reserved for the type of thing?

Mr. Doyle: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Why wouldn't you have or use the device which I think Le Devoir uses where they have signed editorials all the time?

Mr. Doyle: Well, I would be inclined if I wanted to go in that direction to hire a couple of her columnists because after all we say in that editorial is. It is a column telling you what that individual's opinion is. It doesn't even work completely for Mr. Ryan, as you know.

When someone says, "The New York Times say" and you quote something something for their editorial page, and then you turn around and say, "Scotty Reston said this morning," it means two entirely different things. I believe that applies to Canadian newspapers as well.

Senator Prowse: Well, then, you obviously buy the situation that a newspaper in its own right expresses opinion and it doesn't just express the opinions of other people. This is what happens with your editorial pages which in effect are the Globe and Mail's opinion?

Mr. Doyle: Well, it is the collective opinion of a group of people at the Globe and Mail.

Senator Prowse: Maybe you can give us some guidance here. I know one of the problems that concerns us is the development of a very large number of one-newspaper towns. As an example we had one group here who said they felt that they would have to be careful not to get too involved in something because there was only one paper and that perhaps it would be an abuse of their position to take too strong a position.

Would you comment on that?

Mr. Doyle: I think probably one-newspaper towns tend to go in that direction, and I think it's unfortunate. I think perhaps just speaking for myself—and Mr. Cooper may want to give us his judgment on this—I think perhaps in those one-newspaper towns it would be better to take your strong-ranging points or opinions and put them on the editorial page to start the dialogue but make sure you have the space for the people who responded to it. But if you don't specify this you don't have the argument and I don't think the editorials make the great pronouncements because I believe this argument has gone by the board long ago. It is just meant for daily dialogue.

Senator Prowse: In other words, instead of trying to be completely objective, maybe you would be better to admit in there that there is no such thing as being objective?

Mr. Cooper: I hope you will forgive me for repeating it, but it is one of my favourite expressions, that there is no such thing as an objective newspaper. The point I am trying to make is, supposing there was an absolute. Supposing there could possibly be an objective newspaper; where in the whole of Canada would you find one single objective reader? The reader himself will freak out. How many times do we receive letters to the editors saying "How dare you say this." This happens over and over again. There is no objective reader and there is no objective paper.

All we are trying to be is fair, and we try to be argumentative, and admit when we are wrong, and that is the best we can do.

Senator Prowse: Would you say that perhaps, then, the greatest sin that could be committed would be for a person, in trying to be so fair, to do nothing, when a clear expression of opinion was called for?

Mr. Cooper: Yes, but we don't think just by producing a paper we can pre-digest his pabulum.

The Chairman: Mr. Cooper, I would like to ask you about your role in Canada's self-proclaimed national newspaper. The Globe and Mail is Canada's national newspaper according to your brief you say in two ways. One, you are distributed across the country on the day of publication, and the other is that you are designed to meet the needs of readers in all parts of the country.

I suppose you mean specific needs of the readers in all parts of the country as opposed to all of their needs?

Mr. Cooper: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: Well, my question is this. When Mr. Bassett was here he told us that the Telegram was the most quoted newspaper in Canada. Isn't it strange that the Telegram should be more quoted than the Globe and Mail if you are Canada's national newspaper?

Mr. Cooper: It would indeed be strange.

The Chairman: You don't agree with that?

Mr. Cooper: Well, I just say it is strange. I don't know.

The Chairman: In your opinion.

Mr. Cooper: I don't know.

The Chairman: Are you a hockey fan, Mr. Cooper?

Mr. Cooper: Not particularly.

The Chairman: Are you, Mr. Doyle?

Mr. Doyle: Not particularly.

The Chairman: May I ask you a question about hockey? I think the hockey published in the Globe and Mail is pretty good. I have been in Ottawa all week and I still don't know who won the game last night in Pittsburgh, between Oakland and Pittsburgh. I think it is important to note that it was in Pittsburgh and not on the west coast. I would be interested to find out.

Mr. Cooper: Oakland, 3; Pittsburgh, 3.

The Chairman: Well, I would suggest you that copy of the Globe and Mail was purchased somewhere in the middle of the morning because at the Chateau Laurier where I stay, when I buy the Globe and Mail to have with my breakfast at eight o'clock, eight-thirty, those hockey scores are not. Even if the Leafs had played in Toronto last night, at eight o'clock the next morning in the nation's capital, Canada's national newspaper doesn't give you the score of Canada's national game played in the city in which Canada's national newspaper is printed.

This used to grieve me greatly when I lived in Ottawa, when my home was in Ottawa. That the copy of the Globe and Mail that I received at our home was, I believe, a copy something like the copy which is on sale in Toronto about 3½ hours from now. This is not a facetious question, but why don't you arrange that to have your final edition sold in the national capital? Surely the national capital deserves the final edition of a national newspaper.

Mr. Cooper: It is strange and quite a coincidence that I find at the very top of what I have been reading from, it is headed "Ottawa Circulation." When I took over in 1963 I sold 4,200 copies of the paper in Ottawa. I thought that was ridiculous for a national newspaper to sell so few in the nation's capital, so like all new brooms I was pretty ambitious, which was Cooper's folly.

They used to get in those days the 9 o'clock edition and I said that wasn't good enough. Senator Davey wants to know who was between Oakland and Pittsburgh. And I said we have to get delivery of the midnight edition.

Well, we tried, and I am sorry; it didn't work out. Late editions, truck troubles, many complaints. We had two circulation executives here; have nervous breakdowns. We just couldn't make it; the distance was too great to get that copy here, because, Senator, you don't realize, to have the paper on your breakfast table I have to have it in Ottawa at four o'clock in the morning, and even by increasing the trucks from three to fourteen I still couldn't get it out to the bus and get it to be delivered in time.

The Chairman: Well, what about by train or by air?

Mr. Cooper: Well, we tried. The other thing is that there is no airline service, so what we do every day—and this is the copy that I have brought here—is we air express copies of our paper and it should arrive here between eleven and eleven-thirty in the morning.

The Chairman: Well, the Committee meets at ten o'clock.

Mr. Cooper: Well, I am sorry. I can't play games with the time.

The Chairman: Well, I made one suggestion about the masthead and now I will make a second. You should re-examine the original rust you had when you arrived as a new release, because...

Mr. Cooper: What; and have another circulation man in the loony bin! Let me explain. There is another thing you must understand, senator. The extra copies that we do air express here we do as a service. Each copy costs me 22 cents to send and it is on sale at the Chateau Laurier for 15 cents, because I can't obviously go to the grill there and charge 5 cents for the bulk delivery and more for the highly expensive one in the afternoon. So, please, senator, don't get too many people wanting the final edition at 15 cents because I will have to put the price up.

Mr. Fortier: The Montreal Gazette will give you last night's hockey scores.

The Chairman: Well, I often buy the Gazette. How are these papers air-expressed, and at what time?

Mr. Cooper: Well, I don't know the actual details but it is the first available air express. There is a very early plane after midnight but it is no good to us because it doesn't carry newspapers.

The Chairman: Well, it doesn't carry passengers either because I have taken it.

Mr. Cooper: Well, let me finish this argument, senator, and say that in 1963 we sold 400 but now we sell 11,800 in Ottawa and the amazing thing that I have discovered is that they don't buy it for the hockey scores and the baseball scores. I find that people buy the Globe and Mail for the background, the features, and the other articles, and they prefer the Globe and Mail delivered fairly regularly against one that was so hit-and-miss and they never knew when they got it.

The Chairman: Well, I agree with your reply. I think it's good, even if from my point of view it is not a satisfactory reply, because of course you look for more than hockey scores.

Senator McElman: Are you also not an avid football fan?

Mr. Cooper: The only thing I am not, is a baseball fan because it is the baseball scores that give away what time our paper goes to press.

The Chairman: I am interested in the policy which the Globe and Mail has which I think is unique—it may not be, but it certainly is unusual in that you do not honour press release deadlines. Would you comment on that, please, why that is a policy?

Mr. Cooper: Well, one of the reasons is that—I am not quite sure what your profession is, and I have to be rather careful, but let us say the Globe and Mail is not just for public relations people, whether they are described as communication consultants, or whatever.

We take the view that most of them are in business, it is their very business to manufacture and manipulate the news. Their idea is to get something into the paper which we otherwise wouldn't put in, and our policy is that we like to go out and dig our own news.

Now, as has been said earlier today, Canada is mainly an evening-newspaper country, so these smart public relations men got a grand idea. They would have these artificially-imposed release times and they would hand out their stuff the day before, two days before, for release at 2 p.m. on a certain day. That meant the evening papers could get them, study them, write them up, and put them in their main edition and get the first bite.

We were left, the good old Globe and Mail, the paper of record, would come trailing behind. So we said to heck with that. We would get the news and we would publish it when we get it.

The result is now that more often than not the releases are made during the day. The evening papers scramble and we manage to get them out and we have it in the paper. It is as simple as that. We don't like the news being managed; we don't like being told by consultants just when and how we are going to publish the news.

The Chairman: Well, for the record, and I think I must add for the record, that I have, never even in my more political days, put a press release of any kind at any time through the Globe and Mail. I think your answer is an interesting one because while I am sure that much of the public relations material that you receive doesn't qualify as hard news, I am sure there are from time to time hard news releases, things which are legitimate news stories in which times are placed.

Do your honour those?

Mr. Cooper: Well, we honour things like the budget, we honour things like the Carter Commission Report and then we break our necks to get them in. We spend many, many thousands of dollars in Ottawa to get your—in reverse to your hockey scores . . . You take the Carter Commission Report, for instance. We sent not only reporters up but we had editors up, we had people punching the tapes so that the moment it was released we could take it from the Bell headquarters and put it on the data speedphone. From there it went into typesetting in our head office and inside of 40 minutes we had six pages on the Carter Commission report. That is very expensive, but we are prepared to do things like that because, after all, we are involved in timed releases.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if Mr. Cooper will tell us whether or not the Globe and Mail accepts stories from the Canadian Press on a hold-for-release basis.

Mr. Cooper: We do. I think there are certain things that we honour, but...

Mr. Doyle: We have no choice. It is the way the Canadian Press is set up and it is set up in such a way that you are fined if you violate one of their releases. One of the reasons why we would be very unhappy with a press council is because I think possibly, you would find the press council trying to do this type of manipulation to serve the best interests of most papers but not necessarily to get news to people.

Mr. Fortier: So you are obliged when dealing with Canadian Press hold-for-release stories to honour that request?

Mr. Doyle: Yes; with a Canadian Press story. If we had found a story of our own which we could establish we did on our own we would go ahead and release it. If it is Canadian Press' story it is a condition of our belonging to Canadian Press that we honour it.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Cooper, both the Toronto Star and the Toronto Telegram have over the years acquired some suburban weekly news papers because they see this as the area of future newspaper growth. Prior to joining the FP group why was the Globe and Mail not involved in buying similar type of interest?

Mr. Cooper: I guess it must be the public pride; I don't know. We like to think that our publication is a highly specialized one. We don't think it compatible with publishing smaller papers.

I am rather amused by some publisher who shout that they must be independent and must have one independent family newspaper and yet all of the time they are buying up a lot of the small papers around the periphery. They are not compatible.

It is like our being affiliated with CKEY. There was an incompatibility of temperament and we had to get divorced. It just doesn't work, I don't think.

Mr. Fortier: You feel that there was not—was out of character with the Globe and Mail for it to seek to expand into other newspapers?

Mr. Cooper: Well, we could as a corporate enterprise and maybe set up in another country and have somebody inexperienced in running a weekly newspaper, but I didn't want to have any part of that operation, and we just haven't considered this.

Mr. Fortier: What are your views, Mr. Cooper—I am sure the Committee would be very interested in hearing them—your view on multimedia ownership in Canada?

Mr. Cooper: Frankly, I don't like it.

Mr. Fortier: Why?

Mr. Cooper: Well, frankly, I am not keen on any community where there is an excess of opinion confined to one group in many media. I know for instance the radio stations always help us to keep us on our toes.

The Chairman: In what way; in terms of advertising?

Mr. Cooper: Well, they compete for advertising, and they compete for the spot news.

The Chairman: It is in the terms of news you are speaking of?

Mr. Cooper: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: If FP Publications had been actively engaged in the broadcasting field maybe this question should be directed to them.

Webster rather than to you—but can you tell us whether to your knowledge Mr. Webster would have accepted an offer to sell to FP?

Mr. Cooper: I wouldn't know. As I say in the brief he wanted some form of protection for our policy and FP has quite a good reputation for not interfering with individuals.

Senator McElman: Well, you have indicated already that you don't favour multimedia ownership. I think you also indicated you don't favour ownership of media by conglomerates. I appreciate the concern of newspapers to avoid government interference which I share.

Now, with the conglomerate situation which has developed in the United States, conglomerates owning media, and with several examples of it already developing in Canada, is there any point where you see quite aside from existing legislation (the Combines Act), is there any point where you see government intervention here as an essential thing if only to protect the freedom of press as we know it?

Mr. Cooper: I would hate to see direct government intervention. I am not quite sure—this is hypothetical—at what stage anything of this sort could arrive. In Britain they had something but I am a little hazy on the terms, but I know very well that Roy Thomson after consummating his deal with the Times had to go to some government-appointed body for approval, and it could very well be that, well, I think the British situation would have to be pretty dire before I would like to see government intervention.

I don't want to seem completely negative here, but I am not at all enamoured with the idea of a press council. I happen to be chairman of the Commonwealth Press Union and I've been over to England every year and talked with people there, and it isn't the high success that people would have you believe. In later months, they failed miserably in trying to control the Christine Keeler memoirs and...

The Chairman: May I ask you this: could they control the Christine Keeler memoirs?

Mr. Cooper: Well, I don't think—or know how they could. You have to leave the newspapers freedom of the press.

The Chairman: So you think the publication of the Christine Keeler memoirs was in the public interest?

Mr. Cooper: I wouldn't decide that.

The Chairman: Would the Globe and Mail have published them?

Mr. Cooper: No.

Senator Prowse: With the right to make decision as to whether what they were going to publish was in the public interest?

Mr. Cooper: Well, I would like to add this, and then I would cut it off. I would be so scared of a press council being started here and then failing, because it would then open the door for government intervention. I don't think it would work constitutionally but one thing I might suggest you might give some thought to, gentlemen, and this is only off the top of my head—it's not good enough just to knock everything.

Is there any future possibility in setting up and endowing a chair of journalism at a senior university? I don't mean a school of journalism, because we have those, but I was wondering couldn't we have something where they could do research; they could comment; they could survey the whole philosophy and structure of newspapers and where they could convey the whole philosophy and structure of newspapers away from government interference and away from the public interest. Maybe we could establish something like Columbia University in New York; something where they could do interesting research and hold seminars and studies like the London School of Economics.

I believe that could be quite a useful service to the newspapers and the communications media of Canada. I am a little hazy about the financial foundations and a little hazy about their personnel, but I would like to see it go in that direction.

Maybe I am selfish. The academics seem to like us, so perhaps that is one of the reasons.

Senator Prowse: Well, there is just one thought. I remember when there was an outfit by the name of Technocracy that was going to run the world for us and maybe some of you can remember it.

What they were going to do was they weren't going to leave it to politicians, they weren't going to leave it to presidents; they were going to get engineers to solve all the engineering problems, and lawyers to solve the legal problems, and that everything was going to be run by experts. And the only place that it seemed to break down was they could never find out who the devil was going to direct the experts. I am a little bit afraid that your suggestion might have the same faults.

Mr. Cooper: Well, we have to do a lot of soul-searching, but we don't do it publicly. It could very well be that there might be some merits to something along this line.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Cooper, may I thank you for an interesting and useful presentation. In a sense I feel that I must apologize, for, like myself, the senators are inhibited by the clock on the wall. They realize—and I want to underline for their benefit—that we are meeting at eight o'clock tonight. I want to thank you, Mr. Cooper, and the other representatives from the Globe and Mail, and I again wish to thank you, Mr. Malone.

The Committee adjourned.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this evening we are going to receive a submission from the Canadian Labour Congress. I apologize for the delay in the beginning. I should introduce the people who are here with me. On my immediate right is Mr. Donald MacDonald, the President of the Canadian Labour Congress; on his immediate right is Mr. Jack Williams a CLC director of public relations. On my immediate left is Mr. Joe Morris the Executive Vice-President and on his left is Mr. Andy Andras who is the Director of Legislation and Government Employees Departments.

Mr. MacDonald, we received your brief a number of weeks ago and it has been circulated, read and studied by the Senators. They will ask you questions on the contents of the brief and perhaps questions on material which is not contained in the brief. As well they may ask you questions on the oral statement which you are now free to make. There is no obligation to make an opening statement but if you wish, sir, you may take 10, 12 or 15 minutes to do so.

Mr. Donald MacDonald, President, Canadian Labour Congress: Thank you very much Senator Davey.

Honourable Senators it is not my intention to give any lengthy opening statement but perhaps I will give you a summary of the submission which we have sent to you and which I believe you have all read. I believe it might be in order to summarize it at this time.

As you no doubt have noticed we have suggested that the quality of material used by the Canadian mass media should be improved and controlled outlets diversified. We urge greater use of Canadian talent and materials and propose that active efforts could be initiated to seek methods of developing more outlets and more effective competition.

We also say that in some instances unions have been discriminated against by the refusal of outlets to sell time and that reporting of labour events is often skimpy and distorted.

We go on to point out that although trade unionists and their families constitute about one-third of the entire Canadian population they are either totally disregarded or treated as some alien force in the community.

In terms of news content and editorial opinion it is our view that Canadian newspapers tend to treat organized labour at best as some kind of a necessary evil. We emphasize the fact that never before have so many people been exposed to so vast an array of information through so many sources. Because of this the mass media is vested with a public interest which in our view is preponderant to any private or commercial interest.

We then turned our attention to the concentration of ownership and have stated that any monopoly or near monopoly is inherently dangerous in itself because of the tendency of power to corrupt. Where monopolies or near monopolies exist in the field of communications we feel that the danger is very much greater because of the reliance of the community on the newspaper as its principal source of information.

We suggest that energetic steps should be taken to provide alternative sources of information.

We feel that known advances in technology might facilitate the launching of new newspapers and we propose an intense investigation of methods to encourage such ventures.

We also expressed the opinion that consideration might be given to the encouragement of ownership by non-commercial interests and we emphasize the damage caused by publication of non-profit organizations by the share increases in postal rates.

We see considerable danger in the media outlets being owned by persons or groups whose primary interests are in other areas and suggest that there should be a clear separation.

ration to avoid even the appearance of a conflict of interest.

We further state that a newspaper or local radio or TV station which is owned in common with the papermill for example would hardly be expected to be well disposed to reporting fully the problems of water pollution. Not necessarily because of any direct influence that might be brought to bear but because obviously it would perhaps feel it wise not to do so.

With regard to quality and sources of material we say that there has been and is a strong foreign influence. With a large volume of the material Canadians receive originating in the United States—foreign influence on the content of Canadian newspapers is probably seen at its worst in the handling of international news. Most of our newspapers are heavily dependent upon the Canadian Press service both as its source of international news and of Canadian news outside their own communities. We suggest that the Canadian Press is little more than a collecting and editing agency. It originates comparatively little material of its own and that its weakness in this regard may well be a reflection of the unwillingness of Canadian publishers who own and control it to devote editorial services and expenditures of the proportion necessary so that the Canadian public is to be given good service.

We then turn to broadcasting and say that the CBC has made some effort to use Canadian talent but the interest of private broadcasters in this respect, as far as we can observe, is almost microscopic. We further go on to say that altogether too many Canadians of artistic merit have been driven abroad because there seems to have been no place for their ability in Canada. If ever the Americanization of Canada has been a problem, the private broadcasters have been the chief agents for its enhancement. It is not that these private broadcasters have been interested in the dissemination of such programmes because they were American but because they were cheap, popular and readily available and it is easier to make a profit from them.

We finally express our opinion that the CBC facilities should be expanded; and in the area of film we recommend the expansion of the National Film Board rather than a reduction in its operations as has been recently indicated.

Lastly we say that there should be greater recognition of Canadian commercial film companies. This, Mr. Chairman, is a very, very brief summary.

The Chairman: It is a good summary.

Mr. MacDonald: As you know it is not reflective of all that is contained in our memorandum but we are prepared, of course, to try and respond to any questions that might arise on what we have submitted. I personally don't claim any particular expertise but we will be pleased to answer any questions.

The Chairman: Mr. MacDonald would you like our questions to be directed at you or at the other members?

Mr. MacDonald: It doesn't matter.

The Chairman: Perhaps they can be directed to you and if you wish you may direct them to any one of your colleagues.

Mr. MacDonald: Fine.

The Chairman: I think perhaps Mr. Fortier has the first question.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MacDonald, do any of your affiliated and chartered organizations publish newspapers. Do you read many of them?

Mr. MacDonald: I suppose that is a relative term. I read a relatively limited number and scan a few more but probably as you are aware there are literally hundreds of them at the various levels of our structure.

Mr. Fortier: But you do make it a point to read some of them?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Now, this question you may either field yourself or direct it to one of your colleagues. Do you know how the publishers of those trade union papers assure objectivity and expression of diverse points of view in their publications?

Mr. MacDonald: I don't think there is any general answer to that. As I say, there are publications at all levels and normally those publications are not regarded as newspapers in the ordinary sense of the word. Some of them are shop papers, or local union papers, area papers, district papers and so on and normally they regard it as a means of dissemination of information to the membership.

Mr. Fortier: Of information?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Of information concerning news events which may be of interest to their members. Is that correct?

Mr. MacDonald: Policies as well. Policies play a very important part in the content in most of our publications. Events as well, you are quite right; developments, and this sort of thing; they vary all over the lot.

Mr. Fortier: In any one of these publications to your knowledge is there room for letters to the editors?

Mr. MacDonald: Some yes, some no.

Mr. Fortier: Again, to your knowledge in those where there is no space made available for letters to the editor is that because there are no letters or is it because it is not a policy of the paper?

Mr. MacDonald: I think it would be because it is not a policy of the paper. Many of them are extremely limited in size and scope as to coverage and many of them are produced on a voluntary basis. This is done without any staff, in fact, with the majority of them. That doesn't hold true when you get above the local or district levels. When you get up to the level of our national affiliates and sometimes even one echelon lower you will find that there might be paid individuals sometimes.

Of course, at the top level there are usually paid staff, but very small ones.

Mr. Fortier: Now going on to an area where you possibly have more personal knowledge. Do you read newspapers daily?

Mr. MacDonald: Some. I may as well be more precise. I should state to you, two.

Mr. Fortier: Which ones?

Mr. MacDonald: The Globe and Mail and the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. Fortier: To your comments, the comments which we find in your brief with respect to newspaper treatment of trade union news, in your personal experience can you relate that statement to the Globe and Mail and to the Ottawa Citizen?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Can you give us examples or instances?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, let me say that by comparison to the coverage of news of practically every other aspect of human endeavour of large groups within society, that the coverage by both newspapers is quite sparse on the news coverage. Having said that, I should go on, in all fairness, to say that the Globe and Mail on the other hand, has probably the best informed and the most competent labour reporter in Canada, when it comes to labour material that is covered by that individual.

The Ottawa Citizen, its coverage of labour news—this is labour news in the general sense I am talking about—is so little that it is of no consequence. It would be pretty difficult for an ordinary Ottawan to ever discover the fact that the Canadian Labour Congress exists by reading the Ottawa Citizen.

Mr. Fortier: Well, let us move from the realm of generalities to the realm of specifics. In recent days or in recent weeks what new about labour was not published in either one of these newspapers which in your opinion should have been published?

Mr. MacDonald: I don't know what you would like to take as an example, a month perhaps. I would hazard a guess, just an educated guess, that we produce out of our public relations department—and the director is here—an average of two major press releases a week. Is that right Jack?

Mr. Jack Williams (Director of Public Relations of The Canadian Labour Congress): On an average.

Mr. MacDonald: I don't ever recall having seen any. We regard it as important news because we wouldn't put out a press release otherwise. I don't recall ever having seen one of those in the Ottawa Citizen, or anything on the subject matter.

Mr. Fortier: Could you tell the Committee from memory the subject matter of one of these press releases which did not reach the Citizen?

Mr. MacDonald: Probably there is nothing in the last six months which we have said and written as much about as labour's position versus the Prices and Incomes Commission. Anyone who would try to get an impression of our position on what we have said, what we have written from the Ottawa Citizen would have a pretty difficult time. I don't know how many statements and releases we have put out on it.

Mr. Fortier: I read something about it the week. I don't know whether it was in the Citizen but did you not have a meeting in Toronto earlier this week or the end of last week?

Mr. MacDonald: No.

Mr. Fortier: Was it not the CLC?

Mr. MacDonald: No.

Mr. Fortier: Well, there was something in the newspaper says this week emanating from labour. It emanated from labour and its reaction to...

Mr. MacDonald: There have been general references made in editorials about labour's attitude.

Senator Prowse: Or in wrap-up stories.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, general stories.

The Chairman: Was that in the Toronto press?

Mr. Fortier: No, I am referring to the Ottawa press.

The Chairman: You read this story in the Ottawa press?

Mr. Fortier: Oh, definitely. It may not have emanated from the CLC. It may have emanated from another labour body.

The Chairman: Does one of the gentlemen on the side have something to say?

Mr. Murray Cotterill: I think he is referring to the fact that the United Automobile Workers had a meeting; but I am not too surprised that from reading the paper he doesn't know the difference.

Mr. Fortier: I have no answer for that one. What you are telling the Committee is that over a period of six months an average of two press releases...

Mr. MacDonald: No, that isn't what I said. I said one month as a yardstick because I wanted to get it within some framework in order to try and give you as precise an answer as I could.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: I said one month. It might be also true—is it true over six months?

Mr. Williams: Over six months as far as the Citizen is concerned, I would say yes.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your opinion, Mr. MacDonald that there is a conscious effort on the part of the Ottawa Citizen to abstain from publishing the news relating to labour? Is that what you are saying?

Mr. MacDonald: No. It isn't.

Mr. Fortier: Well, how do you explain it?

Mr. MacDonald: I don't know their motivation.

Mr. Fortier: Have your public relations people ever attempted to remedy it?

Mr. MacDonald: The Ottawa Citizen is only one of dozens of daily newspapers in Canada. Only one and I get about Canada a great deal—not only Canada but many countries. A great deal and our memorandum didn't centre in on any one particular newspaper.

As a matter of fact if you were to ask me the question by way of local parochial coverage I think that the Ottawa Citizen is comparable to most newspapers in Canada. I don't want to lose proper balance in...

Mr. Fortier: No, but I wanted you to deal with my first question. Those newspapers with which you have first hand knowledge. Let me ask you this. These press releases, are they distributed to all major newspapers in Canada?

Mr. Williams: They are through Canadian Press and through the Press Gallery here. They are fed directly to all Ottawa papers.

Mr. Fortier: Directly to all Ottawa papers?

Mr. Williams: Directly to all Ottawa papers, through the Gallery and including CP of course, (which we figure is our basic coverage) and to a number of key papers by mail but that really is meaningless because it is merely for background work. By the time it reaches them it's been handled by the wire.

The Chairman: Are you sure Mr. Williams that CP is putting your stuff on the wire?

Mr. Williams: I think that CP carries a story on practically every release we put out.

The Chairman: So your grievance is not with CP?

Mr. Williams: No. We may have grievances with CP from time to time. We may complain about the accuracy of their particular story or something like that—but, basically, no. We have rather a strict policy on releases and we make it a point not to put out a release unless we feel it is really a legitimate story, and because of that we get a bit sensitive when they don't receive any attention.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you are saying that by and large newspapers in Canada—I don't want to exaggerate so if I do please correct me—but by and large, newspapers in Canada—you have dealt with the Ottawa situation—do not carry those press releases which emanate from the CLC and are handed to the Canadian Press right here in Ottawa?

Mr. MacDonald: Some do, some don't. Some will carry some and some will carry none.

Mr. Fortier: Would you elaborate somewhat and tell us in precise terms as possible which ones do and which ones don't. Are you able to do that?

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, dear heavens no. In fact, I doubt if I could even from memory tell you the daily newspapers that I read.

Mr. Fortier: I think this would be very important.

Mr. MacDonald: But, I will tell you what I will do. This is the direction of the question it might be helpful. I came originally from a small city down in Cape Breton which has one newspaper. Its editorial policy is very unsympathetic towards us, but I notice, when I see the thing, that it carries practically everything that we release.

We don't, as Mr. Williams has said, we just don't put out news releases by the barrage method because we are very careful and very selective. It would be pretty difficult to find anything in the two major newspapers in Saskatchewan at any time. I think probably if I were to assault some political dignitary it might receive coverage.

The Chairman: Particularly in Saskatchewan!

Mr. Williams: May I add something there. I think in all fairness it should be said that we haven't done a detailed study but we are sure that in the French press in Canada we get far better shake than we do in the English press.

Mr. MacDonald: Right.

Mr. Fortier: You say you have not made a detailed study and thank you for making that point. You say you have not made a detailed study of this absence of news in Canadian newspapers but it seems to me that your assertion is a very bold and all embracing one and it is terribly serious if as Mr. MacDonald indicates there is this conscientious effort on the part of newspaper publishers in Canada not to publish news which emanates from the CLC. This is in fact what you are saying.

Mr. MacDonald: I must say in my own self defence that I did not make that assertion. I did not say that there was a conscientious effort. At one point you asked me a question of that nature and I was very careful to qualify it.

Mr. Fortier: Well, please correct me.

Mr. MacDonald: I told you that I wasn't aware of any motivations. In some cases it might be hostility, it might be conscious but in other cases it might not be at all.

Mr. Fortier: But, the end result is the same—non-publication of the news?

Mr. MacDonald: In many cases it might be apathy, disinterest and all of it, as we point out in the brief, is a matter of selective editing and there might not be any conscious prejudice on the part of those who are doing the selection.

Mr. Fortier: You and I do not know what motivates the publisher?

Mr. MacDonald: No.

Mr. Fortier: I agree but I would like to get it straight—get it very clear on the record because of the assertions which you make in your brief. On page 9, paragraph 20 you say:

"In terms of news content and editorial opinion, Canada's daily newspapers tend to treat organized labour at best as some kind of a necessary evil."

Earlier on in the same paragraph you say: "News about trade union activities is skimpy or distorted." These are very serious—I would term them accusations, but now you come before this Committee and you say "Well, we have never really made a study" and I think it would be very useful if you could make a study, I suggest Mr. Chairman, and submit it to this Committee. Take a two or three month period and the number of press releases which you handed to Canadian Press during that time and how many of them were published in how many Canadian newspapers across the land. I think this would be very important.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, the Canadian Labour

Congress is in itself a national labour body. The press releases I am talking about are those emanating from our own headquarters here in Ottawa. We have 116 affiliates throughout this country—right across the length and breadth of this country.

Mr. Fortier: But you are speaking for them are?

Mr. MacDonald: That's right and that is the point I want to make right at this moment. I would suggest that the majority of those produce news and that they do things that are worthy of coverage and attention and have the public interest.

The Chairman: May I just ask at this point, talking about that kind of news which is worthy of coverage and so on—presumably you are not now referring to the kind of press release you are putting out from Ottawa which states the CLC's position on—well, you mentioned the Commission on Prices and Incomes and so on. Do these 116 affiliates also put out press releases?

Mr. MacDonald: Some of them, yes.

The Chairman: On issues of the day?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. We have some of our people from our affiliates here tonight.

The Chairman: Well, it might be interesting if we could have some of them make comments. They would be most welcomed.

Mr. Cotterill: Well, Senator Davey, I find myself in a rather difficult position in answering this because naturally the Congress briefs with the question of the Congress itself in the media. If I were to make a comment I would say that my chief critique of the press in this question of press releases would be that with very few exceptions the press has very little interest in, and seldom assigns anybody who is a specialist, a competent specialist in the area of collective bargaining—and I think that expression rather than union.

You can't have collective bargaining without the union. The simple fact of life is the collective bargaining process in Canada affects our economy—I hate to say a thing like this in Ottawa—but I think it affects our economy more than Government policy. What happens to people's wages, what happens to people's job securities, their pensions and so on, and things of this sort really have a very basic effect on the Canadian economy.

I think generally speaking the media in this country treat the whole collective bargaining process merely as a possible area of conflict which is worthy of headlines.

Before Mr. Jack Williams became the public relations officer of this Congress, he was essentially the collective bargaining specialist at the Canadian Press. I know of no person in Canadian Press today who gets stories regarding the collective bargaining process, to evaluate their importance and significance, or anything else.

In other words a collective bargaining story is only important really if there is a potential strike. The fact that 95 per cent of the settlements are without strikes and that these settlements have a tremendous effect upon the economy and the tax income of Canada are completely unrelated.

There are only a few newspapers in some of the larger centres who have anyone who specializes in the subject. In fact, many of the newspapers make a point of making certain that nobody becomes a specialist. I would say that the problem with the media today is in dealings with the collective bargaining process. I say that instead of "union" because after all unions are only one side of it. They are only one side of the collective bargaining process because there are many large companies in Canada who have collective grievances too. There is very little reporting in depth of what is one of the most important aspects of the entire economic system in this country, except a series of completely isolated and completely uncoordinated strikes or potential strikes.

Mr. Fortier: I suppose the view—you may agree sir—the view which has been expressed before this Committee finds some relevance here—that good news is no news?

Mr. Cotterill: No, I don't believe that is true. The media is going through a very difficult time. We have television with a particular form of news and if there is somebody being shot in the head or if there is a fire, or if there is time to get the cameras to a demonstration, this sort of news appears.

I am not being nasty about this but every media has its own built in limitations. If you are going to get a picture on television you obviously have to get a camera. On radio you just don't have the time. The CBC has time to go into depth broadcasting but the average commercial station considers that their public service is over when they present the news in a headline form once an hour. Its very difficult to do anything in depth in a headline and in many newspapers, they try to compete by having headlines which affect sales but have very little relation to the story.

This is the problem that the media faces and I haven't any answer except to say one thing, Senator; I am quite sure that Murphy's law applies to the newspapers as well as to anything else, namely that if a thing can happen it probably will which is a very sound law of politics or anything else.

For example the T. Eaton company in Toronto, a few weeks ago decided to make a major move and lay-off all its senior employees and hire a contractor to do the maintenance and kindly offered their senior employees jobs with the maintenance company at $1 an hour less. I am quite certain that the Newspaper Guild in Toronto would not have any difficulty being able to report it in its own publications. The three Toronto papers very conveniently ignored this story. This doesn't strike me as being terribly wicked but why should any newspaper reporter or editor, or anybody else in the lower echelons really stick their neck out? They know that the purpose of the newspaper is to wrap up advertising with news and they do a very conscientious job.

My criticism is that we have very important social developments. The media as a general rule never even imagined for one moment that there were going to be riots in the ghettos in the United States until they happened. From that moment on all you had to do was to have an African haircut, a costume, and light a match and you were a cinch for the front page. This suddenly became news.

This is the sort of thing that really worries me—that from the labour unions' point of view I think the whole collective bargaining process is treated in a very incoordinated manner, very shabbily, and that very few of our newspapers nowadays will allow a reporter to become a specialist in various subjects.

May I just say one more thing to conclude. Did it ever occur to you that it is very very strange that our radio, our television and our newspapers can print the stock market figures every day when a very small proportion of the Canadian public are really interested in stock markets figures, yet I know of no newspaper in Canada that prints the wage rates every day despite the fact that the vast majority of the Canadian people really depend upon wage rates and don't depend upon stock market quotations for a living. just strikes me that the media aren't really trying to cover this thing in depth properly.

Mr. Fortier: But there is an association you well know which publishes stock market prices.

Mr. Cotterill: Oh, yes I know that.

Mr. Fortier: Well, why would not the unions publish through an association of some sort, the wage rates?

Mr. Cotterill: Well, you are talking here of...

Mr. Fortier: And make sure that they are handed to the newspapers.

Mr. Cotterill: For a very good reason suppose because we have been under the naive illusion that the newspapers like to be for news and supply it rather than having supplied to them.

Mr. Fortier: Are you suggesting that the newspapers dig for stock market quotations?

Mr. Cotterill: I know they don't and so you. I am suggesting that if it is necessary other people to supply the news well then suggest that the scope of your Committee investigations should be everybody and not merely the media.

The Chairman: Are you suggesting that the newspapers should stop publishing stock market quotations?

Mr. Cotterill: No I am not.

The Chairman: Are you suggesting that they should start publishing wage rates every day?

Mr. Cotterill: I am suggesting that it is a peculiar thing. All I am trying to say Senator is this—it is a very peculiar thing to me that the vast majority of people in Canada today are no longer independent businessmen, they are no longer people who clip coupons as my grandfather used to call them, are no longer farmers. They are people who depend on their entire lives and their children's lives and their wives' lives on the wages they get.

Mr. Fortier: Many of them depend on the stock market quotations.

Mr. Cotterill: Not very many to be honest with you. The people who are interested in the stock market quotations are not the people who built the industry in Canada.

people who built the industry in Canada are men who know what they want to build, who build after them, who build and are not terribly interested in whether there is a slight fluctuation of a few pennies on the stock market.

Mr. Fortier: The majority of wage earners are not interested in the stock market?

Mr. Cotterill: I am suggesting that the majority of the wage earners are not terribly interested in the stock market quotations. That is what I said. Please don't put words in my mouth. I said they are not interested in the stock market quotations but they are terribly interested in the wage rates. That is all I said.

Mr. Francis Eady: I would like to give a little bit of an example of the type of problem that we face in Canada.

Take the question that President MacDonald raised about the Prices and Incomes Commission. We have been trying to get across and our director of public relations is here—we have been trying to get a message across to the Canadian public regarding the fight of hospital workers.

There is a great deal of talk about hospitals and how much it costs per day in a hospital. We have people struggling along. We have just had a dispute in Saskatchewan where we have been trying to get the people the minimum wage of a dollar seventy-five an hour but we had a strike. As soon as the strike hit, there was lots of news that a hospital in Prince Albert and a hospital in Estevan were on strike. But the issues involved were why these hospital workers were out on strike, what were the economic conditions of those workers, how come that it was possible in Estevan to work in a hospital and earn less money if you had a certain number of dependents than you would if you lived on welfare. These are the types of problems that the people should know about.

For example, our President Mr. MacDonald, has tried to take issue with Dr. Young of the Prices and Incomes Commission. It is all very well to have guidelines, but guidelines limiting increases to say 7% as applied to a hydro worker who is relatively wealthy compared to a hospital worker have no meaning. We have been trying to get this issue across to the Canadian people.

What are we to do about the unpaid worker? Unless there is a strike, unless there is a picket line and preferably if there is a little bit of violence outside the papers that have an informed newspaper reporter—if you ring the city desk and say it is CUPE the first question you will receive is "What is CUPE?" You tell them that it is the Canadian Union of Public Employees and you literally start from there in explaining the issues because unfortunately the reporters and the representatives of the Newspaper Guild know that on most of the average daily papers outside of the main metropolitan centres, there is no training system to provide informed reporters who can specialize in the important areas which Mr. Cotterill was mentioning—collective bargaining which is part of everybody's life.

For example, I don't expect, to take Mr. Cotterill's point, that they would report the 12 employees of X municipality who reached a certain settlement, but I think it might be important news for the citizens in general when our union makes a settlement to know what the wage rates are and what the settlement was and also what impact it is going to have on the mill rate. It is very very hard to get this information at present.

The Chairman: The facts you spoke about in the Saskatchewan hospital case were not new to me and therefore I must have read them somewhere in the daily press.

Mr. Eady: Yes. Once it hit, once there is a strike, there was a great deal of news.

The Chairman: Which is the point you are making?

Mr. Eady: Yes. While we were building up and trying our best to avoid the strike and when we were for example, in one case—I think it was in Prince Albert—agreeing that we shouldn't allow garbage to pile up—normally our people don't cross their own picket lines but we arranged that our garbage collectors would go in and pick it up—that wasn't news. If we'd smashed a window, boy, it would have been news very quickly.

Senator Prowse: Or if you made the garbage pile up it would have been news.

Mr. Eady: If we would have let the garbage pile up, it would have been news—yes. They would have said "how can you treat the poor people in the homes like this" but yes the poor people in the homes, as you know Senator Davey, are very often the fathers and mothers and brothers and sisters of other union members in Prince Albert.

The Chairman: Well, I can't speak for the Committee, I can only speak for myself. I take the point of the brief on this question of coverage and I sympathize with it. I believe the point that Mr. Fortier was driving at—I am not being critical of the brief Mr. MacDonald—but it would be helpful to us if you could be more specific as Mr. Eady has said and give us some specific examples.

Mr. Andy Andras, Director of Legislation and Government Employees Departments: It isn't necessary to be specific.

The Chairman: Why not?

Mr. Andras: We are dealing here in institutional terms. We came before you and said something to this effect. We are an institution with one million six hundred thousand members. You take them and their dependents and it would make up a quarter to a third of the Canadian population. We have been here since Confederation and before. We play an active part in the life of Canada. We are as much an institution in Canada as the churches, co-operatives, women's institutes, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and everybody else.

You referred Mr. Chairman to paragraph 19 and 20 if I remember correctly and I refer you to paragraphs 22 and 23 where we report on a Commission in the United States known as a Commission on the Freedom of the Press and in paragraph 23 it gives five criteria of a good press.

I draw your attention to item number 3 which is as follows:

"The projection of a representative picture of the constituent groups in the society,"

I, as a functionary in the Canadian Labour Congress, have coming to me, year in and year out, high school and university students who are writing essays or a thesis on trade union matters given to them by their teachers. These are youngsters who have grown up in Canada who presumably read the press—at least some of them must—their unawareness of the trade union as an institution is beyond belief.

It is not a matter of strikes, it is not a matter of garbage, it is a matter of an awareness that there exists in Canada an institution which represents directly a quarter of the Canadian people and has a pervasive influence on their lives.

You can read the Canadian press and listen to Canadian radio and watch Canadian television, and read the magazines from now until the cows come home and you will get at best a distorted picture of what the labour movement of Canada stands for. This is our criticism.

It is no use asking for specifics because specifics don't matter a damn.

The Chairman: I would just say in answer to that, Mr. Andras, that we have had many publishers come before us and very often in their briefs they make the most general kind of statements. Wherever possible, we have asked them to be specific. I would say to you as well in reply that we have decided that this study would be enhanced if instead of simply calling a string of media people, that is publishers and broadcasters and so on, are indeed of the working press, it would be useful if we called men who were nationally prominent in communications and organizations who, for one reason or another, had particular interest in the media.

Now, we have had only a few of the organizations but there will be many more coming in the course of the hearings. Each of these organizations and institutions think that it is as important as yours. I take the point which Mr. Cotterill was making about the number of people whose lives are affected by your movement but I think it is fair to say that in terms of your institutional thrust, all of the workers are as concerned about this as you are.

While I take your point about the importance of the institutional thrust and, please believe me, I do, I must say in terms of the ultimate report which hopefully we will produce, it will not be enough for us to deal in vague generalities. We will have to have specific instances.

Mr. Andras: Well, with respect, Mr. Chairman, it is not a vague generality. I am suggesting to you that it is not a matter only of counting column inches. It is a matter of seeing the net result of newspaper effort—not the newspapers, we are talking about the media in general—and I think it is unrealistic to single out the papers and to let other media off.

The Chairman: Yes, you are right.

Mr. Andras: They are all in this and as you have heard from our President and others there is a variation of the quality of the press of its coverage and it is inevitable.

There are large papers and small ones and those with large resources are better off the same applies with radio stations and television stations. What we are concerned about here, is for an understanding by the public. This is difficult to measure in specific terms—by whether or not the Ottawa Citizen or the Journal or the Glace Bay Gazette carries so many inches of space. It is not only a matter of inches it is a matter of what they do.

Let me just proceed on this. I am not making an individual comparison with my own President because it is not good to do so. I read three papers a day.

The Chairman: Which three?

Mr. Andras: The Montreal Gazette, because it is my native city, the Ottawa Citizen and the Toronto Globe. The two major metropolitan areas and the town where I live. This to me seems to make sense.

The Chairman: The town where you live?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Chairman, I was born and raised in Montreal and by comparison to my home town Ottawa is not a city. However, that is not a criticism of Ottawa it is a question of relativity really.

The Chairman: I quite agree with you.

Mr. Andras: I have been living here since 1940 and there is nothing pejorative about my comparison. I want to point this out which is something which you are aware of—and I am not trying to teach my grandmother how to cook an egg—but you take any fair size city newspaper in Canada and examine its contents—we call them newspapers—it is a generic term—but it is not only a newspaper. It caters to a great many tastes, a great many interests, and it provides more than news in the dictionary sense of that term. For example all the three papers that I read and those that I see in my travels—all of us—all my colleagues and myself go across this country from coast to coast and read the local papers—you will find that on Thursday there is a women's section in these papers. It may run from one to three or four pages and on Saturday in certainly the local paper, and in the Toronto metropolitan papers, you have a church or a religious section.

You have a daily astrological section; you have daily advice to the lovelorn and to other such pathetic people who must go to the public press for advice on how to conduct their lives; you have an infinite number of predictions to the interest of readers. You have not in any paper of Canada, and I will say this without having read all of them, any concerned and concrete and consistent effort to inform the readers of those papers, no matter where they are, that there is a very complex Canadian institution known as organized labour—that it doesn't only engage in collective bargaining, it does many other things.

There is no effort on the part of any newspaper that I have read in Canada to do as consistently about labour as they do for women, for the churches, for international affairs, for those who think their lives are guided by the stars...

Senator Prowse: Or bridge players?

Mr. Andras: Or bridge players, chess players and so on.

The Chairman: I take your point but what troubles me is this. Surely there are members of the CLC, of the unions across the country, who are interested in astrology, who are interested in advice to the lovelorn and who are interested in the women's pages.

Mr. Joseph Morris (Executive Vice-President of The Canadian Labour Congress): But they are also interested in the trade union movement and that part of their interest is not being satisfied.

Now, you can go from one end of the country to the other, as Mr. MacDonald and other of our colleagues have said—I am a great traveller as well. This is necessary in our business and I am an avid newspaper reader. I read four papers. I read the Montreal Gazette, I read the Journal, the Globe and Mail and the Vancouver Province. I read the Vancouver Province because that is my natural habitat.

They also have a good labour reporter. He is one of the three or four best in Canada. Almost every day they have a story on labour but that is only because they have a labour reporter who is assigned specifically to that beat. There are very few newspapers in Canada that have a man who is specifically assigned to the labour beat. Most of the stories that are being written on labour are rewrite stories. Many of them don't reflect, as has been stated here, the real problems that surrounded the real question that is being written for public consumption.

A case in point is our position on the Prices and Incomes Commission. You can read occasional editorials of how they are going to handle the question of prices and incomes and in every case the position of labour is not stated as was stated by labour or the CLC. It is only somebody's opinion as to what they think we mean. It is not what we actually mean.

This is what happens everytime and this is the biggest criticism that we have, the handling of labour news. What it comes down to is that it is not written by somebody who knows the business, it is not written specifically for that section of the public that is interested in labour.

They write columns on stamps for those who are interested in stamps and columns on chess for those who are interested in chess but in our case it is just simply written by somebody who is doing a rewrite story that he has picked up from some place else.

Another thing about newspapers in Canada. Sometimes you can read a story in the Vancouver papers on labour as on some other things and three or four days later you may read that same story in another version in the Ottawa papers. These are real problems and I think this is a valid criticism that could not be measured on the number of inches of space.

As Mr. Andras says it is not a question of how much coverage you get, it's the quality of the coverage and the story that is being conveyed, the story that is being reflected in almost every instance as labour news is not labour news. It is an editorializing of the labour situation.

The Chairman: It occurs to me that perhaps I am, as Chairman, giving perhaps too wide a latitude to our guests in terms of the length of your answers and to ourselves, Senators, in terms of issues that we specifically want to talk about.

This question of, to quote your brief, skimpy or distorted coverage of labour matters is only one matter we want to talk about so I don't want to be rude, and I am not being critical, nor do I want to cut short the discussion, but I would just remind all of us that there are other matters.

I have several Senators that have indicated that they would like to ask questions and I will turn to them in a moment but there was a gentleman who I think is one of your people who would like to say a few words. May I have your name please?

Mr. Robert Bouchard: I happen to be one of those who read papers in a different country I guess, Le Devoir and La Presse, among others—I would like to carry on in French if I may.

The Chairman: Well, I am afraid we do not have our interpreter tonight but I am sure some of us will understand, and I am sure that Mr. Fortier will.

Mr. Bouchard: CLC is formed of French speaking members as well as English ones.

The Chairman: Well, you have made your point and I am embarrassed to say that our interpreters are not here this evening. Some of us will understand and certainly Mr. Fortier will; so, if you prefer, go ahead.

Mr. Fortier: You may speak French, of course.

Mr. Bouchard: In giving my testimony, I shall not talk about the big daily papers, only because it has always been said of such papers as La Presse, for example, that their reporters on union affairs are fairly competent, and fairly well versed in union matters or rather in union issues. As a result, their reporting has been fairly well executed, on the whole. At Le Devoir, at the time when Émile Garneau was union correspondent for that paper, there were a great many faults, the union affairs coverage, but it appears that some journalist has been submitting copy that is somewhat better than what we used to see a few years ago, and Mrs. Gagnon has gone over to the Montreal Star, as we know.

In my opinion, the quality of the union reporting obviously depends on the ability of the person who writes the copy. On daily papers, where it is possible to hire people with knowledge of the subject, they succeed in providing good, intelligently presented union news that gives the readers an accurate view whereby they can understand what is going on in the community.

But the problem of bad union coverage or biased or anti-union reporting is mainly to be found elsewhere, and as evidence of this Mr. Davey, let us discuss the question of newspapers and the other media—radio and television—in an area such as northwestern Quebec. With regard to two weeklies there, for example, "Le Quotidien" in Val d'Or and "La Frontière" in Noranda, it is common knowledge in Rouyn-Noranda that the Noranda company took over financial control of the local weeklies on or about May 10 and 1965. It was revealed—and not denied—that the editor of the newspaper, Jean-Pierre Bonneville, owed the company $65,000, a debt arising out of the financing of the paper. There are two papers, the "Rouyn-Noranda Press" and the Noranda "La Frontière", and he was obviously a fellow who succeeded in getting credit and subsidies from the biggest mining company in the area, and the biggest employer, because he was sympathetic to the company's ideas and just as deliberately anti-union. Quite a situation. A company managed to apply a muzzle, to cover up its anti-union attitudes, because it is in financial control of business. In my opinion, this should be banned, as requested in our brief.

With respect, I submit that your Committee should urge or apply strict measures to prevent employers from buying up communications media in such areas, where newspapers, at least, can barely survive without the support of big employers like that.

It is extremely difficult to compete because, of course, the market is small and newspapers are only just get by; all the writers and editors would be forced to sell advertising space to local merchants. All of which means that they are usually hard up, too.

Fortunately, in this same area, there is KRN-TV, which belongs to the Gourd interests—David, Armand Gourd—who are already well known for their more liberal attitudes; otherwise, the balance would be completely upset. I could go on to tell you some places in the country where there is a strong impression that the local weekly newspaper, as well as the broadcast media, are controlled by strong local interests, so that the opinions expressed are always anti-union. It is always the ideas of the "establishment" that are given most play in the reporting. Some of these papers will claim that "La Frontière", for example... well, it is true that some space is devoted to the union movement. It is true that some union press releases are published; but at any given moment, there are front-page editorials, and news with comment on the front page, on union matters. They condemn such and such a union leader; it has been going on for years. That testimony may be of assistance to you; the phenomenon does exist in some communities.

Rouyn-Noranda is a typical example. At the moment, I do not know whether Mr. Bonneville has paid his $65,000 debt to Noranda Mines since 1965. I do not know. I know that for a number of years, he did owe that amount to the company. It was a situation with a well known mining company which controlled the press, and also muzzled the union and I do not consider that acceptable.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Bouchard, are you referring only to the case in Rouyn-Noranda, to the Noranda company's ownership of the paper, or are you talking about the way in which news was handled in the paper after ownership passed to the Noranda company?

Mr. Bouchard: What do you mean by "handled"?

Mr. Fortier: How was news handled after the Noranda company became the owner, by comparison with the way it was handled before Noranda took over?

Mr. Bouchard: Well, you see, the Oblate fathers were the owners, they owned the paper before...

Mr. Fortier: There, too, like Le Droit...

Mr. Bouchard: Exactly, and it was the same interests, Le Syndicat des Oeuvres sociales Limitée.

Mr. Fortier: That's right, exactly.

Mr. Bouchard: They sold to Jean-Pierre Bonneville, and as soon as he arrived in Rouyn-Noranda, in 1958, he attacked union positions. At some point, he got together to establish relations with the management. Copies of the letters were obtained, and they enabled us to expose what was going on. We also obtained copies of the correspondence, etc. Before, there were people on "La Frontière"—correspondents and writers—who were very sympathetic to union movements and to change. There was no change in Mr. Bonneville's way of handling union issues. It was the same situation before, of course. In order to get control of the businesses—he was rather ambitious—he was obliged to obtain financial assistance from the Noranda company. Well, obviously, it was that that enabled him to make inquiries.

Mr. Fortier: I am going to ask you what I believe the members of the Committee regard as a very important question. How do you think an agency—let us call it an agency—of the Government could have prevented the Noranda company from buying the paper in question? Would you like me to put the question in English, as it is very important?

The point which was made by Mr. Bouchard was that a particular newspaper in the town of Rouyn Noranda purchased by Noranda mining...

Mr. Bouchard: They in effect loaned $65,000 to an individual.

Mr. Fortier: And my question to Mr. Bouchard—this is a fact that is now before us, this Committee, and my question to him was how does he suggest that a similar situation be prevented in the future. Do you have any suggestions to make to the Committee as to how this could be prevented?

Mr. Bouchard: Well, the answer is...

The Chairman: Could you reply to that in English please?

Mr. Bouchard: I think the answer is in the brief. I have read the brief very thoroughly and the brief does talk about exterior interests in the media.

Mr. Cotterill: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Cotterill: Is there anything which really prevents the state from setting down the rules of competition in the private sector? I mean, I am not suggesting anything terribly revolutionary but surely we must assume that if any large economic entity in the community has direct or indirect financial control in communications, this is bound to be harmful and to have certain social repercussions. We are already beginning to question the right of the private sector to make money irrespective of the social costs when it comes to pollution and a change of the environment. Is it really any fundamental threat to the free enterprise system to lay down certain ground rules that an economic institution should not control the means of communication in a community?

Mr. Eady: Mr. Senator, may I just make a specific example in the other media. The Radio and Television Commission laid down just such a ruling in the Famous Players case on the ownership. It seems to me that in radio now, the present Commission is laying down such rules and may be some of the same criteria should be applied to the other media as the CRTC has been applying in its field.

Mr. Fortier: The rule that the gentleman is referring to is the one on foreign ownership, isn't it?

Mr. Eady: Yes, but also on multiple media.

Mr. Fortier: As a matter of fact, the CRTC in this respect has overruled an earlier decision of the BBG—has said that insofar as multiple ownership of the CTV affiliate stations they are prepared to reconsider the BBG decision.

Mr. Eady: I was speaking of the other aspect the Commission is ruling on that of not giving licences or reviewing licences for radio and television stations, where there is a relationship between that and the newspaper or newspapers in the community.

The Chairman: I think that that was the reference he was making.

Mr. Fortier: As you know in broadcasting we are dealing with public property and this is the reason the CRTC came into being. There is no suggestion in the brief which read a number of times very carefully for legislative intervention by the state and this is what Mr. Bouchard has in effect suggested. Are the members of the Committee to understand Mr. MacDonald, that the CLC is suggesting that the Government intervene to prevent acquisition by a company which has other interests, of a newspaper or of a radio or of a television station. Is that what the CLC is suggesting?

Mr. MacDonald: We have it in our brief as a matter of fact.

Senator Prowse: Well, you deal with it in general way. You say that it is a bad thing but you don't deal with it specifically.

Mr. Fortier: I have it underlined and I have a question mark in the margin. What legislative measures are you recommending?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, actually, if one were to get down to precision, you couldn't answer it but it is a matter, as all such legislation of dealing with the problem and dealing with it effectively.

I have been a legislator in my life so know something about the difficulty of being precise in drafting legislation. We are posing the problem. We are offering solutions in general terms true, but from there in if the principle is accepted, then there it is.

Senator Prowse: Well, Mr. MacDonald.

The Chairman: Will you excuse me just a moment Senator Prowse. I know I have done this several times but I would just like to make the point that Senator Phillips has indicated he has a supplementary question.

and I believe Senator McElman indicated he had a supplementary question, then I want to turn to you. I think if I could just deal with the supplementary questions—yours Senator McElman I think was dealing with the question of the CRTC was it not?

Senator McElman: Well, I just wanted to correct what I think was a wrong impression.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: Mr. Eady you suggested that the CRTC will not licence. I think in fact...

Mr. Eady: No, I didn't say that. They have some criteria by which they judge.

Senator McElman: But this is just one of the things they consider before they licence in fact before they will renew a licence. Is that right?

Mr. Eady: Yes.

Senator McElman: That is your understanding as well?

Mr. Eady: Yes, Senator.

The Chairman: Now, Senator Phillips had a supplementary question sometime ago but I am not sure what it was.

Senator Phillips: I was just going to suggest the very point that you made that instead of getting answers we were getting speeches and that we could probably shorten both the questions and the speeches and move along to the other points in the brief.

The Chairman: Thank you very much Senator. I will now turn to Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: I am going to direct this question to Mr. MacDonald and the others could perhaps listen to it. Let us suggest that we agree that it is a bad thing in principle that a person who controls one of the means of communications to the public, or the means by which the public communicates with each other, should also be the owner of other things in the community such as a business, the interest of which he might desire to protect as against the public. Now, that is what we are concerned about and we don't have to draw pictures because each one of us can fill in the details.

Now, this is the problem that we are faced with when we start to say what do we do about this. We are told that there are two reasons that you have the concentration of ownership that is occurring today. One is high tax rates particularly succession duties which encourage sales; and secondly they say (we have asked them, Mr. Andras, for details of it and they haven't been forthcoming satisfactorily so far as I know) the refusal of labour to accept technological change and realistically face up to it.

Now, the whole thing comes down to this. In the areas where we have one newspaper towns in particular, which is of concern to us, it is going to cost approximately five or ten million dollars. The question then arises—where do you get somebody who has five or ten million dollars to risk to start a newspaper or to buy an established paper who doesn't have some other interest?

Now you can say that a company can't buy it but then surely it is just as serious if I buy it as a major shareholder in a company that needs protection of some kind. My company isn't interested but I become the director and controlling influence in the paper. It can be a serious thing.

In other words we have a real problem and if you don't come in here and find answers laid on the table I think you realize that it is not because we don't want to have the answers there to lay on the table but the reason is that you are unable to give us the detailed information we want. You just don't have it either but maybe if we get together we can get it.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. We have, however, as you no doubt have noticed from reading our submission, Senator, we have made some suggestions in that area.

You have talked about the huge investments that are involved in Canada today and I suppose that is true. But there are, and we are aware of them, tremendous technological advances in this field. I confess readily at the outset that I don't claim any particular expertise in this field, but from what we are told by those who are much more knowledgeable than I am, that some of these techniques today have a tremendous effect on the reduction of first of all, the capital investment, and secondly the production cost.

You have gone from there to talk about the attitude probably of some of our unions, the traditional attitudes in the past.

Senator Prowse: As far as I am concerned it is alleged attitudes. I don't know myself.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, we rather anticipated that we might be asked something of that nature here tonight and therefore we have checked with some of them. There is obviously an assumption that the attitudes that have been displayed in the past will never be changed. We are told quite the contrary. All of our unions and all of our people realize that there is technological change going on constantly and that they have to adapt to survive. I don't think frankly that there would be any problems, any real problems insofar as our unions are concerned by that type of introduction of new techniques in the establishment of new newspapers and this is what really we are talking about here.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: We also suggest as no doubt you have noticed certain forms of encouragement in order to help out in the diversification of control of such media. There has been three specific suggestions advanced in the contents of our brief. We have talked in terms of tax relief as one of them. We have also talked in terms of subsidies which I suppose in the minds of many might be a rather radical suggestion, and we have finally suggested too, relief in the form of lower postage rates.

These are all to my point of view concrete suggestions that we are advancing because of our concern with this type of thing.

If I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman, similar to yourself although I have a reputation for being long-winded, I don't want to be tonight, but in terms of this control of the media by other conglomerates which may have commercial interests, so far I notice that the discussion has centred very largely about the dangers inherent in such a situation which as you say we all have recognized upon a nationalistic basis.

Senator Prowse: National or regional.

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, within the confines of our own country.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: I suggest to you that we ought to be very very concerned about it going far beyond that in the light of the type of thing that is developing in the world today. Now, I am thinking broadly in terms of what is popularly known as conglomerates, these huge multiplex, multi-national combinations of capital.

It could well be that if the media falls under the control of such type of things, regardless of what industries they are involved in, one pays little heed to the national interest. They have a supernatural interest in their terms but I also suggest that in such an eventuality there could be very very grave political consequences and as far as the international interests of our nation are concerned.

Senator Prowse: We have had one witness give us evidence about the effect of this on another country.

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I didn't know that. I was speaking hypothetically and I was merely posing the problem but one doesn't have to be very far sighted to see that possibility. The is one other point if I may, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. MacDonald: We were talking about the impact of the media on the public and explaining actually about the fact that we do not get the coverage which we believe the labour movement, the trade labour movement in Canada is entitled to, by virtue of the place it plays in society. But there is a very important aspect of that which I know not directly within the purview of this Committee but nevertheless I think I should make some reference to it.

It is the impression of us, who have had the opportunity to see things in other countries that our industrial relations' system here is one of the most archaic, and perhaps the most archaic in the western world. It is due to a large measure, in my personal opinion, to public attitudes.

The public attitudes in large measures are generated by the media. I say that there is nothing that reflects greater damage or potential damage on the interests of this nation than its people than that very thing.

In all fields of scientific advance we are the vanguard. We think we are pretty well the vanguard insofar as social development are concerned. In practically every other field of human endeavour we wish to talk about we feel that we are very advanced and are a very progressive nation.

In the field of industrial relations we are in a rut. So far in the rut that it is pathetic. We have not been able to do anything comparable to what has been done elsewhere. We are attributing all the blame to the media; and from it, there are other factors and we recognize them. We do say that the attitude of the media in what we have been talking about contributes in large measure to the attitude of the public.

We are keenly sensitive to the fact that we are not being put in public favour in Canada today and we think that a large part of this is due to—I hate to use the word but I can't find an alternative—our public image.

The Chairman: May I ask you a question, Mr. MacDonald which I was going to ask all evening.

If, for the sake of the discussion let us for the moment concede the points that you have made that coverage is lacking. I think I agree with you but I can't speak for the Committee because that is the type of judgment we haven't yet made; but conceding that point, I think one of the key questions is why?

Mr. MacDonald: That is right.

The Chairman: Well, how would you answer that?

Mr. MacDonald: I don't know if I am qualified.

The Chairman: Mr. Williams could you say why?

Mr. Williams: I would like to say this. I think there is very little deliberate censorship of labour stories. There are instances and Mr. Potterill referred to the Eatons' story in Toronto which is an example, but I don't think that sort of thing is general.

I don't think that the owners of newspapers deliberately blue-pencil stories. I don't think they have to. People who work for newspapers, people who write the copy know the interests of the people they work for and they write their copy accordingly. I once worked for a newspaper, the owner of which was a great temperance advocate, and nobody had to spell it out but if somebody came to town and preached temperance this was good for a real good story. And you are going to get front page play.

Mr. Fortier: This doesn't say too much for the integrity of the reporter does it?

Mr. Williams: Well, perhaps it doesn't but you work for a commercial enterprise and when you work for a commercial enterprise you follow the rules of the enterprise or else you go and work somewhere else.

Senator Prowse: You may have read Dale Carnegie which any reasonable boy trying to get along would do.

Mr. Williams: That may well be, but don't forget that most of the copy is written by young people who are ambitious and ambition is a pretty overriding factor. They want to get ahead and as I say if it is a temperance speaker, you know that the story is going to get good play. If it is a hotel owner who is advocating the abolition of prohibition well, this isn't going to get very good play.

Let me point out to you that part of a reporter's ambition is to see his stories in print and he likes to get good play for his stories. It is important to him that his story gets good play and any reporter who consistently wrote stories that wound up in the waste paper basket would pretty soon get discouraged.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Williams, as I interpret your answer, and if I am interpreting it unfairly please correct me, but you are saying that there is a conspiracy of silence on labour news because the working press in this country are inhibited because of their publishers, without any direction from their publishers.

Mr. MacDonald: They don't have to give directions.

The Chairman: Well, that is a very interesting view.

Senator Prowse: Well, to put it another way what you are saying is this, the working press have some how or other got the idea that their bosses are not interested in labour news and therefore they are not going to write on labour news which is going to end up in the trashcan?

Mr. Williams: That is right.

Senator Prowse: It is simple—if that is what you are saying?

Mr. Williams: That is right.

The Chairman: I think we will just give our reporter a two or three minute break and then we will go for a little while longer.

SHORT RECESS

The Chairman: Honourable Senators may I call the meeting back to order. In calling the meeting to order, may I say to our guests from the CLC that some of us have been in this room since 10 o'clock this morning. This is no reason to say that we don't want to stay, we do, but I do want to say there are several other matters that we want to cover and it seems to me again that we have—and of course the Senators share the blame as I do myself—that we have tended to dwell on this one problem. We are interested in it but I think the point has been made. I am not suggesting that we shouldn't express ourselves on it again but let us be mindful of the fact that I think we have dealt with it I think rather fully.

I would hope that the Senators could perhaps for the balance of the evening make their questions more pointed, and I would hope that the people from the CLC in answering the questions—this is no criticism of the answers we have received, but I hope they would be equally pointed so that we could perhaps cover more area.

Now, there were two of our guests who have indicated to me that they wish to make a comment. I am delighted to have them make their comments but I hope they also will bear this in mind.

Mr. Norm Simon, Director, Public Relations, Canadian Union of Public Employees: I am with the Canadian Union of Public Employees and before that I was a labour reporter so I would like to just add something to what Mr. Williams has indicated earlier.

The Chairman: Fine. Who were you a labour reporter with?

Mr. Simon: With the Toronto Telegram.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Simon: I am sorry I said that because I was going to say that Mr. Williams was a bit too kind in saying that there was no conscious or material evidence of control on labour reporters. I was the recipient of more than one memo which went something like: "Go easy on the egghead stuff and let's have some more violence." I did have stories sent back to me where there was violence involved. It was mentioned deep in the story and it was to be put up in the lead.

Really, the violence, in my opinion, had less bearing on what was going on during the particular strike ..

The Chairman: Mr. Simon, who would these memos be from. I am not asking you to name the person but...

Mr. Simon: Middle management people and perhaps to add to Mr. Williams point, often from people whose individual politics I knew to be sympathetic to labour. I suppose, this proves Mr. Williams point that they were reacting to something they thought was higher up above them.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. There is a gentleman opposite you...

Mr. Gordon McCaffrey: Assistant Director of Legislation Department, Canadian Labour Congress: I am a former labour reporter for the Toronto Star. I think that the only place where we can expect to find labour reporter is in the major cities, although there are many minor centres if you consider a centre in terms of population where there might be a greater interest in reporting labour news. This would be in company towns, where most of the news that affects the people concern management and labour, but in many of these centres—and I think you know which ones they are—there is no consistent coverage of labour news.

As a reporter for the Star, I covered stories in centres far from Toronto which were not covered by local reporters or even by reporters in the same province. In the smaller centres, I believe that the newspaper publisher identifies with the business community and therefore if he doesn't consciously rule out labour he does it unconsciously. I think the editor, without being told, reflects the publisher's interest and covers the news which he thinks a business community wants to hear about.

I think the editors of newspapers at all levels are among the most competent people in the country but what they are trying to do in their job is present a product which will reflect the interest of the community as they see it. I think many of them have never made a survey of what their readers' interests are. They assume that most readers want a sports section of three or four pages so they cover every detail of the sporting events, while people are saying, even what they are thinking or not thinking, is covered one way or another. In a typical Canadian paper a hockey game might be covered by five different reporters in the same newspaper.

The Chairman: This would be a Stanley Cup Game?

Mr. McCaffrey: Even "What's Espinoza doing; what's Bobby Orr doing tonight?" "What didn't he do?"

The Chairman: Personally, I wish I knew

Mr. McCaffrey: Well, I think this is typical then. As far as labour coverage is concerned labour on newspapers is not a glamorous area. Most reporters who seriously consider newspapering as a profession don't want to be a labour reporter. They are assigned to the job; they say, in effect, "Okay, I will do it but let me off as soon as you find somebody else who might be more interested."

I was on a newspaper, which is, I believe, one of the country's best newspapers, which didn't have a labour reporter on the beat for more than a few months consecutively. I was covering the beat for more than four years, longer perhaps than anybody in my memory at the Toronto Star.

Finally, most people who are given the job of covering labour go to a story without knowing very much about it. I would say it takes four to six months to get to know something about the labour beat so that you can deal with your story competently. I am not speaking about the headline-type story which Mr. Murray Cotterill mentioned earlier. Most reporters cover those stories fairly well. But the stories between the strikes are the ones which are not covered, and this is where the real labour story is. It affects not just the working men and working women, because as has been mentioned before it affects all of us.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. McCaffrey.

Senator Phillips:

Senator Phillips: I was going to make the suggestion, Mr. Chairman, if the Congress still feels that they are not getting sufficient labour coverage in the newspapers, that they initiate strike action and not read those newspapers not providing proper coverage of labour news.

Senator Prowse: Yes, but then they wouldn't know what they weren't saying about them.

The Chairman: I am not sure whether Senator Phillips brings forth a serious suggestion or not.

Senator Phillips: Well, there is no reason why this shouldn't be done.

The Chairman: All right, we will put the question to you.

Why don't the members stop buying newspapers?

Mr. MacDonald: We have at times.

The Chairman: I see.

Mr. MacDonald: In particular situations.

The Chairman: In strike situations?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes; and in some others, too. We have recommended to our people that they stop buying newspapers, but an individual member of the family who happens to be a member of the trade union is not the only one necessarily who buys papers. They might or might not follow our recommendation or suggestion on their own individual determination.

We are not a monolithic organization; don't possess the ability, nor do we want it, to dictate to our members.

Senator Phillips: But you have tried the idea and found it ineffective?

Mr. MacDonald: Relatively; but not in that type of situation that you envisage—in strike situations and that sort of thing where there has been sometimes a very blatant unjustified attack on us.

Senator Prowse: Mr. MacDonald, what have you done in the way of actually going yourself—or as a delegation to the newspaper publishers and saying, "Look, you have a problem here and we have a problem," and lay it out for them; have you tried that or not?

Mr. MacDonald: I have not done that at the national level personally. I have done it when I was functioning in a regional level and found that I just wasted my time, and probably contributed to the evident hostility.

The Chairman: Would it be fair to ask where that was?

Mr. MacDonald: It was in the Atlantic region. I was the regional director for the Atlantic provinces.

The Chairman: And which newspaper did you approach?

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, no, I wouldn't say that.

Senator Prowse: Your prestige today—and I am not trying to flatter you, because I have nothing to get for it...

The Chairman: You mean you would flatter him if you had something to get?

Senator Prowse: You're damned right; especially a vote! I would think that it might be an interesting experiment to see what would happen if you were to go now in your position that you hold representing the tremendous number of people that you do, and specifically go to the publishers of the two Ottawa papers and say, "Look, this is the situation. Now, I know it is your paper but I don't have to tell you how to say it." And the worst that can happen is that you won't be any worse off than you are now.

Mr. MacDonald: I am not sure of that, senator. I am not sure of that at all.

Senator Prowse: But if you asked them...

Mr. MacDonald: I wouldn't be at all surprised in those circumstances to find an attack based on my uncouth effort to try and influence the media.

Senator Prowse: I think you could do it pretty smoothly.

The Chairman: Mr. Rupert, who appeared before the Committee the day the Guild made their representations, indicated that he would like to say something.

Mr. Robert J. Rupert: There is just a couple of matters I would like to mention briefly.

The first thing is, I think that the greatest protection any working newspaperman can enjoy from interference in his editorial judgment as to what is news and what isn't, be it labour or anything else, is the protection of a Guild contract.

I suggest that our members are in a far better position to resist this sort of interference than any other group of working newspapermen.

Secondly...

The Chairman: But the example Mr. Simon gave presumably was at a Guild paper.

Mr. Rupert: Mr. Simon was in a position to say "No" without any fear of being dismissed from his job. I am not sure that all newspapermen would be in that position.

Secondly, I don't think that the working press has a defeatist attitude; I think the working press does care. I think the professional newspaperman still has great hope that he can provide a service and is trying to do it.

And, lastly, a lot has been said to this Committee, and also in other forums, about unions' resistance in the publishing industry to technological change, but hardly anything has been said, maybe nothing has been said, about the employers' resistance to a responsible approach to technological change.

Now, I have been dealing with employers, even since the Woods Report was published, and suggested to them that they accept the proposals that we have been making for many years, and that is simply that people be retrained; not only the employers but also the employees reap the benefits of technological advancement. And in almost every case the Guild encounters great resistance to that approach, and in fact the employers claim themselves the benefits, but they aren't willing to extend them to the employees.

I would like the Committee to consider this when they are looking at the problem of technological change in unions and management. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Rupert.

Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: First of all, the gentleman who referred to those in the middle management groups...

The Chairman: That was Mr. Simon.

Senator McElman: ...and the approach that took; you said something that to me was quite interesting. You said that these people were those who individually, their politics were sympathetic to labour. What did you mean by that?

Mr. Simon: Well, in several specific instances that I was thinking of when I referred to memos I had received, sir, the notes were from individuals who were active guildsmen.

Senator McElman: Well, that is not the politics, though?

Mr. Simon: Well, I meant their outlook, the politics was the wrong choice of word there. I meant their outlook on the labour-management question.

Senator McElman: I see.

Mr. Simon: The reason I made that judgment was because, in two of the cases that I was thinking of, I was talking about people who were active guildsmen.

Senator McElman: Reference has been made to the lack of coverage, I assume, during the negotiating stage leading toward a contract, or a dispute, as the case may be. How would you go about getting information to the public during the negotiation stage of any contract?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, in many, in many instances unions announce and make known their wage policies in advance. Not only their wage policies but their entire collective bargaining policy. But we are not speaking in those narrow terms.

What is unknown—and it is the basis for part of our complaint, really—what is not known is that our unions in Canada are involved in practically every aspect of Canadian life: social, economic, political, and everything else.

Senator McElman: I think you are missing my question.

Mr. MacDonald: No, I am not, I don't think.

Senator McElman: Well, let me rephrase it so it is very clear. I believe you are heading in another direction. If you are not, fine.

We will take one specific instance of where there is a strike—bang—and there is a great splash of news about it, and the suggestion has been made that what went on prior to the strike, the conditions that were there, the attempt at negotiation, and so on, nothing happened until the strike. There was no news. Now what I am trying to get at, Mr. MacDonald, is this. How do you go about trying to get news to the public in such a situation prior to the signing of an agreement, let's say, where there is no strike, so the general public—not just the labour movement—the general public will know that the negotiations are going on and here are the things in issue, that sort of thing?

Mr. MacDonald: Most of our collective bargaining in Canada is conducted at the local level...

Senator McElman: Yes?

Mr. MacDonald: And the majority of our local unions are anxious to have this kind of information known because suddenly, out of the blue, there appears a wage demand that is resisted, and there is a strike, but that is all the public knows.

...the public knew in advance—and our unions are anxious to tell the story—knew in advance why these demands were being made, what are the conditions that led to this, what is the background, how long has it been since these people have had an increase or didn't get an increase, is it justified on the basis of productivity and profitability? In that particular enterprise, what are the working conditions that lead to demands of other sorts within the contract collective agreement; to our members these are tremendously important things that should be known.

They are the things that lead eventually to the picture that unfortunately is all too common in Canada: a strike-happy bunch of Canadian citizens who happen to be members of unions. And that is the picture. That is the picture in this country.

The fact of the matter is...

Senator McElman: You haven't answered my question. How does your union endeavour at that point, at the negotiating point, how do they endeavour to get the picture to the people, to the media? What effort is made?

Mr. MacDonald: There are many of our unions who go very far out of their way to—in some cases I have known them to prepare the copy themselves—to get it over. Very frequently they are told, "Oh, that is not newsworthy."

At the local union level the people who are doing this on a voluntary basis only have to be told this two or three times and they won't bother any more.

On other occasions—and I think it falls within the purview of this Committee—on other occasions our unions have gone to the electronic media in an effort to buy time to tell the public. And in some cases they have succeeded in doing it, but there have been cases in Canada as well—and this we can be precise about, and we will name names...

Senator McElman: In recent times, sir?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes—in which they have been denied time.

Senator McElman: Can you give us some examples, Mr. MacDonald?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. I would be delighted to do it.

Senator McElman: I had a note—a question on that very point.

Mr. MacDonald: Some are recent; some are not. We had a case in Schefferville, Quebec, December, 1959, where this happened. We went to the station...

The Chairman: Could you file that with us?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. In fact, that is why it has been prepared.

The Chairman: You could perhaps just highlight that.

Mr. MacDonald: It was radio station CFKL, owned by the Iron Ore Company of Canada, which refused to sell time to our affiliate, the United Steelworkers of America. Incidentally, in several of the instances, protests were filed either by us on behalf of our affiliates or by the affiliates themselves with the Board of Broadcast Governors, and frankly we got the brush-off.

Another case was in Yorkton, Saskatchewan, 1965, again the United Steelworkers engaged in an organizing campaign which in our opinion is of public interest. They were denied time on station CKOS-TV in Yorkton, Saskatchewan. They were denied the time even though the company was sold time.

Senator McElman: The company was sold time?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. As a matter of fact, the company in this case was sold time in order to get their story across to the public and win public support for their policies.

Sudbury, Ontario, June 1966—no, that wasn't a similar case.

Mr. Cotterill: Sudbury was a case where the television station refused to sell time the moment the negotiations started, although they had rather jubilantly sold it to the union up to that point.

Mr. MacDonald: That was in the organizing drive.

Mr. Cotterill: No, they had sold time—the conflict between two unions, if I may, Mr. Chairman—there was conflict between two unions at that time. The station sold time, if I may say, avidly, but the moment the bargaining situation became stabilized, the negotiations with International Nickel—and this is on the record of the Board of Broadcast Governors—the local television station, which has no competition except for the threat of cable, cancelled—in fact, refused to renew the contract with the union. And we pointed out at that time that this was a most dangerous result.

I am very glad that this matter of television has been raised, because in studying the mass media we must realize that many of these community television stations are the only instant method of communication available and very few of them really do very much of a community service job in this respect, or even let anybody else do it on their own time.

Senator McElman: Excuse me; did they give you any reason for cancelling?

Mr. Cotterill: They gave us no reasons at all, except that they would be perfectly happy to sell us commercials on any one of the programs they developed.

I would like to raise this point, Mr. Chairman, because to my mind it is significant in this case, simply because that program was cancelled. It is my conviction that the fact that the public, almost all of whom work for the International Nickel Company in the town, had got used to a regular program where they got authoritative information. There are 16,000 people over a 40-square-mile area in Sudbury working three shifts.

We had a wildcat strike in Sudbury at the time which almost every responsible officer of our union says was due solely and completely to the fact that it was impossible to get the news of negotiations out in a hurry to the employees at the critical point when the contract expired.

I am convinced that had that television station permitted the union, which, after all, represents 16,000 of the bread-winners of the community, to have its own program for which we were paying them, the wildcat strike would not have happened. Their contract charged us for their directorial assistance, which I might add we got damned little of—they were at liberty to direct the program so that it would be entertaining and technically proper. Nevertheless, they cancelled the program, and we are convinced that the cancellation of that program was one of the major reasons why the communications network which the people had been used to broke down, and as a result of that breakdown the wildcat strike took place.

I think they were trying very hard to impress the company. They succeeded in convincing the company a few millions of dollars were being impressed on them, which would not have been the case if the company had been able to keep communications open.

Yes, sir, we have had several examples where stations have refused to do it, and in that position has been, we are quite agreeable to let the company direct the program, but we do think that the television program should permit a report to the breadwinners during the week.

The Chairman: Mr. Cotterill, thank you, but I think, Senator McElman, Mr. MacDonald has one or two more points he would like to add.

Mr. MacDonald: There was one more, senator. This is in May, 1967, Winnipeg, Manitoba. Our affiliate, the Retail Clerks International Association, through its advertising agency, attempted to book a series of spot programs on radio station CKY and similar bookings were made in Montreal and Vancouver without any problem whatever.

These spot programs dealt in broad terms—not a controversial thing—in broad terms with the role of unions and the value of union membership. I hate to impose upon the name of the Committee, but I think it would be interesting to hear what this station had to say.

Part of that letter read:

"That the management of CKY believes broadcasting of radio copy received from your agency would violate that section of the Radio Regulations prohibiting solicitation of funds on behalf of organizations other than recognized charities. The Retail Clerks Association is a member of the Canadian Labour Congress. The Canadian Labour Congress has a check-off system whereby funds go to the New Democratic Party, a national political organization in Canada. Therefore, we believe that the solicitation of membership in the Retail Clerks International Association would violate regulations of the Board of Broadcast Governors prohibiting solicitation of funds."

Therefore, the station at great sacrifice saved the sanctity of the BBG and refused the program. We filed a protest, by the way, with the BBG on behalf of our affiliate pointing out exactly what had happened, and that it was untrue, of course.

The Canadian Labour Congress does not have a check-off system, nor does it contribute funds to the New Democratic Party. Some of our affiliates do, and, incidentally, do it with our encouragement, but that is neither here nor there.

The BBG said they advised other stations that they had no reason to object to these commercials.

Incidentally, the affiliated union did succeed in getting the series booked with another radio station within the same community, but there are but a few.

Senator McElman: You are going to file this with the Committee?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator McElman: You have raised the matter of a liaison affiliation, or whatever it might be called, with the NDP.

Now, up to this point in our hearing we have had many representatives of owners and management groups of the various media, and we have probed them in many ways. As was pointed out earlier they have made generalizations, and we have asked them to be specific in some of them.

Additionally, we have gone further. We have asked them about their reported affiliation with big business, and we have had a variety of answers.

I remember one case where we even asked what clubs the management group in a chain were members of, and we have asked in some cases what directorships they might hold outside of their immediate interest.

And in view of the reference to the CLC-New Democratic Party association, and to put the whole thing in perspective, I don't think it would be unfair, perhaps (and I am sure it won't embarrass you), to ask the four gentlemen who are representing the Canadian Labour Congress if any of them have ever been a candidate for the New Democratic Party, and are they card-carrying members.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am anxious to answer first. I am a card-carrying member of the NDP. I have been the provincial leader of the CCF. I have been provincial leader of the CCF in a provincial legislature, but that has no relation whatever to this situation.

We don't ask our people—in fact, the senator has pointed out to me tonight that one of our key people happens to a member of the Liberal Party. That is their right, certainly.

Senator Phillips: I will accept your apology on his behalf.

Mr. MacDonald: He is a very good trade unionist.

The Chairman: He is a very good Liberal!

Mr. MacDonald: There are many of our members who are affiliated with the New Democratic Party, and do contribute to the New Democratic Party.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, you wish to ask each member that question?

Senator McElman: Yes.

The Chairman: Any other members care to answer that?

Mr. Williams: I am a card-carrying member of the NDP. I have never been a candidate.

Mr. Andras: I am a card-carrying member of the NDP and I have never been a candidate.

Mr. Morris: I will make it unanimous; and before that I was a card-carrying member of the CCF ever since I have been a very young boy.

The Chairman: I must say that I...

Mr. Morris: I offer no apologies. It is a political conviction of which I have a right to.

Senator McElman: Of course.

The Chairman: I was wondering why you asked the last question, but I take it you are going to tell us?

Senator McElman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I took from the last answer that there was some suggestion that I was thinking that there was something wrong with this?

Mr. Morris: No.

Senator McElman: You have the liberty to belong to whatever party you wish.

Mr. Morris: No, senator, I don't think it is an unfair question if you wish to ask it.

As far as I am concerned, I will answer it anywhere.

Senator McElman: Well, I thought you all would, and in the circumstances I felt you should.

Mr. Eady: Is it fair to say, Mr. Chairman, that none of them own any newspapers?

Mr. Morris: I have never been a candidate. I don't believe I have any intention of ever being one either.

Senator McElman: I probably should say that by the same token many of those involved in management and ownership suggested that the connection with big business, if it were valid, that they shouldn't be ashamed of it, and none of them ever claimed to be on the executive of the CLC, so I guess it shakes itself down.

Mr. Frank Chafe, Assistant Director of Legislation, Government Employees' Departments: Mr. Chairman, it might be interesting if I mention at this time that I am a card-carrying member of the NDP as well, assistant to Mr. Andras, and I might go one step further, and say that in the past five federal election I helped to get Mr. Stanley Knowles elected and he favours the abolition of the Senate.

The Chairman: Well, some of us favour the abolition of Stanley Knowles!

Senator McElman: Do you support Stanley Knowles?

The Chairman: Senator McElman, I think we would be curious to know what your next question will be.

Senator Prowse: I may say that they might be more successful than Stanley because they are going to kill us before this evening is over.

Senator McElman: "There should be no arbitrary exclusion from access to wire services or any other type of service which made available to newspaper publishers. This is on page 11, Mr. MacDonald. And take it this is not to say there is some example of it currently?"

Mr. MacDonald: I personally don't have knowledge at the moment of anything of that nature.

Mr. Williams: I believe the senator's statement is quite correct. We are just saying that if this situation should prevail...

Senator McElman: The reason I asked that was because we have probed this very thing and we had the appropriate people before (CP, for instance), and we probed very deep on this to try and ensure that there was not such a situation.

Senator Prowse suggested a while ago, Mr. MacDonald, that you might get in touch with the publishers of the local newspapers about a discussion of coverage. Are you aware that there is an association called the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association?

Mr. MacDonald: I have heard of it.

Senator McElman: Would it ring not with you to suggest that perhaps—not just you but your executive officers—endeavour to arrange a meeting with the publishers to discuss this very thing?

Now, we have had them before us and they have many worthy aims, and I think the Committee might be interested to know what reaction you would get from them if you made such an approach to see if you could have a worthwhile discussion towards getting what you would believe would be a more balanced type of reporting, and more coverage, that you feel that you deserve.

The present president of that association is Mr. Ralph Costello, publisher of the Telegraph, Journal, Times, Globe in Saint John, New Brunswick.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I could write a book on my difficulties with the media in Saint John, New Brunswick. I ran a number of strikes there and I was responsible for organization in your province, senator.

Senator McElman: Yes, I know that is true.

Mr. MacDonald: There is no place in this country that will stand up by comparison to the experience that we had in Saint John, New Brunswick.

Senator McElman: With the media?

Mr. MacDonald: With the media.

Senator McElman: Would you care to elaborate on that?

Mr. MacDonald: I am nearly 20 years removed from what my colleague refers to as my native habitat, but I can still recall with considerable incense—as you know some of my experiences in that city.

Senator McElman: Would you care to elaborate on your experiences with the media?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, sure. I will just talk about two experiences. They go far back, because as I say it's nearly 20 years since I have been removed from the Maritimes.

I was responsible for two major strikes, the conflict of two major strikes, right in the heart of the City of Saint John. One, the paper plant that you might recall...

Senator McElman: I do.

Mr. MacDonald: And the other one with Irving Oil.

Senator McElman: I recall that one as well.

Mr. MacDonald: I was in Saint John, New Brunswick...

Senator McElman: Who were the owners of the veneer plant?

Mr. MacDonald: Mr. K. C. Irving, as I recall. I tried by every means available to get coverage. There was no TV at that time, and I tried by every means that was possible to get some coverage—these were important strikes at different times, and considerable times apart, I must say—and I never had, or never did succeed.

As a matter of fact, finally, what I resorted to was printing our own handbills trying to tell factually what was going on, and distributing them free to the pedestrians on the street so we would at least get some dissemination of information in that city.

Senator McElman: You tried both the print media and radio?

Mr. MacDonald: Both the print media and radio, that's right.

Senator McElman: Who owned those, sir?

Mr. MacDonald: I don't know. I don't know, but I have my suspicions, but I can't support them.

Senator McElman: Well, I can tell you we have had evidence before the Committee that Mr. K. C. Irving owned them.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, that was my suspicion. It was our experience that everything else related to labour in that city.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, do you wish to carry on with that line of questioning?

Senator McElman: Well, I would only say that I can appreciate fully that if one is turned back continually as appears to be Mr. MacDonald's experience it is a very depressing thing, but I still think it would be useful—and I say this in every constructive sense—that you do make contact with the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association and tell them you would like to discuss this very important thing; not just for the Congress but for the people, and see if you couldn't bridge this abyss that seems to lie between you.

Senator Prowse: And set it out just like you have before us tonight.

Senator McElman: Exactly. I can't speak for the Committee, but I as a member of the Committee would be deeply interested in knowing the reaction you received to your request for a meeting initially, and, secondly, knowing what the outcome of any discussions were. I don't think you should be defeatist about this.

Mr. MacDonald: Perhaps not. I will certainly, senator, as you suggest—I will explore that idea.

Senator Prowse: And let us know how it works out.

Mr. MacDonald: With a view to seeing whether we deem it worthwhile—possible, perhaps I'd better say.

The Chairman: May I make a point, and perhaps ask a couple of questions? Perhaps I should make a point first.

Mr. Simon, going back earlier to your comments—it seems to me that those are, as you know, by any standard fairly serious accusations that you have made, and I think that being the case we should probably ask you for names and copies of the memos if you have them available, or if you could make them available to us.

Mr. Simon: I can check.

The Chairman: Would you, please, because those are I think reasonably serious accusations, and they will be on the record of the Committee. Therefore, I think I should also have on the record my request for this information.

Mr. Simon: You can appreciate, though, senator, that this was three years ago.

The Chairman: Would you attempt to...

Mr. Simon: They were not formal documents, and I did save some memorabilia, and I will check.

The Chairman: Fine, thank you.

Mr. Bouchard: I was fired by my editor on March 30th, 1963, by the weekly paper in Noranda, for giving what the editor termed "biased labour coverage."

The Chairman: Well, if you could document that we would be grateful.

Mr. Bouchard: Fine.

Mr. Fortier: Can Mr. Simon give us the names?

The Chairman: Well, I have asked him to do that.

Mr. Fortier: Well, maybe he can give us the names if he doesn't have the memorandums.

Mr. Simon: Well, I can only say...

Senator Prowse: He can file that.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, I make a formal request that Mr. Simon give us the names of the people who sent him those memos which he alluded earlier.

The Chairman: Could you send us names, Mr. Simon, please?

Mr. Simon: I don't know what involves, because I am a novice in this process, sir.

Mr. Fortier: I think Mr. Simon should have told what the accusations which he leveled earlier this evening involved, and in front of this Committee...

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, you are the Committee's counsel; perhaps if you would elaborate...

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Simon, you asked him time to tell the Committee about some incidents which occurred to you when you were working as a newspaper reporter for the Toronto Telegram.

You said that you were prevented on a number of occasions by some of your superiors from writing articles dealing with labour matters, and in order for the Committee to assess the seriousness of your charges I think we should be given the names of those people so that we can ask them in turn whether or not they did indeed write to you in this sense.

Mr. Simon: Well, first of all, I am not sure. You said I was prevented from writing, I didn't say that.

The Chairman: No, in fairness, I don't think he said that.

Mr. Fortier: What were you told?

The Chairman: He was told to play up the violence, if I recall. "Enough of the egghead stuff," if I recall, was the actual quote.

Mr. Simon: The one that sticks in my mind is "Forget the egghead stuff and more on the violence." I remember one other memo, and I remember several conversations, but I don't know what is involved, frankly, legally—in my position I am putting others in. I am not about to disclose publicly those names.

Mr. Fortier: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, what is involved is being fair to the people to whom Mr. Simon has alluded, on the one hand, and also to the newspaper.

The Chairman: Well, I think, Mr. Fortier, enough has been said. Mr. Simon, you can take the matter under advisement, and perhaps you can inform the Committee.

Mr. Simon: One thing I would like to know: if these people are still in the bargaining unit, because if they are not I am pretty secure.

The Chairman: All right; I accept that.

Mr. Fortier: I would suggest, Mr. Chairman—this is more than a request—I suggest that an order emanate from this Committee for Mr. Simon to submit the names of these people.

Mr. Simon: I am out of my league, quite frankly. The Committee's counsel is a lawyer and I am not aware of all the various implications of the things he says. I am without counsel and I am not on trial. I offered the incidents as an example, and I will consider it and I will deal with you, Mr. Chairman.

Quite frankly, I am out of my league, at the moment.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fortier, that satisfies me, I think.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Chairman, as I say, it is up to you.

Senator Phillips: Well, Mr. Chairman, if I may, I have a tendency to agree with Mr. Fortier, and perhaps for future meetings we should lay down guidelines, that if anyone makes an accusation, that they be prepared to furnish documents on it.

The Chairman: Well, in fairness, I don't think that an accusation was made. I don't think Mr. Simon said that he was prevented. I think he said that he received a directive from middle management and the directive told him to "play down the egghead stuff and play up the violence", or something of that sort. He wasn't prevented, I think.

Mr. Simon: With all fairness, it may well be that at the time the violence was more important than the egghead stuff. In fairness to the people against whom I am supposedly making accusations.

Senator Prowse: It might have been a matter of editorial judgment.

Mr. Simon: It might have been a matter of editorial judgment at the time, but the point I am making, it was to further Mr. Williams' point that this wasn't just something that people think publishers want. The word just didn't get around unspoken and unwritten. It may have been right at the time.

Senator Prowse: Well, I think there are two things here dealing with what Senator Phillips has said and what Mr. Fortier said as well as what Mr. Simon said.

Now, Mr. Simon has offered something. He told us a situation which having worked in a newspaper is something which I think happens every day. You get memos from people telling you to handle a story in a different way.

Now, in certain contexts you can draw certain conclusions from the kind of memo he got, but there is nothing unusual about this at all. He was trying to be helpful and certainly he doesn't want to get anybody into trouble.

I think if we become too formalistic in this hearing so that anybody that comes in here that wants to say something and express an opinion in a general way is going to then be subpoenaed to a point where he has to perhaps damage somebody else or give any information that hurts somebody else, it could greatly inhibit our ability to get as complete information as we might like to have.

Mr. MacDonald: His livelihood might be put in jeopardy.

Senator Prowse: Yes. If, on the other hand, somebody is abusing the privileges in here then we have at our disposal a means of taking care of that abuse. I certainly don't feel that happened tonight.

Senator McElman: I suggest that the context within which Mr. Simon made the statement indicated a rather insidious sort of thing, and attributed to media management of the newspaper in which he was involved, and I believe surely this is the approach that our counsel was taking. It was the context.

Certainly none of us are trying to push people. And we haven't done so far. We are asking for testimony but we also ask for complete information.

Senator Prowse: If he can give us the details, then the evidence is of much more value to us. If he can't give us the details, then we are left in a position of how much weight we can give to the evidence.

The Chairman: I think Senator Prowse's point is well taken, and perhaps we could leave it at that.

Mr. Simon: Well, Mr. Chairman, all I want to say in defence of the Toronto Telegram is that it was a fine place to work, and I may want to go back.

The Chairman: Well, the hour is getting late, but I think there is just two matters that I would like to bring up.

Mr. Eady: Well, to go back where Senator Prowse asked for a specific suggestion and there are three specific suggestions on media—not just on newspapers generally—that I think that the Committee should have a look at. I know you have already looked at it—at the trust system of ownership—and I refer you to the London Observer where the Astor interest vested their ownership in a trust so as to divorce the economic interests of its owners from the managerial and editorial direction of the paper.

When you ask that question I would suggest that this should be a much more common form of ownership. The second reference I would like to make is to the new development in cable television, which can be very important, and I draw the Committee's attention to two examples: the development of a co-operative system of ownership of cable television in Windsor, Ontario, and to municipal ownership in Harrison Hot Springs of renowned fame.

I think that these are areas where the problems that have been raised by the brief of the Congress on the question of ownership could be tackled. Public trusts, co-operatives, and municipal ownership as a means of stopping direct impact by industrial or economic groups of any kind on the media so that in answer to the senator's question I think these are three areas that you might investigate.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Eady. It is very useful to have that on the record. Thank you.

I have two questions only. They both relate to the electronic media. You say at page 22:

"If ever the Americanization of Canada has been a problem, the private broadcasters have been the chief agents for its enhancement."

Then you go on to say in Section 59 the following:

"The tendency on the part of broadcasters, particularly in private broadcasting, has been to assume and to cater to what is commonly known as the lowest common denominator of taste and intelligence."

In effect, giving the public what it wants.

Now, I think it is obvious from the rating studies which we have seen, and I am with which you are familiar, that in private broadcasting—let's talk about radio for a moment—that the private stations do enjoy (and I think this is the point that you are making) a wide audience margin over the CBC.

Would it not be fair to say that as rank-and-file members of the Congress and your affiliates, they are, after all, a pretty effective cross-section of the general public? I think that is the point that Mr. Cotterill was making earlier, and would it not therefore be true to say that your own membership contributes substantially to this very popularity. In other words, it is a general audience, surely, and does this not concern you?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, we naturally think that there should be efforts made to elevate the standards of the whole, and our people well.

The Chairman: Do you attempt to elevate standards of your people?

Mr. MacDonald: We think so.

The Chairman: With success, Mr. MacDonald?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I suppose that again is a matter of judgment. We think that we have.

The Chairman: Again, you make an obvious reference on page 22, Section 55—regarding the CRTC—You say:

"We are also pleased that the Commission has decided to restrict the further invasion of foreign programmes for cablevision purposes."

That is the opinion of the Congress.

Do you suppose that opinion would be joined by the members of the Congress in the Sudbury area?

Senator Prowse: Well, let us add Calgary and Edmonton.

The Chairman: Yes, but I was thinking of the Sudbury area, but that's fine.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, frankly, I don't know. I think on an overall basis, yes. As to whether in those particular areas I frankly couldn't be certain.

Since we took our official position on this matter, naturally our position was distributed throughout our entire membership throughout our entire structure; we have received commendation, a great deal of from our membership, and I must say that so we have received some criticism as well. There has been some.

Within the past several days I received one from one of those areas, but so far what we have received by way of support in commendation certainly vastly outweighs any criticism that we have received.

There is I think a growing sense of national interest in this country and it is very much reflected in our membership. I don't think that anybody should underestimate that. Sometimes it takes different forms, and sometimes forms that we ourselves perhaps are not entirely happy about.

The Chairman: Well, I said I had another question about the electronic media, and perhaps you follows right here.

Oh, Mr. Cotterill, do you want to speak on Sudbury?

Mr. Cotterill: Yes. I was going to say, sir, that I think that the question cannot be answered in any accurate way. The problem basically in Sudbury is that our members would love to have any competition whatsoever from the monopoly situation which applies.

I think if you were to ask them they would prefer to have Canadian competition, but if you say "The only competition you can have is going to be an American station via cable" their answer would probably be, "Let's have some competition," because every time they even threaten competition the local television station just does something more.

One of your problems here, if I may say so, is that you are comparing apples and oranges, and when we are dealing with the electronic media we are talking about something which is both an entertainment media and a news media.

If you ask about entertainment, I suspect that many Canadians don't really care what country their entertainment programs come from as long as it's good.

The Chairman: Yes, but you have answered your own question by saying it is both. I agree with you.

The other question I wanted to ask, the last question I have, but I think Mr. Fortier has one, but we will not detain you too much longer is this. It seems to me that the Congress has an ambivalent position when it comes to the CBC. As I read this brief, one minute you are knocking the CBC and the next minute you are praising the CBC.

Mr. Williams and I were talking earlier about a speech I was fortunate enough to make to the Farmer-Labour-Teacher Conference back in June, and in the question period the CBC was flayed, including by you, Mr. MacDonald.

I would like to ask you about this rather—it seems to me—strange attitude you have towards the Corporation.

Mr. MacDonald: We have a basic policy, Mr. Chairman, which is in support of the CBC as a Canadian agency designed for the purpose of contributing to Canadian unity, and we support it on that basis.

Our support is not a blind one. There are many things that happen within the CBC from time to time that we criticize. That is our right. We just don't have to give slavish devotion to the CBC and all its operations and all its programs and everything that goes on in there. As a result or a consequence of our basic policy we cherish the CBC as an institution. We would fight for the retention of it, as we have tried to do from time to time.

The Chairman: Do you exonerate the CBC from this charge of skimpy or distorted news coverage?

Mr. MacDonald: Quite the contrary. Quite the contrary. We have complained over and over and over again to the CBC, and the person to whom we have been most recently complaining is the president of the CBC and his vice-president.

Incidentally, at least there they listen to us and we get some sympathetic reaction, but we go—and I don't want to impose unduly on the time of the Committee—we have criticized the CBC on many occasions.

As a matter of fact, I did it again tonight on the CBC. I don't know if it will appear or not. As a matter of fact, this is one of the criticisms that I voiced to the CBC. I should say this perhaps by way of illustration of what I am talking about.

We have indicated that we think that we are a fairly important and responsible institution within Canadian life, and represent a goodly number of Canadian citizens, and we had complained about the fact that the CBC has ignored us in many instances when we had—at least we think we had—something important to say in connection with developments within Canadian life.

The particular thing I was thinking of was because the president of the CBC had challenged me to give an illustration within a matter of days after I had made my complaint to him regarding the budget that was brought down—it affected the lives and welfare of every Canadian citizen, and certainly of our membership.

The day before that budget was brought down the Canadian Manufacturers Association, which is not exactly the same as the Canadian Labour Congress, was on the CBC with a long statement of what it anticipated and what it desired as far as the budget was concerned in relation to its policy.

I have no quarrel with that. I have no quarrel with them whatsoever. They are a representative group and I think they have their rights to express their views. But we didn't have that opportunity.

Nevertheless, the budget was brought down and the CBC (radio and television) came to me and asked me for a statement. And, as on many other occasions, at considerable inconvenience I give interviews on both the CTV and the CBC only to find that the Canadian Labour Congress' position on the matter was not carried, but the Canadian Manufacturers Association and some other employers' organizations were once again carried.

The Chairman: Did you return to Mr. Davidson?

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I wrote him. I immediately wrote him.

The Chairman: What did he say?

Mr. MacDonald: He admitted that this had happened and that there was always technical reasons, of course, that are advanced by the CBC, and one thing and another, but the thing annoys us and we don't hesitate to let them know about it.

The Chairman: But notwithstanding this fact, would you classify yourself as a friend of public broadcasting?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes. Very, very definitely.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. MacDonald, you and your colleagues have sought to make the point that you were unfairly treated by the mass media. You as a labour organization were unfairly treated by the mass media in Canada.

Is it your view also that the mass media in Canada are not discharging their public responsibility or their responsibility to the public in other respects also in other areas?

Mr. MacDonald: I don't know. I would have to give that one a great deal more thought. I think that that is right, and I know, naturally, that you being counsel would follow up with a supplementary question, so I think this is a position that...

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am not trying to pull any surprise questions on you, but I wondered only in your written as well as verbal presentation today you took into consideration the behaviour of newspapers, radio and television in their treatment of other areas of interest to Canadians.

Mr. MacDonald: Well, right in our brief, as you no doubt know—almost our first complaint was about the quality, and naturally this is analogous to saying they are falling down not only as far as labour is concerned but in general, because the criteria and quality is not determined merely by their treatment of labour matters.

Mr. Fortier: I wondered if you were concentrating exclusively on labour matters.

Mr. MacDonald: No.

Mr. Fortier: You also had in mind other areas?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to ask what those other areas would be?

Mr. MacDonald: Well, I told you that you would ask that supplementary question but happen unfortunately to have been associated with lawyers a great deal during my life...

The Chairman: You said "unfortunately"?

Mr. MacDonald: Yes, that's what I said. anticipated, and you assured me there was going to be a supplementary question.

Mr. Fortier: I didn't know what your answer was going to be. I thought your answer was going to be that you wrote on as the president of the CLC but I see that you wrote—you are wearing many hats; is that correct?

Mr. MacDonald: That's right; because we have an interest in all aspects of Canadian life. Our interest is not narrow and this is one of our basic complaints.

I tried to voice it earlier on but I got sidetracked. Our organization, and all its component parts and its people participate in every aspect of Canadian life, and publicity as such or the use of the media, or the way the media reflects this, shouldn't, naturally, be confined to the collective bargaining process.

We have interests and activities in every phase. There is hardly one aspect of Canadian life that could be mentioned—economic, social, political, cultural—in which we are not deeply involved.

Mr. Fortier: Are you saying that by and large Canadians are not getting from their newspapers, radio and television the news that they should get?

Mr. MacDonald: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: All the news that they should receive?

Mr. MacDonald: That's right. Again, in here we have pointed this up, and we have recognized, as no doubt you noted in here, that we are realistic enough to know that this has to be a matter of editorial judgment. We have made that point, or at least we have tried to make it, emphatically here. But certainly that is true.

There is no medium today that can, even if it so desires, disseminate all the news and all the information that is immediately available to it.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you are saying that the editor of a newspaper has to pick and choose?

Mr. MacDonald: Sure.

Mr. Fortier: Are you saying that the editors of Canadian newspapers are not picking and choosing as they should?

Mr. MacDonald: In some cases, yes, in our view.

Mr. Fortier: As Mr. Andras corrected me earlier, and I apologize to him for my oversight, but in paragraph 25 of your written presentation you say that you would like to see the ownership of mass media segregated from the ownership of other forms of capital. You go so far as to say, or to suggest, that this should be done through appropriate legislative measures.

My question—and this is my last question—is, within the mass media have you any views as to whether within any given region, newspapers should be owned by the same people who own the electronic media?

Mr. MacDonald: Oh, I am sorry; I must apologize. I thought you prefaced your statement by saying you were directing your question to Mr. Andras.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I apologize, but I will direct my question to Mr. Andras then. I discussed it with him during the adjournment, and I would like to have his views on the record.

Mr. Andras: We are concerned, Mr. Fortier, as we say in our brief, about the possibility of a monopoly over the dissemination of news or information, or whatever.

We would consider it against public policy that a radio station, for example, or a TV station, in the community should be owned simultaneously by the owner of the local newspaper, if, as so often is the case, there is a single newspaper in the community.

We are afraid of the implications of monopoly of control over communications.

Mr. Fortier: And you suggest that this be dealt with by legislation?

Mr. Andras: We believe that it could be dealt with to avoid the beneficial ownership of various forms ostensibly competing but not necessarily competing forms of communication by the same owner or group of owners.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

The Chairman: Well, senators, on your behalf, and on behalf of the Committee, I would like to thank the representatives from the Canadian Labour Congress.

I would say to you, Mr. MacDonald, that I honestly believe the fact that you have been asked here this evening is a demonstration of the fact that the Committee is in fact interested in your views, and that is why we wanted them.

I would say to you that I hope you might, in the weeks which follow and for the balance of our hearing, follow the proceedings in the daily press, and, I think this is terribly important, read the transcript which gives, I think, a fuller picture.

The point I did want to make is that it may be that the Congress may wish to submit a further brief. I am afraid it would have to be a written brief because we are working to a tight schedule. But if you have additional information or further thoughts as our hearings proceed, we would be delighted to receive it.

Thank you very much for coming.

The Committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Friday, January 23, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 11:30 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this morning we are receiving a brief from the Halifax Herald Limited, the publishers of the "Chronicle-Herald" and the "Mail-Star".

Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. G. W. Dennis the President, and on his right is Mr. F. Daley, Q.C., Vice-President and solicitor.

Sitting on my immediate left is Mr. Harold Hea a senior member of the news department and on his immediate left is Mr. Frederick Mounsee who is the General Manager.

Mr. Dennis, the brief we requested was received number of weeks in advance. It has been circulated and read and presumably studied by the Senators and if you wish you may take some time now, sir, perhaps 10, 12 or 15 minutes to explain, amplify or add to your brief or in fact say anything else which may be on your mind and then following that the Senators will question you on the contents of your brief and on your oral comments and perhaps on some other matters as well.

Mr. G. W. Dennis (President and Publisher of the Chronicle-Herald and Mail-Star): Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators. Our appearance before your committee today affords us an opportunity for a few oral remarks. To begin with our newspapers have been operating for almost a century by Nova Scotians. The "Chronicle-Herald" and "the Mail-Star" are not part of a chain or were the their predecessor companies in the past.

At no time since before the nineteen hundred has the ownership of these newspapers been held by anyone other than Nova Scotians.

As a matter of fact, this company has been owned by members of my family for three generations. We trust they will continue to be the property of Nova Scotians for many years to come. We have strived to make our newspapers the best in Atlantic Canada.

We have grown up with Nova Scotia, we believe we have won a mandate to continue our job because the people of our province on the whole trust our judgment. They respect our human manner in dealing with people, admire our independence and responsibility and rely on our ability and willingness to speak out on their behalf when the need arises.

We believe that our assignment is to serve the people of Nova Scotia whose needs and aspirations we think we understand. From our point of view local ownership is preferable to non-provincial ownership providing service with reasoned judgment and firm dedication is never a simple task for anyone, but it is the less difficult because our newspapers are part of the traditions of the province in which we live. While we favour independent ownership as the better way, we are sympathetic to the problems faced by many publishers who have fallen victims to the crushing burden of rising operational costs.

Some of them have been driven to the decision to advocate their roles in society by ceasing to publish. Others have found it possible to continue publication by turning to the protective umbrella of the chain or the conglomerates who possess great financial and technical resources. This trend to group ownership of dailies or weeklies will continue in Canada as long as there are laws on our statute books—the estate tax is a case in point—which raise difficult and at times almost insurmountable barriers to private ownership.

We do not feel that there should be legislation to prohibit the growth of chain ownership but we feel that there is a need for an economic climate to permit a newspaper or any other type of business for that matter to remain independent if it so chooses.

There is an urgent need, we believe, where parliamentary examination of laws relating to business ownership in all fields. This is to ensure that companies are protected against the threat of being legislated out of business and forced by tax laws to give up local control.

While we are dedicated to the cause of Nova Scotia, we are also strong supporters of federalism in the Canadian nation. We maintain this viewpoint has long formed one of the corner-stones of our editorial policy, that Canada is only as strong as all her component parts. For that reason we have long been advocates of the proposition that ways and means must be found to bring about greater equality among all the regions of this country.

Sometimes we editorialize in favour of the economic climate conducive to strong industrial development. We may seek more equitable freight rates to enable our goods to have easier access to the market place of Central Canada or we may call for transportation and tariff policies designed to encourage a lower price for so many of the commodities we must import.

In each case, we are speaking on behalf of our fellow Nova Scotians.

In general, we strive for objectivity and fairness at all times. That, Honourable Senators, and Mr. Chairman, concludes my opening remarks with the exception of one thing.

In our written brief there was a line left out—transposed on page 6. On page 6 in the last paragraph where it says—I will begin with the second sentence.

"Bias and prejudice on the part of reporters have no place in the news columns. Reporters are reporters of society, not its judges."

These two sentences should read as follows:

"Bias and prejudice on the part of reporters of our newspapers are not permitted. Our staff acts as reporters of society, not its judges."

The Chairman: Would you like to read that again, please?

Mr. Dennis:

"Bias and prejudice on the part of reporters of our newspapers is not permitted. Our staff acts as reporters of society, not its judges."

Senator Prowse: In other words, for reporters you substitute there "our staff"?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

The Chairman: Acts as reporters of society, not its judges.

Mr. Dennis: That's right.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Dennis. I think that the questions will be put to you but if you wish to farm them out to one of your colleagues, please feel free to do so. If there is anything that we ask which you feel is of a confidential nature and prefer answer it in camera by all means please indicate that.

Senator Prowse: First of all, you talk of newspapers. You have two?

Mr. Dennis: No, a morning and evening edition of the same paper.

Senator Prowse: But with a different name?

Mr. Dennis: But with a different name.

Senator Prowse: What is your circulation?

Mr. Dennis: Our circulation is around 120,000.

Senator Prowse: That is the combined circulation?

Mr. Dennis: Morning and evening, yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, you cover more than just the City of Halifax?

Mr. Dennis: I would say . . .

Senator Prowse: Can you give us an idea?

Mr. Dennis: Well, let me put it to you this way, Senators. We publish a morning paper and its circulation is roughly in the vicinity of 65 to 70,000. Our paper we have endeavoured, and to the best of our ability we try to maintain it but we do have a tight schedule but we would like to get the morning paper into Yarmouth 250 miles to the south of Halifax at eight o'clock.

The Chairman: That is something the Gloucester and Mail can't do here in Ottawa!

Senator Prowse: That is eight o'clock in the morning?

Mr. Dennis: Eight o'clock in the morning. We are a morning newspaper, sir. 250 miles down in Yarmouth and to the Annapolis Valley as well. All of them down the south more for the same distance practically and we also drive northeast 300 miles to Sydney, the industrial heart of Cape Breton. This is 100 miles from Halifax and we try to get there by eight o'clock in the morning.

Senator Prowse: What do you use, trucks or buses?

Mr. Dennis: Trucks. We sublet it out to contractors.

Senator Prowse: Who deliver it to the areas?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, when it gets to where it is going is it delivered by delivery boys or by the post office?

Mr. Dennis: In incorporated towns, Senator, in most of the incorporated towns there are carrier boys to deliver and dealers.

The Chairman: Just one question. When is that paper printed, that is in Yarmouth at eight o'clock in the morning, when is it printed?

Mr. Dennis: I will let Mr. Shea answer that.

Mr. Harold Shea (Senior Member of The Laws Department): Our paper concludes its press run normally by 1.30 a.m.

Senator Prowse: And that is for your rural delivery?

Mr. Shea: That's right.

Senator Prowse: So your morning paper is for your rural delivery generally?

Mr. Shea: Yes, there is a large circulation in Halifax, about 17 or 18 thousand papers morning papers sold within the City of Halifax. The times I gave you were incorrect, sir. We start about 12.30 and we finish the run at four a.m.

Senator Prowse: It is on your press run?

Mr. Shea: Yes, sir.

Mr. Dennis: We also go 150 miles west from Halifax to Truro and up to Amherst and Skville, New Brunswick, sir, every day. We do this every day for the morning delivery of our paper.

Senator Prowse: So, in effect you have a provincial paper?

Mr. Dennis: We have a provincial paper, sir.

Senator Prowse: Does that apply to both of them or do you integrate—well, what I have in mind is this. You produce two papers a day?

Mr. Dennis: A morning and an evening, sir.

Senator Prowse: To what extent to the areas of service of those papers overlap on the same day. For example, if I lived in Halifax, I could take a morning paper or I could take an evening paper presumably and get precisely the same news. I might get the afternoon news tomorrow morning or the morning news in the afternoon but...

Mr. Dennis: Senator Prowse, we have endeavoured and are endeavouring all the time to strive to keep the papers as distinct as possible. If there is an important news story in the "Herald" and if there is nothing new on the subject and it is important enough we carry it into the Mail. We may do more research or reporting or scurry around and dig up more important points of view to enlarge upon it; it all depends. The "Mail" is more distinctively a Halifax paper or local paper.

Senator Prowse: That is the afternoon paper?

Mr. Dennis: That is the afternoon paper Senator.

Senator Prowse: The "Chronicle-Herald" is the morning paper and that is the one which really is the provincial paper?

Mr. Dennis: The provincial paper, sir.

Senator Prowse: The afternoon paper, the "Mail-Star", this is really the local Halifax paper?

Mr. Dennis: That's right.

Senator Prowse: That is the one where they take it in the afternoon so they can read it in the evening?

Mr. Dennis: That's right.

Senator Prowse: Do you have separate staffs for these two papers?

Mr. Dennis: Yes. We have a separate composing room, night staff in our composing room; we have separate staffs.

Senator Prowse: Well, you use the same mechanical facilities for both papers?

Mr. Dennis: The same facilities, sir. We have a separate night side in our press room and a night side in our editorial reporting and day side in our reporting.

Senator Prowse: Now, do the same editorials appear in the both newspapers?

Mr. Dennis: No, I would say that the odd one might appear if it is important enough but we try our best to keep them distinctive.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you have separate editorial staff for both newspapers? Well, just let me make this clear. I am trying to get a picture. I was brought up in an area and actually worked in a newspaper where we had a morning edition which came out at 10.30 and we did various replates during the day where the final would probably go to press around two o'clock in the afternoon with a press run spread over the day so that we could meet rural deliveries through the day, so that when you talk about the morning edition of the paper, this was a certain carryover from the day before. Like for example, sport news that was written that night in particular and certain advertising was carried for the whole day and editorials. You wouldn't have a separate editorial in the different editions during the day. They would change day by day. I am talking about what used to be page three but what is it in your paper?

Mr. Dennis: Page 6.

Senator Prowse: It is pretty well standard now isn't it?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, do you have an "opposite-the-editorial page" as well?

Mr. Dennis: Page 7, Senator, six days a week, sir, and on Saturday afternoon in the "Mail".

Senator Prowse: You have a Sunday paper as well?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir.

Senator Prowse: You just run the six days?

Mr. Dennis: That's right, sir.

Senator Prowse: Being good Presbyterians I take it you don't print papers or don't do anything on Sunday?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir, I will tell you. I went over to the United Church but I am leaving to go to the Board of Governors of a Baptist University, sir. It is a good mixture, isn't it?

Senator Prowse: I asked the question because my mother was a Presbyterian from Halifax. We couldn't even whistle on Sunday.

Mr. Dennis: We started out that way, sir.

Senator Phillips: You still can't whistle on any day of the week!

Senator Prowse: Well, mother doesn't whistle but the rest of us do.

Now, with your two papers, then, do you have an opinion page? I am interested in your opinion pages.

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir.

Senator Prowse: And particularly the opinion of the paper, the editorial page. Now, you have two separate editorial boards for these papers or do the same editorial write for these papers. In other words if I picked up your morning paper and read the editorial—if I got into Halifax say at eight o'clock in the morning and grabbed a paper and then I bought one at six o'clock at night would I be reading the same editorials?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir.

Senator Prowse: They are written by different people?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Do you make any effort to ensure that these two editorial boards have different background outlook or who has the final say, how do you decide what attitude you are going to take here?

Mr. Dennis: Well, as publisher, I sit every morning on the editorial conference and see each department head every morning.

Senator Prowse: So for both papers you sit in the morning?

Mr. Dennis: We have head editorial meetings at a quarter after nine in the morning and we sit down and discuss the editorials that we are going to have and if they have ideas I will hear them and if I have ideas they will hear me and if I am wrong I will listen to them and if they are wrong they will listen to me.

Senator Prowse: Who wins mostly?

Mr. Dennis: Well, sir, common sense wins.

Senator Prowse: But who decides what common sense is?

Mr. Dennis: In the final analysis, sir, the responsibility is mine.

Senator Prowse: This is the point I was getting at. In other words, as the publisher you have the final say.

Mr. Dennis: That's right, sir.

Senator Prowse: In other words the people know that you own the paper and if they don't like what is in the paper they know how to be mad at?

Mr. Dennis: That's right, sir. They can also write letters to the editor.

Senator Prowse: Dealing with letters to the editor, do you publish all the letters you receive?

Mr. Dennis: I would say that—well, Mr. Shea, you are more familiar with this.

Mr. Shea: We publish as space will allow, sir. There was a time some years back when the letter volume was so great that we had to print extra space next to the editorial page for additional letters to the editor. But those things occur when there are times of major crisis on the national or international level.

Senator Prowse: Could you specify one or two of them?

Mr. Shea: Well, the flag debate for example.

Senator Prowse: That is what I thought.

Mr. Shea: We were simply flooded on that issue.

Senator Phillips: I beg your pardon?

The Chairman: The flag debate.

Mr. Shea: Yes, the flag debate and we receive plenty of letters for example on the Canadian Football League.

The Chairman: Do you, that is very interesting. What do they write about the Canadian Football League in Halifax?

Mr. Shea: They would like to have a team in Halifax.

The Chairman: Some people are in favour of that.

Mr. Shea: We haven't been able to graduate many football players. But, to get back, sir, we publish most of our letters, practically all of them. Those that are offensive or maybe considered libelous and that sort of thing we don't publish.

Senator Prowse: What do you mean offensive?

Mr. Shea: Personally vindictive without a real cause, sir. If somebody writes a letter to say that the grocery man on the corner is a fink for example, we wouldn't necessarily publish that because that is a private argument but by-and-large we publish most of our letters.

Senator McElman: What if he is a fink?

Mr. Shea: That would be a matter of personal judgment.

Senator Prowse: This is when you talk to Mr. Daley?

Mr. Shea: This is correct.

Senator Prowse: To find out whether it has good legal grounds?

Mr. Shea: Yes, indeed.

Senator Prowse: You will understand that a lot of the questions that you are being asked here is because your opinion should be on the record, not mine, so you being given a chance to answer here.

Mr. Shea: Yes.

Senator Prowse: You have said that it is clearly understood in the area that you are responsible

Mr. Dennis: That is right, sir.

Senator Prowse: How long have you had the terrible responsibility of being the sole purveyor of the printed word to Nova Scotia?

Mr. Dennis: Well, first of all, sir, we are not the sole purveyor of the printed word, sir, in Nova Scotia. There is the "Sydney Post Record" in Cape Breton with a circulation of 25,000 which covers Cape Breton very, very well.

There is the "New Glasgow Daily News" which operates in Pictou County and up and down the Northumberland Straits and Hawkesbury.

There is the "Amherst Daily News" in Amherst.

Senator Prowse: Now, where is that?

Mr. Dennis: That is on the border between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Senator Prowse: Down towards the south as well?

Mr. Dennis: No, it is right at the top. Right between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Sydney is in the north.

Senator Prowse: Yes, I know Sydney.

The Chairman: Well, we are not interested in a discussion of the map of Nova Scotia...

Senator Prowse: Well, I am, Mr. Chairman, with all respect I have asked the question and I will have an answer.

The Chairman: Well, all right, Senator. Your fourth paper then, please?

Mr. Dennis: Our fourth paper is the "Truro Daily News" in Colchester County.

The Chairman: I think Senator Prowse will be annoyed with me if I ask you to describe where Truro is so...

Mr. Dennis: Truro is about halfway—that is roughly speaking—about halfway between Halifax and Amherst.

Senator Prowse: But generally you have the big paper?

Mr. Dennis: We have the big morning paper in Nova Scotia, sir.

Senator Prowse: And, there is impingements from these other smaller papers in their local areas. There is an impingement in circulation?

Mr. Dennis: That is right, sir.

Senator Prowse: But in Halifax itself you have the terrible responsibility of being the sole purveyor of the printed word is that correct, on a daily basis?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, what provision do you take in order to ensure a wide diversity of opinion for the public to consider and of fact?

Mr. Shea: Well, Senator Prowse, if I may ask you to rephrase the question. Are you asking what methods we use to cover news independently and fairly, is that the point you are making?

Senator Prowse: Well, perhaps if I can put it this way. It has been said that the duty of a newspaper is to provide a diverse expression of opinion and as diverse an interpretation of fact as possible. How do you achieve that? In other words how do you make sure there is two sides to every question, how do you make sure that your readers have access to both sides?

Mr. Shea: There is a standing rule of course in the newspaper, as there is in practically all the newspapers, that the reporters' news have no fixed opinion on a story. The function is to report both sides adequately and fairly in the news columns. The editorial position is a little different.

We may take a viewpoint on one side the other but never without consideration. In fact we did take an opinion that was different from others, the comments of our letters to the editor are open to those who wish to dissent and at the same time anybody who cares to write can do so.

In fact, we solicit contrary opinions to our own. These are published in the page immediately next to the editorial page. Does that answer your question?

Senator Prowse: Well, I want to know that. The editorials that appear in the morning and the evening paper are not written by the same people and don't cover the same subject. Am I correct?

Mr. Shea: Yes, this is correct, sir. Perhaps I had better put it this way. On the editorial staff itself, we have people who are assigned specifically to the Chronicle-Herald to write editorials. There are people who are assigned specifically to the Mail-Star to write editorials and there are additions who may be asked to write for either paper.

Senator Prowse: And is it a common practise or uncommon practise for the Chronicle-Herald to carry an editorial saying something ought to be done about the slow development of the heavy water plant and the Mail-Star to carry an editorial saying we have to be patient with the new kind of technical development. This is an example but do you have this type of thing?

Mr. Shea: I think it would be unusual for the editorials to differ with each other, although it is not inconceivable that they might.

Senator Prowse: Do they ever?

Mr. Shea: I can't honestly recall an incident.

Mr. Dennis: I couldn't cite an example right offhand, sir, but I think I can recall in the last 20 years or so, or even as far as my mind goes back, that we have had occasions when there have been issues.

Senator Prowse: Expressions of both sides?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

The Chairman: On major issues?

Mr. L. F. Daley (Vice-President and Solicitor): I wouldn't think so.

Senator Prowse: The final thing is that Mr. Dennis, you are the man that carries the ball and everybody knows it?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And it is really your opinion that they are really?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, it is my responsibility. No, I wouldn't say that, it is the considered opinion of our editorials.

Senator Prowse: Well, let us say it is your opinion as it may be modified by the expressions of the people you depend on?

Mr. Dennis: The wise publisher does that, I, I would think.

Senator Prowse: You haven't on occasion in the morning paper, for example, let's say at a municipal election support one set of candidates and the afternoon edition—the Star—support a different one?

Mr. Dennis: Not to my knowledge.

Senator Prowse: Do you support sets of candidates? Let's talk about the mayoralty of Halifax. Do you support, or does the paper have an opinion?

Mr. Dennis: Senator, I think that I could say that we would give each equal prominence. I think we would give equal prominence to all candidates running for office.

Senator Prowse: Well, we are talking now I think about news?

Mr. Dennis: May I say, sir, if instead of personalities, there was an issue, a real issue, something of terrific importance, I think that we would come out and say that this is a good idea.

Senator Prowse: Well, let's not talk about what we might do, but specifically.

The Chairman: I think I can help you. For example in Toronto each of the three papers specifically recommend a man for the mayoralty. Do your papers do that?

Mr. Daley: I don't think we do.

Mr. Dennis: No.

Senator Prowse: Why not?

The Chairman: Or in any other way?

Mr. Daley: No, I think the statements issued by the candidates which are carried as news items speak for themselves.

The Chairman: I didn't mean that as an embarrassing question, but you don't specifically recommend a candidate which I believe is Senator Prowse's question?

Mr. Dennis: No.

Mr. Daley: No, we don't.

Senator Prowse: You are Mr....

Mr. Daley: Mr. Daley.

Senator Prowse: You are the solicitor?

Mr. Daley: And vice-president.

Senator Prowse: And you sit on the editorial board?

Mr. Daley: Well, I sit in on some of the editorial conferences.

Senator Prowse: So, you are speaking now not as their solicitor but as a person who has an interest in the paper?

Mr. Daley: Yes.

Senator Prowse: You don't support candidates with the paper yourself? The paper doesn't take a stand that way?

Mr. Daley: No, we wouldn't select Mr. Smith as against Mr. Jones by name necessarily. We might support Mr. Smith...

Senator Prowse: Maybe we should take Mr. Brown and Mr. Jones here.

Mr. Daley: All right.

Senator Prowse: You wouldn't take a name and you don't say that the paper supports so and so and it is the paper's opinion? Why not?

Mr. Daley: Well, I think we are perhaps generalizing here. I am making this as a general proposition and I wouldn't say that we have never done so. In the case of a provincial election for example...

The Chairman: Well, just for a moment, Senator Prowse is asking about municipal election.

Senator Prowse: I did it deliberately because everybody in this room represents a political party and if we are talking about municipalities we can get the principle without having it confused with some other things. I would think that actually living in Halifax, for mayor and council they have a much more serious impingement on your immediate pocketbook than your federal members for example.

Mr. Shea: Well, we have had certain editorials in which we have been critical of our present mayor and we have had editorials in which we have been critical of a certain alderman and also applauded a particular alderman.

Senator Prowse: Well, you have in Halifax and Dartmouth a very large negro population I believe and in your province generally.

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Have you carried any articles about the depressed position that they seem to be in?

Mr. Dennis: A great many. May I read this, Senator?

Senator Prowse: By all means.

Mr. Dennis:

"Minority groups and human rights. Our record of campaigning for the equality of the rights of man is of course favourably known. Our reporting and editorial campaign for the elimination of the Africville ghetto and our pleadings for construction of respectable housing in an integrated society is largely responsible for the success of that aim. The fact that the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission blocked vigorous attempts to hire two of our reporters..."

The Chairman: It has been asked whether document you are reading?

Mr. Dennis: I have some notes here on questions which we thought might be asked.

The Chairman: I am sorry, fine, go ahead.

Mr. Dennis:

"The fact that the Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission blocked vigorous attempts to hire two of our reporters, Mr. Jim Robson and Mrs. Sheila Urquhart for full-time employment in that field is tribute to their sympathetic coverage of that of our newspapers. Our coverage of Human Rights Conferences has attracted favourable comments from officers of the Nova Scotia Society for the Advancement of Coloured People.

We have quite properly, we feel, not reported the Black Panther Movement excess which a year ago made a sort of entry into our province, but we have said editorially that we support the rights of Indians and Negroes who organize the present associations and urged other organizations to offer their services to assist in the quest for a solution to their problems."

You might want to recall our efforts. For years we sponsored on CHNS the annual broadcast to raise funds for the Home for Coloured Children and we were involved in Rainbow Haven offering summertime vacations for underprivileged boys and girls of all races.

Senator Prowse: How many Negroes do you have on your staff?

Mr. Dennis: It varies. I would say we have at least eight.

Mr. Frederic Mounce (General Manager): All throughout the building, Senator, the classified department and the composing room...

Senator Prowse: I don't know where they are and that is why I am asking.

Mr. Mounce: Is this what you want?

Senator Prowse: I am doing a straight firing question which no lawyer is supposed to do. I don't know what the answer is.

Mr. Mounce: Well, they are not in any other department, Senator. They are in the news department of the newspaper.

Senator Prowse: In the editorial department s well?

Mr. Mounce: I must qualify that, sir. We ad a Negro in our editorial department...

Mr. Shea: Yes, we did have a Negro in our itorial department recently, sir, but he has ft and gone to the Globe and Mail.

Senator Prowse: In other words he worked ith you as a reporter?

Mr. Shea: Indeed, sir, yes.

Senator Prowse: And after his training he ent to a job with the Globe and Mail?

Mr. Shea: To a job with the Globe and ail. What happened, sir, was this. We cruitied him as a potential reporter while he as in university and as a matter of fact we egaged him at that time while he was a sident as a university correspondent for us ad upon his graduation we engaged him as a ill-time reporter. He worked for us for most six years and I think because of some rsonal reasons and no other—personal within the family I believe, sir, he decided he wanted to live in Toronto for the time being.

Senator Prowse: Well, what you are telling is that he left Halifax to go to Toronto. Id you fire him first?

Mr. Shea: No, not at all.

The Chairman: I wonder, Senator—I will ene back to you I promise but some of the ous Senators...

Senator Prowse: At this point I would say tit I would yield the floor now and I can over more later if you wish me to.

The Chairman: Absolutely, I am sure I do.

Senator Prowse: It was my intention to suggest that.

The Chairman: I will turn to Senator Phil- lis after I ask one question myself. It must b very easy to sell advertising for your newspaper?

Mr. Dennis: Well, sir, we have two televi- ish stations in Halifax, we have a radio sta- tion, CJCH, we have radio station CHNS, and radio station CBH, we have radio station CDR in Dartmouth, we have radio station CNS-FM competition for the advertising dollar...

The Chairman: Do you think that radio advertising is as effective as newspaper advertising?

Mr. Dennis: Senator, don't you think I am a little prejudiced on that point?

The Chairman: Well, I would be interested in your answer.

Mr. Dennis: I have been brought up by the printed word, sir, and I believe the printed word.

The Chairman: You would agree that there is more newspaper advertising in this country than there is by television by quite a consid- erable amount?

Mr. Dennis: Well, I would say that I think that newspapers, for most types of business, do the best type promotion work.

The Chairman: Do your two papers main- tain separate advertising sales staff?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir.

The Chairman: So that the same salesmen sell for both papers?

Mr. Dennis: That's right, sir.

The Chairman: Is it possible either nation- ally or locally to place an advertisement in one of the two papers only?

Mr. Mounce: Yes, it is, sir.

The Chairman: Is it done frequently— nationally first, Mr. Mounce?

Mr. Mounce: Not so much nationally.

The Chairman: Is it ever done nationally?

Mr. Mounce: Yes, it is.

The Chairman: It is done?

Mr. Mounce: Yes, it is, and again we have a queer set up. They may wish to advertise in the "Mail" in the afternoon and in the "Her- ald" the next morning, but they can take one paper or the other.

The Chairman: But they could advertise only in the Mail?

Mr. Mounce: Yes.

The Chairman: Is that done often?

Mr. Mounce: Not too often.

The Chairman: Is it done every week?

Mr. Mounce: No.

The Chairman: Is it done every month by some national advertiser?

Mr. Mounce: No, I would say very infrequently.

The Chairman: How about locally, is it the same thing?

Mr. Mounce: No.

The Chairman: I would just like to come to this question as to how real the competition is between the two newspapers. Is there a competition—obviously not for advertising dollars because the same people are selling—but is there a competition for news stories?

Mr. Shea: We have a separate staff.

The Chairman: A separate staff?

Mr. Shea: Yes.

The Chairman: So, are the reporters working for the afternoon paper who are competing in trying to get a scoop on reporters who work for the morning paper?

Mr. Shea: Yes.

The Chairman: Would it be fair to say that you have a monopoly for printed local news in Halifax?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir.

The Chairman: On a daily basis?

Mr. Dennis: Well, may I say to you I don't think that is a good term.

The Chairman: Well, choose your own term.

Mr. Dennis: Well, I would say to you that we publish the only morning daily newspaper in Halifax. There are two television stations and three radio stations.

The Chairman: No, but I said printed news.

Mr. Dennis: In the printed word...

The Chairman: Well, again, I expect you to be biased because you said you have a prejudice. I am sure you would agree with me that radio newscasts really can't give the kind of in-depth coverage that a newspaper can.

Mr. Dennis: I am glad to hear you say that.

The Chairman: Well, I believe it.

Mr. Dennis: I am glad you do.

The Chairman: And you would agree with me that the four newspapers that you mentioned in Nova Scotia have virtually no circulation in the City of Halifax?

Mr. Dennis: Well, some of them come sir, yes, but not too much. They don't come to too great an extent.

The Chairman: Well, how many papers day?

Mr. Dennis: I don't know.

The Chairman: Well, would they all to sell 100 papers?

Mr. Dennis: Oh, far more than that.

The Chairman: Far more, how much more?

Mr. Dennis: Maybe 1,000 or 2,000.

The Chairman: Do you think that they would sell 2,000?

Mr. Dennis: Well, there are a lot of Bretoners who live in Halifax, people who live in Truro and Amherst and New Glasgow who like to keep their home-ties. They like to find out what is going on at home.

The Chairman: How would you describe for purposes of advertising—how would you describe your coverage of Halifax? You say it is not a monopoly...

Mr. Dennis: Not for advertising.

The Chairman: Well, I asked a question here to the other day of the London Press. Would you describe your position as being overwhelmingly dominant?

Mr. Daley: In the printed form I think it would be so.

The Chairman: Overwhelmingly dominant in print?

Mr. Daley: Yes.

Senator Phillips: Before I begin my questioning, Mr. Chairman, I first want to assure you that I feel that the staff of the Halifax Herald didn't feel they were demoting any individual that they let go to come to the "Globe and Mail".

Senator Prowse: They made that clear.

Mr. Shea: I beg your pardon, Senator.

Senator Phillips: Just wanted to assure the Chairman that you people really didn't...

you were demoting the individual who left to me to the "Globe and Mail".

The Chairman: I think Senator Phillips is suggesting that a move to Toronto is not a step forward. I am sure in his opinion it isn't!

Senator Phillips: Mr. Dennis, you mentioned that you felt you spoke for all Nova Scotians. I can remember and I am sure at least one other member of the committee can remember when you used to be much more of a Maritime newspaper than you are now.

Mr. Dennis: That's right.

Senator Phillips: For instance you used to come into my home with a special section for Prince Edward Island. What occurred or what developed that made you cancel that?

Mr. Dennis: Cost, sir. Cost of operations.

Senator Phillips: Lack of profits?

Mr. Dennis: I would say that—cost of operations, yes, sir.

Senator Phillips: One thing I do enjoy about your newspaper is the fact that on special events across Canada you send out your own reporters to cover these?

Mr. Dennis: We try to do our best, Senator.

Senator Phillips: To report back rather than taking straight Canadian Press stories? I rather enjoy this. Can you give me any idea as to what percentage of major events in Canada would be covered that way as opposed to CP coverage?

Mr. Dennis: Well, may I ask Mr. Shea to answer that question, Senator?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Mr. Shea: If I may take last year, Senator—and a reference here...

Mr. Dennis: I have it here, Harold. We have been following your deliberations and these answers are ones that we have arrived at by answering your previous questions, sir.

The Chairman: I think this is referred to in my brief at page 12 but would you care to enlighten those for us, Mr. Shea?

Mr. Shea: In the past year, in 1969, as an example, our staff covered the entire session of the New Brunswick Legislature in Fredericton, all the constitutional and fiscal conferences in Ottawa, the policy conference of the Progressive Conservative Party in Niagara Falls, the policy conference of the Liberal Party in Harrison Hot Springs in British Columbia.

Senator Phillips: And in Quebec?

Mr. Shea: And in Quebec, sir. A week ago we staffed the Liberal Leadership Convention in Quebec City. We, for example, also did the Newfoundland Liberal Leadership Convention and...

Senator Phillips: My question, Mr. Shea, was you had one of your reporters in Newfoundland?

Mr. Shea: Yes.

Senator Phillips: Do you use his stories solely or do you also use CP's?

Mr. Shea: Most of the time, sir our reporters are assigned on events of this kind, and on events of national importance and they can either do one of the two things. They size it up once they get there and if for example there is a special Nova Scotia or Maritimes story that develops in the convention or conference or whatever it is that may not be played up adequately by the Canadian Press wire because it is not of major or national importance, our staff then zeroes in on that.

We use both—Canadian Press copy plus our own. Does that answer your question, sir?

Senator Phillips: Yes.

The Chairman: On this question of coverage I note that you covered the Progressive Conservative Conference in Niagara Falls and the Liberal Conference in Harrison Hot Springs, but not the NDP Conference in Winnipeg.

Mr. Shea: I think that is true.

The Chairman: Is there any reason for that?

Mr. Shea: Not that I know of.

Senator Phillips: Have you been approached by any of the so-called chains to purchase your newspaper?

Mr. Dennis: Off and on. Off and on we get people who would like to purchase it.

The Chairman: Which one of the three major ones have approached you?

Mr. Dennis: Well, I would say...

The Chairman: I might say that that is a question we have asked several publishers this week and they have answered it so I am not trying to embarrass you. Would it be fair to say that they have all approached you?

Mr. Dennis: Most of them have, sir, most of them have approached us at one time or another but I would say this to you—we feel that this paper should preferably be owned by Nova Scotians.

The Chairman: Well, you have made that clear in your brief.

Mr. Dennis: It is a sacred trust as far as we are concerned.

The Chairman: Well, I think Senator Phillips is asking the question not as it relates to you but as it relates to the activity of the chains.

Senator Phillips: This question may sound a bit argumentative, Mr. Dennis, but I notice in your brief you said that it was your viewpoint that editorials mould public opinion. This is a viewpoint that I know editors like to have but it is one I never wanted to accept and I am rather curious to know or to find out what particular special wisdom the editors have to mould public opinion as opposed to any other group?

Mr. Dennis: I would say that they have a right to discuss the pros and cons of an issue, sir. I don't think they should be too far ahead of public opinion.

Senator Phillips: Yes, but moulding to me means that you are directing in one specific direction?

Mr. Shea: I think perhaps we help shape, help mould, help shape the news.

The Chairman: But with great respect, gentlemen, I don't think you are answering Senator Phillips' question. His question, as I understand it, is what special wisdom you have to mould public opinion?

Senator Prowse: To justify...

The Chairman: Well, I think his question stands by itself. It is a good question.

Mr. Daley: If I may interject, Mr. Chairman...

The Chairman: Yes, of course.

Mr. Daley: I think on the matters of great importance to Nova Scotia we attempt to make an in-depth study and call upon as much expertise as we can as to the ramifications and make a decision on an issue, whatever that decision may be. Having done that we chart our course.

For example, from time to time we are very critical about tariff policies. And if one lives in the Maritimes for a long time one gets to know pretty well what the ramifications of the current tariff policies are insofar as they affect the Maritimes and we tend in that respect to mould public opinion and to gather up public opinion so that there may be a common voice on that issue.

Now, that is one example but freight rates are another, and taxation.

Mr. Dennis: And tourism.

Mr. Daley: And tourism is another. We feel that living in the Maritimes you should take a particular interest in every aspect of the economic life of the Maritimes. We recognize right off the bat that we are not experts on any given subject but as I say we attempt to get some expertise from outside sources.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, if I may. With respect to the matter of freight rates and the tariff policy, I suggest that it is the best example because public opinion is pretty well formed. I think you would agree with me at least as far as the Maritimes are concerned.

Could we try another example that Mr. Shea raised a short while ago, the flag debate? What approach did the newspaper take editorially on the burning issue of the time moulding public opinion?

Mr. Shea: Well, I think we supported the retention of the Union Jack as I recall.

Mr. Dennis: That's right.

Senator McElman: Did this apply to newspapers?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir.

Senator McElman: Do you believe that there was a case of moulding public opinion or do you believe that it was the reflection of the majority view of your readers?

Mr. Dennis: I think that reflected a segment of the Nova Scotia people there.

Senator McElman: Then you were reflecting rather than moulding?

Mr. Dennis: That's right, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Dennis, you said earlier that insofar as editorial opinions were concerned, in the end, was your responsibility as publisher?

Mr. Dennis: In the final analysis, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I would like to go from the area of editorial policy to the area of news coverage. I would like to ask you this question. When the time comes to decide whether a particular piece of news should or should not be published in your newspaper, who decides that?

Mr. Dennis: I would say that we have a general understanding in the news department—the managing editor handles this and it is referred to him, and if he has any doubts, hesitations or questions about it, he will come down and talks it over with me.

Mr. Fortier: Has it ever happened in the past that news stories have been killed, as you say in the trade, and not published in your newspapers?

Mr. Shea: Yes, sir, I suppose. Not as frequently as in the past but there are now occasionally stories that have had to be killed because of libelous content.

Mr. Fortier: Is that the only reason they could have to be killed because of libelous content?

Mr. Shea: That is the only reason now, sir, or they would be killed, yes. There was a time, I suppose, long ago when stories had to be killed because of censorship and that kind of thing.

Mr. Fortier: What instructions do you give your reporters when they go out to seek the news? Do they receive any specific instructions?

Mr. Shea: Their instructions are to cover the story and to present a balanced picture of what the story is all about.

Mr. Fortier: To cover the story as you put on page 6 of your brief, "clearly and fairly." Is that correct?

Mr. Shea: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Now, our researchers have told that insofar as coverage of political meetings in Nova Scotia are concerned, your reporters were forbidden to state how many people were in attendance, whether the speeches dealt with something new or significant, whether a fight erupted, and whether there was heckling or not. Is this true or not?

Mr. Shea: Well, your first point about the size of the crowd. They are not forbidden to do so. In the past in some election campaigns, we have decided it is easier not to have to fight with some political organization the next morning about whose estimates is right.

Mr. Fortier: But it is a fact, is it not that at no time, either in the "Herald" or in the "Mail-Star", at the time of election campaigns is there a reference to the number of people attending at a political meeting?

Mr. Shea: That is not true, sir.

Mr. Fortier: That is not true?

Mr. Shea: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: What about whether speeches dealt with something new or significant which would be sort of a comment on the part of the reporter as opposed to a straight reporting of what the speech consisted of?

Mr. Shea: Well, all of our reporters, sir, when assigned to cover political meetings during election campaigns cover as non-interpretive reporters. They are factual, "what was said type reporters".

Mr. Fortier: Do they receive instructions along those lines?

Mr. Shea: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Are these written instructions?

Mr. Shea: No, sir. This is to ensure that the political parties of whatever stripe that are running in the election that they know that the viewpoint of the speaker at a conference or a convention or whatever the case may be, is put forward and not interpreted by a reporter at that particular meeting.

Now, there are opportunities for interpreting that news at another stage.

Mr. Fortier: Well, if a speech was given by a political candidate, either at the municipal, provincial or federal level and he covered an area or made a suggestion which had never been made before, for your reporter to say in the news column that this was something new...

Mr. Shea: Oh yes. I can't recall when we did not.

Mr. Fortier: But what you seek to do and your instructions to the reporter is to go out and get just the story, the bare bone of the story?

Mr. Shea: I wouldn't put it that way, sir. I would say that the instruction is to go out, cover it fairly and adequately. In 25 years on the staff of the paper, I have never been told nor have I told anybody to cover just the bare bone of a story. I just wouldn't presume to do that. The reporter must be able to analyse the work of a story as he sees it and when it develops.

Senator Phillips: Mr. Shea, I believe it is the custom of a particular candidate or certain political parties within certain areas of Nova Scotia to submit their own news stories to you on their meetings. Is that correct?

Mr. Shea: The custom?

Senator Phillips: Yes.

Mr. Shea: No, no. It has been done, but it is not the custom. It has been done for this reason, that—we say to the political parties prior to the actual campaign that we will attempt to cover at least one meeting per party per night during an election campaign. We would ask them to suggest to us which meeting they feel is most important—which they do.

The Chairman: Well, what if there are several meetings? What if the Conservative Party has three meetings?

Senator Phillips: Well, this is what I am getting at. It is not sent in by the parties themselves?

Mr. Shea: No. If it is what we call in loose terms a big league candidate for example, a member of the Cabinet, or a member of the Provincial Cabinet or...

The Chairman: Senator Paul Martin?

Mr. Shea: Senator Paul Martin. We would of course cover that kind of a meeting without question. The political parties are asked in addition to that to say to us which other means would be their choice of coverage. There are occasions when because of storms—some campaigns are held in times of storms as you know—when the reporter may get snowbound. I can recall one or two instances where we have had to call the speaker of the meeting after and explain to him that we couldn't get there because our man was stranded and ask him if he give us in general terms what he said. We have done that and there are times also I think when the political parties have sent us press releases and I think this is what you meant, yes.

Senator Phillips: Yes.

The Chairman: In a federal election, how many federal constituencies are there in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Shea: There are 11.

The Chairman: Well, supposing on a particular—the final week of the campaign there are 22 meetings. There are 11 Conservative meetings and 11 Liberal meetings. It would be unnatural for each candidate to hold a meeting in the climatic stages of the campaign. Now, that is 22 people, so would a person running for either of the major political parties—at least major in terms of Nova Scotia—would that person, to use your phrase, a big league candidate, someone who is going to be one of the 11 members of parliament...

Mr. Shea: Oh indeed.

The Chairman: Well, you would cover all of those meetings?

Mr. Shea: No, some big leagues are big leaguers than others. No, I am not trying to be facetious but I am saying, sir...

The Chairman: Neither am I. I would think that a member of parliament from Nova Scotia is a pretty significant person for a newspaper of record for the province?

Mr. Shea: Indeed.

The Chairman: Well, why wouldn't you cover every meeting?

Mr. Shea: I think it is because we just don't have the staff, sir.

The Chairman: Well, that doesn't sound like many meetings to me.

Mr. Shea: In one night, sir?

The Chairman: I don't think so. Two or two. How many reporters do you have?

Mr. Shea. Well, I believe we have...

Senator McElman: Well, they wouldn't all on one night in any event.

Mr. Shea: In the last year or two we have greatly enlarged our provincial coverage, We have put in first rate people in the Annapolis Valley and in Cape Breton we have always had staff.

We have greatly strengthened our position in Pictou and we have always had a man in Colchester and a man in Amherst and we are strengthening our bureau in Yarmouth. This will give us greater mobility for coverage.

May I talk to you as a reader, sir?

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Shea: Well, you take a lot of these people who go around from constituency to constituency talking politics—please, I am not belittling your efforts because I think it is superhuman what you people do and what you put yourself through but as you know, you read a lot of these stories and there is a lot of repetition.

The Chairman: Yes, but to strain my imagination and to strain Senator Phillips' imagination even more, if I were the president of the Conservative Association in Truro and my candidate was having his final major meeting in the election campaign and you have already made the point about trucking these papers to Truro for eight o'clock in the morning, I would sure be disappointed if it wasn't covered live by one of your people.

Mr. Dennis: Well, Senators, let me put it to you this way. Prior to the elections we sit down with each constituency and each party headquarters. They tell us what they want. There is flexibility and we cut back or enlarge as we see fit.

For instance, lots of time Shea has come down and said to me, "Well, we have agreed to do this", and this type of thing.

The Chairman: But aren't you reluctant to put yourself in the hands of the party headquarters?

Mr. Dennis: Well, sir, we are Nova Scotians and we trust one another.

Senator Prowse: Well, you are not being very creditable at the moment.

Mr. Dennis: Well, I am sorry, sir. I have a lot to learn.

Senator McElman: Perhaps we could shake down to understandable terms, Mr. Shea. If you could give us an estimate of the percentage of news that is published with estimates from party reports of meetings rather than from any of your full time reporters or your stringers?

Mr. Shea: I would say that in a provincial campaign the amount of copy that is supplied to us by the political parties I don't think would measure one percentage point and it would be fractionally less than that, sir.

Mr. Fortier: On the one hand you cover one meeting of one political party per day and if on the other hand the selection of that meeting is made by the political party concerned...

Mr. Shea: The suggestion is made, sir.

Mr. Fortier: The suggestion is made by the political party at your request?

Mr. Shea: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Well, how do you reconcile that policy with the two statements in your brief that you attempted to report all of the news fairly and accurately and that responsibility for news coverage rests on the shoulders of the editorial people. How do you reconcile your policies with the statements in the brief?

Mr. Shea: Well, Mr. Fortier, I am afraid I don't see a conflict.

Mr. Fortier: You don't?

Mr. Shea: No. If we go to the political party—and we have a chart drawn up—we say to them some of your meetings obviously are going to be of major importance and at some of these you are going to be announcing new policies and new planks for your platform, if you will tell us which of those are germane to the case, we will attempt to give those prior consideration for coverage.

Mr. Fortier: But the fact of the matter is that there are on any given night at the time of an election many meetings which are not covered by the newspaper, the two newspapers which have a dominant position in the City of Halifax in the Province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Shea: I suppose, sir, that would be correct. It is conceivable that there would be 33 meetings a night. We do not cover them all.

Mr. Fortier: I would like to come back to a point which was covered briefly earlier, the newspaper editorial. The newspaper editorial which as you say in your brief on page 7 should help to mould public opinion. How do you come to decide, Mr. Dennis, whether public opinion should be moulded on a given issue?

Mr. Dennis: Well, Mr. Fortier, I travel the province once or twice a year. We have our circulation representative throughout the province and our news people. We mix in society and we live there and we talk to all political parties. We get a play-back and I would say that that is it.

Mr. Fortier: This is how the issues tend to become of a nature that newspapers should deal with?

Mr. Dennis: Well, Mr. Fortier, people or politicians or Senators or individuals, call us up and tell us, did you think of so and so and if we think it is worthwhile we will look into it, sir, yes. Did I answer your point?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I will have a supplementary question on that. We have made a study on editorial content of your newspapers in recent months...

The Chairman: In fairness to all, on a great many newspapers?

Mr. Fortier: Oh yes. You have read how much money has been spent on research I am sure by this Committee...

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And in three areas we find that at no time have either one of your two newspapers pronounced themselves editorially and I will tell you what those areas are. One of them is on Pope Paul's anti-birth control pronouncement. Another one is direct endorsement by your newspaper of any given candidate in a municipal, provincial or federal election. Direct endorsement of a candidate—not of policy but of a direct candidate; and thirdly, the provincial government's handling of the heavy water situation.

Would you care to comment on any one of those three issues and tell the Committee why you did not see fit to editorialize on any one of them. Let's take them in order of importance.

Pope Paul's anti-birth control pronouncements?

Mr. Dennis: I think we have had comment on it in the papers. I don't think we have editorialized but we have had comment on it.

Mr. Fortier: You mean, you have had news reports?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator Prowse: News of comment?

Mr. Dennis: That's right.

The Chairman: But I believe that the question was to do with the editorial comment though, wasn't it?

Mr. Shea: May I ask why that should be the basis of an editorial comment?

Mr. Daley: Well, I think that is a matter of personal conscience, and one on which perhaps shouldn't intrude.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it is a matter of record that particular matter was the subject of editorial comment by the great majority of newspapers in Canada and in the United States and indeed in the world. This is what I asked the question.

The Chairman: Well, to put the thing in perspective, your answer about the matter of personal conscience was a good one and it was an interesting comment to have on the record. I think the answer to Senator Phillips' question more directly is really though what most of these gentlemen have said. Mr. Daley has expressed his opinion but I think Mr. Fortier has quite properly pointed out that a great many newspapers did editorialize on it.

However, let us move onto the next one.

Mr. Fortier: I have great respect for senior colleagues, Mr. Daley, and I am attempting to cross-examine you in any way but in the matter of the flag debate when Senator McElman raised earlier, would you not say that this was also a question of personal conscience and yet the newspapers took a position?

Mr. Daley: Well, I think in a different context perhaps. Perhaps the religious matters touch a good many people more deeply than almost anything else. People can be very readily offended I think, if one attempts to attack their personal religious beliefs.

Let us say that I think that that is very much a matter of personal conscience, perhaps more so than the flag debate.

Mr. Fortier: Well I certainly won't get into a philosophical argument with Mr. Daley about that. What about the endorsement of political candidates. You touched upon it earlier but is still not clear why a newspaper which seeks to mould public opinion as you set forth very forcefully in your brief—it is the only one liner in your brief...

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Why at election time don't you take a position?

Mr. Dennis: Senator, I think we live in a very small province. I know in the last federal election we gave practically equal coverage to both federal candidates, the Prime Minister and Mr. Stanfield.

Mr. Fortier: Well, excuse me for interrupting, but was this a policy of the paper to give equal coverage?

Mr. Dennis: We try and endeavour, sir, at times to do this.

Mr. Fortier: That is not only in federal elections?

Mr. Dennis: In every election, sir.

Mr. Fortier: And equal coverage really means equal coverage, almost to the point of the same number of lines, is that right?

Mr. Dennis: That's right, sir, it is practically measured.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Dennis, this is what we have found out.

The Chairman: You mean it is literally measured?

Mr. Dennis: No, practically measured.

The Chairman: With the same prominence on the same page?

Mr. Dennis: We try, sir, may I read a little quotation which I think might explain our situation.

comes out of the Commonwealth Press release which was issued in November and it is:

"The press on so many occasions has to balance reporting so as not only to convey what may appear to be so but also not to aggravate what already may be a difficult situation."

Mr. Fortier: The quote stands. What about the heavy water situation. I am sure you saw that Mr. Bagnell wrote an article in the magazine last month—issued December 20th where he touched on that. Would you care to comment? I think that statement of his—both major newspapers in Halifax have yet to criticize the government's handling of the heavy water situation and have actually gone so far as to criticize those who do.

I think you should be given an opportunity to answer that statement.

Mr. Dennis: Well, I think to say that we criticized those who do. I don't think that's fair.

Mr. Fortier: Meaning that you don't, or meaning that you do and you shouldn't be criticized for it?

Mr. Dennis: I don't think we have criticized anyone. It is a free country, and free speech, sir. I think the heavy water problem as a Nova Scotian is a thorny problem.

Senator Prowse: It is a 132 million dollar problem?

Mr. Dennis: That is right, sir. I think the credit of our province could be jeopardized by it. I still think sir that we try not to aggravate it.

Mr. Fortier: How have you done that, in what way?

Mr. Dennis: Well, we have studied it. I have personally gone out...

Mr. Fortier: Have you asked any members of your staff to study it in depth?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir. I have done it myself, sir.

Mr. Daley: If I may interject, sir. I think we have had a number of off-edit page articles on the subject.

Mr. Fortier: By members of your staff?

Mr. Daley: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: And there have been many in recent months, is that what you are saying?

Mr. Daley: I can think of at least several in the last month or six weeks. Did you not do one yourself?

Mr. Shea: Yes, I did a full page—two full pages on it myself.

Mr. Fortier: Did you take a position in your column?

Mr. Shea: No.

Mr. Fortier: You didn't?

Mr. Shea: There have been—we felt the need to explain how we got into heavy water and how it all began and what the problems were and so on and so forth. We did not take a position. We reported actually what happened and the involvement of all levels of government. This was more of a background piece to put the whole thing into perspective because, as you know, it has been going on for such a long time and some people have forgotten how we ever got involved in this.

Mr. Fortier: Well, in this respect clearly no attempt has been made to mould public opinion by your newspapers. Is that correct?

Mr. Daley: I think at that the moment that our position is this. We recognize it to be a very serious problem but we don't think that criticism at this stage is going to solve it. We are hoping that there will be a solution but I think our position has been that we are awaiting events to see whether there is a solution or there is not. At that time the form of the criticism can be gone.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Daley, rather than wait for events if I may quote you, don't you feel that a newspaper with your responsibility in the province as a whole, and in Halifax in particular, should not wait for events in an area which is of substantial and of important nature but would rather attempt to seek solutions?

Mr. Dennis: Mr. Fortier, we did an editorial on page 1, January 1st which indicated some of our hopes and aspirations for Nova Scotia at the federal level and the provincial level and one of them was that we sincerely hoped that an early decision would be arrived at one way or another on the heavy water plant, Glace Bay, sir.

Mr. Fortier: And you are still hoping?

Mr. Dennis: We are still hoping. May I say to you from my own point of view, sir, that if we can't operate I think it would be a catastrophe and I would like to go far enough to at least think that if we can't we can at least save some of it and not lose it all. That is my point, sir.

The Chairman: I see that the reporter would like to break for a moment or two. But I would like to say, Senators, that it is almost one o'clock—I don't want to prolong this unnecessarily but I know there are a few more questions, but I think we will try adjourn before lunch and not bring you back this afternoon.

—Short adjournment.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I call the meeting back to order. Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I would like to look at a moment at the relative financial importance to Nova Scotia of the heavy water involvement. It is somewhere in the area of 130 to 150 million dollars. If my memory serves me correctly this represents somewhere between 40 to 50 per cent of the net debt of the province. It is not part of the net debt but relate it to the net debt. This is correct, is not, 40 to 50 per cent?

Mr. Daley: I am not sure.

Senator McElman: But, I think it is reasonably accurate. I would like to give you some correlate. In New Brunswick there has been a failure of a similar industrial enterprise at Westmorland Park—I am sure you are familiar with it—which represents about 10 per cent of the net debt of the province in relative terms. This has been editorialized and ad nauseam in the press of New Brunswick, particularly by one element of it which is furthest removed geographically from the industry concerned. I find it strange—the attitudes.

Mr. Dennis: What is that, sir?

Mr. McElman: I am sure that the Nova Brunswick proprietors of the newspapers are as interested in New Brunswick as you are in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Dennis: That's right.

Senator McElman: What we get down to is a matter of editorial choice, I suppose, is that correct?

Mr. Daley: I think first of all at the moment, we are not prepared to recognize a heavy water plant as a failure.

Mr. Dennis: Wholly or partially.

Mr. Daley: We think there may be some thing redeemed out of that.

Senator McElman: I am sorry if I indicated that it was.

Mr. Daley: The experts say that it could be done on a certain basis but they will have study the economics of that to see if it can be a viable situation and whether the losses can be reduced or just what the plus and minuses are and to that extent I think there is some distinct possibility. And secondly, it is a very technical problem and one which I don't think anybody on our paper is competent to deal with in the technical aspect. The experts themselves have some division of opinion and therefore technically I don't think it is appropriate for us to deal with it. I think that finally, until the decision has been made as to whether or not this can be made a viable entity that we can contribute nothing to the overall picture by criticizing for criticism's sake until we have a constructive approach to it and to repeat myself await events, and hopefully that decision will not be postponed so much longer.

If we have failed at all I think perhaps it is that we have not criticized the delay in reaching a decision but again it is a very complex issue and it might be very gratuitous for us to urge upon people, who know far more about it than we do, that the decision should have been made yesterday rather than tomorrow.

Senator McElman: My colleague, Mr. Chairman, has sent me a note on the nature of the failure in Westmorland. It was the attempt by the Government of New Brunswick through one of its agencies to establish a chemical park, a chemical complex at which there would be a number of industries and very too of course, Mr. Daley, are still attempting to make it a viable thing under private or public ownership.

There is one other aspect of the thing I would like to ask about. It is public knowledge and indeed has been published in your newspapers that the Government of Nova Scotia has been endeavouring to have the Government of Canada assist them in carrying some part of the financial load which we all regret has come upon them in this one instance.

Would this not in your opinion be a point at which you might usefully on behalf of the people of Nova Scotia editorialize?

Mr. Shea: We have.

Senator McElman: You have?

Mr. Shea: Oh yes, we have done that many times.

Senator McElman: Then we agree.

Mr. Shea: Yes.

Mr. Dennis: Senator McElman, heavy water—the production of heavy water and the sale of heavy water is one of the planks of the Government of Canada today. Am I correct?

Senator McElman: It is one of the great interests of the Canadian people.

Mr. Dennis: As a Nova Scotian, sir, and as in New Brunswick, I am sure we all have the same ideas, to promote and grow in this part of Canada where we live. My difficulty is this. Why should the federal government enable the province of Ontario—or so I am told—I may be wrong and I stand to be corrected, but why should the federal government put up nuclear power plants in Ontario and Quebec. This is again technical—I haven't looked into it because this is hearsay on my part—but if they are putting them up why do they say, you don't have to buy them if you don't want to, but if you do buy them—and this is the point—we will sell them to you at a price where it would make it competitive to existing fuels of generations of power. Is that not a subsidy or handout, sir?

Senator McElman: Well, I am not a witness.

Mr. Dennis: Well, excuse me, sir, I didn't mean to be rude. To me as a Nova Scotian I think we should be afforded the same opportunity and if the federal government makes a handout to Ontario I think we should be put in the same position. We were the pioneers in heavy water in Canada, weren't we, in Glace Bay?

The Chairman: Mr. Dennis, I assure you you weren't being rude to Senator McElman, but as interesting as the discussion of heavy water is I would like to return more to a discussion of the media in Nova Scotia, and therefore Mr. Fortier can resume his questioning. I will return to you Senator McElman in a few minutes, because after all that was a supplementary question.

Senator McElman: Fine.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Dennis, so far as your staff is concerned, your reporters, your editors, have you ever had any of them resign because of policy imposed by you the publisher on them?

Mr. Dennis: Well, Harold, will you answer that question?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I think with respect I would rather have the publisher answer the question.

The Chairman: Well, in fairness, I told the publisher he could farm out questions and I think I must allow him to. I think we will let Mr. Shea answer it.

Mr. Dennis: I don't know of any occasions, sir, where a person has held a different view of mine that has been asked to resign. I am not aware of it, sir.

Mr. Shea: I think the question was, has there been either a case where a member of our staff who disagrees with our policy.

Mr. Fortier: And resigned for that reason.

Mr. Shea: For that particular reason?

Mr. Fortier: That is either one of your reporters or a member of your editorial staff?

Mr. Shea: Because he disagreed with the policy?

Mr. Fortier: Because either he disagreed with your policy or he either disagreed with a view imposed on him by the newspaper, by the publisher?

Mr. Shea: There was one instance, sir, if I may. There was a story which developed I think about 18 or 19 months ago, sir, where a member—I think it was Mr. Regan of the Liberal Party—made reference to a matter involving land tract transactions in housing. Two of our reporters were working on the story on the weekend. We had covered the speech which of course, was privileged—I am thinking in terms of libel—the contents of Mr. Regan's speech was privileged. I believe this is the case you are referring to or at least I am reasonably sure. The two reporters worked on an interpretive background piece on the weekend. This of course was not privileged. I referred the story to the office of the solicitor for examination as I would in any story where I felt there was a strong possibility of libelous content.

In this particular instance if I remember correctly, there was I think 13 or 14 instances of potential libel involved in the story which the solicitors recommended we remove prior to publication.

In the consideration of the story one edition of the paper rolled without the story because there was no point, the paper just doesn't stop. You have to let it go on time. One of the reporters became irritated at this point and resigned.

However, I am trying to search my mind now to see if this is off the record but I think you will forgive me if it is. The reporter concerned called me within the next 48 hours to ask me what he could do to straighten out the affair because we were being criticized at the time for withholding the story.

Mr. Fortier: You were being criticized by whom?

Mr. Shea: By competitors in the news industry, I think, by radio and television.

Mr. Fortier: Were they criticizing you publicly?

Mr. Shea: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Were they publishing the stories themselves?

Mr. Shea: Not that particular story, not that particular moment. We all did later in the day but that particular story in my view had to be referred to the solicitors as it was done so. And there were several instances—at least 13 that were libelous in our solicitors' view and mine. There were instances of potential libel and I think it is our responsibility always to ensure that it doesn't happen.

It is the newsman's responsibility to ensure that this type of thing doesn't happen.

Mr. Fortier: What about the bare bones of the story. Was it published?

Mr. Shea: Oh, indeed it was.

Mr. Fortier: It was?

Mr. Shea: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And those two reporters resigned?

Mr. Shea: No, only one. One resigned he called within 48 hours to ask me what he might do—could he issue a statement for example, to explain that we had done a proper thing.

Mr. Fortier: Has he been re-hired by the newspaper?

Mr. Shea: No, he didn't want to come back.

Mr. Fortier: Other instances in recent years of reporters or members of your editorial staff resigning over disputes such as this or?

Mr. Shea: None that I can call accurately, sir. There may have been but I just don't know about.

Mr. Fortier: Does the name Dave Betts mean anything to you?

Mr. Shea: Yes, it does.

Mr. Fortier: Did he ever work with you?

Mr. Shea: Dave Betz was in fact one of our news editors.

Mr. Fortier: He was your night news editor?

Mr. Shea: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Around 1962 approximately?

Mr. Shea: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: On what terms did he leave the newspaper?

Mr. Shea: I can't actually tell you that, sir. I was covering other matters at that particular time.

Mr. Dennis: As I can recall sir, at the time there was an election campaign and I think the managing editor made a pronouncement which was his responsibility as managing editor and I think—it is my recollection that he disagreed with it.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know what that pronouncement was?

Mr. Dennis: I couldn't recall. Eight or nine years after, sir, I just couldn't.

Mr. Fortier: Did you as a publisher—were you a party to that disagreement between Mr. Betz and the managing editor. Were you involved in it at all?

Mr. Dennis: I can't recall, sir, no. I leave the operation of the news department to the managing editor.

Mr. Fortier: But you do recall that he resigned?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: In the matter of staff, it has been suggested to our researchers that there was a very high incidence of turnover among your staff in Halifax. Would that be a fair statement?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir. I would think it would be safe to say that around 70 per cent of our staff have been there over 10 years and I think the turnover in the editorial department is perhaps one of the lowest in Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. Dennis, in view of what has been said to us I wanted to ask the question.

Mr. Dennis: Well, Mr. Fortier, there have always been people that go on and there is always people who want to get out of the business to go into a new endeavour.

There are always people that want to come to Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you have been to Montreal.

Mr. Dennis: Yes, I lived there for four years.

Mr. Fortier: And you studied at McGill?

Mr. Dennis: That's right, sir. I think I remember seeing you there.

Mr. Fortier: So do I now.

The Chairman: Well, on that note I believe there are a few other Senators who want to ask questions.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I was just getting to the Quebec coverage.

The Chairman: Well, if you would like to deal with that then we can turn away.

Mr. Fortier: I was very interested in having you put on record what your newspaper's policy is with respect to coverage of events happening in Quebec.

Mr. Dennis: You want me to reply on that?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Dennis: Would you mind if I go to my notes which I have prepared?

Mr. Fortier: You have prepared notes on that?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, I anticipated questions along this line.

Mr. Fortier: I thought you would. If you dealt with the Indians and the Negroes I thought you would deal with the French Canadians.

Mr. Dennis: We try and come as fully prepared as possible. Our attitude towards Quebec news coverage. The Committee places special emphasis on a newspaper's desire and ability to report on the Quebec scene. Smaller papers have said that they rely on the ability of the Canadian Press to do an adequate job but they have covered themselves by stating that if they had sufficient resources they would open bureaus to report directly.

The larger papers like the Toronto Telegram, the Toronto Globe and Mail, the Toronto Star, I believe, have taken the position that they already maintain staff personnel in Quebec because they recognize the national interest in the Quebec story.

The attitude of the smaller paper does not appear to have satisfied some of you people here. There is a feeling that even the smaller papers should acquire interpretive articles written by Quebec writers if only to supplement the straight reporting function of CP. It might be worthwhile to advise the Committee that we make good use of Canadian Press coverage that comes from Quebec and regularly publishing such syndicated writers as Douglas Fisher, Senator Nichol, Dalton Camp who frequently deal with the Quebec situation.

Mr. Fortier: Not as Quebecers though.

Mr. Dennis: Not as Quebecers but just let me go on. We have from time to time acquired the writings of Walter O'Hearne a former who was with the "Montreal Star" but who has now passed on, and Gerald Clarke and others dealing specifically with affairs in Quebec.

Frequently we print articles from the Quebec press in our editorial pages and our off-edit pages. We have occasionally assigned bilingual reporters such as Jim Moore in Quebec to cover specific assignments dealing with constitutional questions and other matters.

We frequently receive interpretives from our Ottawa correspondent dealing with Quebec.

Now, may I go on to a letter which Mr. Moore—who was in covering the Liberal nominating convention in Quebec City last week. He wrote me personally a letter on his impressions, for me to use as background, of the Quebec situation as far as news coverage is concerned.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Moore was covering this for your newspaper?

Mr. Dennis: For our newspaper, sir. Incidentally he says "the thought struck me"— that is Mr. Moore—"when I was in Quebec the French Canadian who depends upon the French language press for news and information learns little of what is going on in the rest of Canada unless Quebec interests are directly involved. The French language papers, radio and television appear to concentrate exclusively on Quebec"—this is Mr. Moore—"except for the occasional attack upon Ottawa and big business in Ontario. Thus, they contribute to an inward looking tendency on the part of Quebec society in general. A tendency which partly explains why many French Canadians feel so insecure when they are outside Quebec. After all, they can't be expected to feel at home in regions about which they know virtually nothing."

Mr. Fortier: Well, assuming that this is the true reflection of the coverage of news by the Quebec Media emanating from areas outside the province, are you doing the very same thing in Nova Scotia with respect to feeding your citizens news from Nova Scotia principally rather than from other areas in Canada?

Mr. Dennis: Well, sir, I think we feed from all parts in Canada. We endeavour to do that to the best of our ability, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever had a report in the Province of Quebec?

Mr. Dennis: Not solely in the province, but Mr. Shea has gone there and Mr. Eric Dénys, our parliamentary representative here goes down there from time to time and I speak quite a few times there in the run of the year going throughout that charming province.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I suppose you would agree that there is more happening in Quebec today which is a threat to the unity of the country which you refer to in your opening remarks than there is in Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia?

Mr. Dennis: Well, there is lots of talk about it, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Well, do you feel that there is a need amongst your readers for an informed opinion about what is happening in Quebec by a man working for you in the province?

Mr. Dennis: Well, Mr. Fortier, in other words what you are saying is, should we have a man there?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that is my question.

Mr. Dennis: To answer it simply we have to have priorities in the newspaper business the same as any other business. I think you will agree with me on that.

Mr. Fortier: Fair enough.

Mr. Dennis: I would say that we are expanding at home and improving our coverage at home and provincially and we are using ourselves to the best of our financial ability and our ability to have more coverage from Quebec, from New Brunswick, more coverage from Prince Edward Island and more on the national scene across Canada.

We are endeavouring to do that to the best of our ability.

Mr. Fortier: And in your list of priorities having a man in Quebec is on the list?

Mr. Dennis: I have discussed it, sir. I discussed it last year but rising costs—they hold the implementation of that back for some time.

Senator Phillips: Have you or any of your staff been requested to submit an article to the Quebec papers on the Maritime viewpoint or to assist any reporter from a Quebec newspaper to write on the Maritimes?

Mr. Shea: Yes indeed, whenever they are asked.

Senator Phillips: How often are you asked to have you or any member of your paper submitted articles to the Quebec reporters?

Mr. Shea: Not recently, sir. There was a time, not so long ago when there was a very strong tendency for our staffers to write for other newspapers and particularly in Quebec.

Senator Phillips: Essentially I wanted to remind Mr. Fortier that it was a two-way street.

Mr. Shea: Oh indeed, yes.

The Chairman: Well, I think you have reminded us, Senator Phillips, but I think Mr. Innis perhaps reminded us more effectively with the comment from his correspondent. So I think his point is a valid one but I think the point that Mr. Fortier raised should have been raised and was quite properly raised.

Senator Sparrow: Mr. Fortier referred to the article by Bagnell and if I might just quote—I assume you are familiar with it—Bagnell quotes Arnie Patterson as having said, "In the 12 years in which Robert Stanfield was premier there wasn't one word of criticism of his administration in the Halifax papers but it was that way even before Nova Scotia turned conservative with Stanfield. While Henry Hicks was premier he too was the apple of their eye."

That final quote was by Bagnell himself. First of all I am asking the question if you agree with that statement or quotation. And if it is true, it is very unusual. As a social service newspaper must there certainly not be some area in which provincial government or premiers as such would deserve probably some criticism on the policy of government. Would you like to comment on that?

The Chairman: Whether they are Liberal or conservative?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

The Chairman: I think that is important.

Senator Sparrow: Both.

Mr. Dennis: Senator Sparrow, I can remember saying to both the Honourable H. D. Hicks when he was Premier of Nova Scotia and again to the Honourable R. L. Stanfield when he was Premier of Nova Scotia that the Chronicle-Herald and the Mail-Star would give their Government independent support but if there was need of criticism we would not hesitate to criticize or publish anything which had basis of fact.

Senator Sparrow: In 12 years there was no basis of fact for criticism. It is that what you are saying?

Mr. Daley: Well, that is what Arnie Patterson says.

The Chairman: You deny that statement?

Mr. Daley: Well, the point is, that you know without going through the papers it would be pretty hard to say but I would find that pretty hard to believe.

The Chairman: What about Mr. Bagnell's own statement that you never criticized Henry Hicks.

Mr. Dennis: I think at times if there was anything to criticize, we criticized him.

Mr. Daley: I would think that also.

The Chairman: Well, it is interesting to have your comments on record.

Senator Sparrow: It would appear from the statement that this is the crux of the matter really. Is there any indication of suppression of news?

Mr. Dennis: Absolutely not, sir. If there is I would like to know about it, sir.

Mr. Daley: Well, general statements like that are easy to make and hard to disprove. I would find that impossible to believe. Certainly there would have been no calculated decision.

We certainly have decided that we will support the government in power so long as they are doing a good job and we do not criticize them for the mere purpose of being critical. We certainly reserve our right to criticize and I would be amazed if there wasn't any criticism aimed at the Stanfield Government and the Hicks Government.

As far as I know, certainly we have criticized the Smith Government.

The Chairman: I think it is important to the Committee—as you appreciate we have these quotes on record and therefore we have to have your comments on them. I would therefore like to ask you about another quote that we have but perhaps I may preface my remarks by saying—you are familiar with the publication, Mr. Dennis, the Fourth Estate?

Mr. Dennis: Right.

The Chairman: Have you read it?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: Do you read it regularly?

Mr. Dennis: I don't read all papers, sir, but I must say that I see it from time to time and I read it, yes. I have people on the staff who read it and tell me about anything that is there, yes.

The Chairman: What is your opinion of it?

Mr. Dennis: Well, sir, it is a free country.

The Chairman: Well, the Fourth Estate—and I put this question more in the same spirit that I am sure Senator Sparrow brought up his quote. The recent issue of the Fourth Estate refers to and I quote, "censorship of writers on the staff of the Chronicle Herald"—and is there any such censorship of writers?

Mr. Dennis: I am unaware of it, sir.

The Chairman: You feel certain then that we ask the Fourth Estate people to give some documentation of this censorship of writers—which is a very serious charge by the way—that you would be satisfied that they couldn't provide it?

Mr. Daley: Well, sir, I believe we can refute any such suggestion.

The Chairman: Well, again, in the spirit of having that on the record, I believe it is important.

Mr. Daley: May I just elaborate for a moment on that.

The Chairman: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Daley: We certainly do not print libelous or seditious news. Now, if that is suppression of the news, then, we are guilty.

The Chairman: And those judgments are made by you?

Mr. Daley: Not by myself necessarily, but by members of my firm.

Senator Sparrow: Would K.C. Irving or the K.C. Irving interests have any interest in your publications in anyway, shape or form?

Mr. Dennis: Well, Senator Sparrow, I filed some documents with you. Mr. Bassett of the "Toronto Telegram" has said "Who owns the "Halifax-Herald"?" before this Committee. He said, "Who owns the Sydney paper, and the Newfoundland paper?" and again today in my brief to you, sir, I said this paper had belonged to my family for three generations, sir.

Mr. Daley: Still, I believe you should answer that directly. Mr. Irving has no interest whatever.

Senator Prowse: Well, there is a Fourth Estate story here which no doubt you are aware...

The Chairman: Well, I am not aware of it.

Senator Prowse: Which says that CHNS we had this before and we had this when Mr. Irving was here. However, I think as you said, this is a question that has been here before and I think particularly when Mr. Daley has suggested that he held it in trust for something...

Mr. Daley: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: Who are the shareholders of the Halifax-Herald Limited?

Mr. Dennis: Myself, my sister, not directly her name but in a holding company on her behalf and Mr. L. F. Daley.

Mr. Fortier: Could you give us the percentages of the shareholdings?

Mr. Dennis: I have personally 65 per cent of the Herald shares, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Are these common shares?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: 65 per cent?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And the trust?

Mr. Dennis: The trust for, my sister holds 35 per cent.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Daley?

Mr. Dennis: Mr. Daley—10 per cent.

Mr. Fortier: Are there presently any preference shares?

Mr. Daley: There are some preference shares that are issued from time to time as a stock dividend and then redeemed.

Mr. Fortier: Are there presently any pre-empt shares outstanding?

Mr. Daley: There may be. Well, we are just in the process—but I don't know whether they have been issued yet or not.

Mr. Fortier: Well, if they are issued in the form of stock dividends they would be issued to either one of these three shareholders?

Mr. Daley: That is correct, yes.

Mr. Fortier: You say that your sister's shares are held by a trust?

Mr. Dennis: A holding company.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Daley, if I can ask you this question. Are your shares held in your own name or are they held in the name of a holding company?

Mr. Daley: They are in the name of the holding company, Gravehurst Investments Limited which I am the beneficial owner of of all the shares.

Mr. Fortier: You are the sole shareholder of this holding company?

Mr. Daley: I am a shareholder—I am the sole beneficial holder, yes. My wife and my daughter hold one share each.

Mr. Fortier: So that you own the shares in your own right?

Mr. Daley: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: Not on behalf of anyone?

Mr. Daley: No.

Mr. Fortier: Does the Halifax-Herald Limited have other investments besides those physical premises where the newspapers are published?

Mr. Dennis: Our holding company owns the Argyle Garage.

Mr. Fortier: Well, any other interests in the field of media?

Mr. Dennis: No.

Mr. Fortier: No radio stations?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Television?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir.

Mr. Fortier: Television?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir.

Senator Sparrow: I will move on to a new subject, perhaps someone has a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Are there any other supplementary questions on the control and ownership and so on?

Senator McElman: Yes. I just have one, Mr. Chairman. Going back away, Mr. Daley, you were the president of the New Brunswick Broadcasting, I believe?

Mr. Daley: That is correct, sir, yes.

Senator McElman: Are you any longer associated with that company?

Mr. Daley: No, not since last March.

Senator McElman: Last March?

Mr. Daley: Right.

Senator McElman: When the hearings of the CRTC were held in Moncton, I believe September of 1968 you appeared in your capacity as president of the New Brunswick Broadcasting?

Mr. Daley: Right.

Senator McElman: What holdings did New Brunswick Broadcasting have at that time? Was it the CHSJ-Television, CHSJ Radio in Saint John?

Mr. Daley: That is correct.

Senator McElman: But there were no others?

Mr. Daley: No.

Senator McElman: Now, I am dealing from memory, so please correct me if I stray at all. The newspaper reports of that hearing indicated that the members of the Commission queried you as to whether there was in the corporate structure in which you were involved—any relationship with I believe CHNS and I believe they mentioned the Halifax Herald as well?

Mr. Daley: Right.

Senator McElman: And the "Fredericton Gleaner"?

Mr. Daley: Right.

Senator McElman: You replied that there was none. Is that correct?

Mr. Daley: I think that is—I don't know whether I said none or none of which I am aware. I didn't have any intimate knowledge whatsoever.

Senator McElman: Well, this is the point I am getting to. The testimony that you gave to the CRTC at that time was rather explicit in that there was no connection of the whole operation with the "Fredericton Gleaner". It was totally outside. The testimony just taken here at these hearings has showed that at that very time there was in fact an arrangement whereby financial control of the Fredericton Gleaner had been acquired.

Mr. Daley: At that time?

Senator McElman: Yes, in September of 1968.

Mr. Daley: Well, if that is so, I certainly was not aware of it at the time.

Senator McElman: Well, the point I am getting to is that in that circumstance, I can understand where you would not have knowledge of this.

Mr. Daley: That's right.

Senator McElman: What I wanted to get on the record is here with CHNS and the "Chronicle-Herald Mail-Star"—the whole bit of wax—that you are in a position and have absolute knowledge and there could be an accident of testimony.

Mr. Daley: Well, Senator, that is quite correct. I have absolute knowledge and I made it very clear. As a matter of fact I wrote the Chairman of the CRTC following that hearing, just in case I couldn't recall exactly how I answered that question, to qualify my answer with regard to the "Fredericton Gleaner" but there is no equivocation whatsoever with respect to the Halifax Herald because I do have personal knowledge of that.

Senator McElman: It is because of that, sir, that I want it on the record here. Because of the various implications and rumours that have been publicly reported.

Mr. Daley: And which have been consistently denied by myself on many occasions before the Board of Broadcast Governors and so on. But for some strange reason...

Senator Prowse: It doesn't get the publicity that you would like it to get.

Mr. Daley: It doesn't get the publicity but there are still people who like to circulate that rumour.

Senator Sparrow: Has your paper taken stand on the union of the Maritimes?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir.

Senator Sparrow: In what regard?

Mr. Dennis: We have said that all avenues of co-operation should be explored before the final move should be adopted.

Senator Sparrow: So, one way or the other you have not made a decision?

Mr. Dennis: Well, we have also said that we feel the loss of identity of the provinces is not necessary. I think that we can and should co-operate for the benefit of the Atlantic Provinces.

Mr. Daley: I think, it would be fair to say that we have not supported the idea.

The Chairman: May I ask you which weekend paper you carry? "The Canadian Weekend"?

Mr. Dennis: We don't, sir.

The Chairman: Why not?

Mr. Dennis: Well, it is because...

The Chairman: I say why, I don't say it intelligently but the mere fact is that almost every other paper in Canada does, why don't you?

Mr. Dennis: Sir, because of the terrific delivery problem we have in the Province of Nova Scotia.

The Chairman: Well, you mentioned four Nova Scotia papers. Do they carry a rotogravure section?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir. The "Sydney Post" does.

The Chairman: Only Sydney does?

Mr. Dennis: I believe that is correct.

The Chairman: And presumably wouldn't they have the same delivery problems?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir, not to the same extent. About 45,000 of our papers go out of Halifax every day. Two-thirds of their circulation is in industrial Cape Breton and one-third is in the rural sections. Ours is spread all over the Province of Nova Scotia.

The Chairman: That is in the morning paper, but why could you not carry a weekend paper in the evening paper?

Mr. Dennis: May I make a remark on that, sir?

The Chairman: Oh, of course.

Mr. Dennis: Personally I felt that if we got national advertising we should get it ourselves and get paid for it.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to ask you about that. Your so-called conversion policy. Could you explain that please?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

The Chairman: I assume it is very profitable and I would like you to explain what the conversion method is?

Mr. Mounce: It is an agency which is converted from the "Weekend"—whatever one is talking about, the advertising agency, will convert that from their paper to ours at the national rate.

The Chairman: Which is very profitable for you, then?

Mr. Mounce: No more profitable than an ordinary national ad.

The Chairman: Now, it is more profitable than carrying one of the weekend papers?

Mr. Mounce: Well, I couldn't answer that, sir.

The Chairman: Well, you must think it is or you would carry one of the weekend papers?

Mr. Dennis: Senator Davey, you have been in the advertising business?

The Chairman: A little bit.

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir. I will just ask you this. I remember my father when he was alive and when Mr. Daley's father was alive we made up our mind that we would handle national advertising. We would have it in our paper and not have a rotogravure. I think, sir, that the loss of national advertising in our paper—the decline as compared to the national average, in the last three years has been less in our paper because we didn't have a weekend supplement. It is purely a question of policy.

The Chairman: Do the weekend sections attempt to circulate in Halifax?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: How?

Mr. Dennis: Through stores and carriers.

Mr. Daley: Both.

The Chairman: I have only one question and that is regarding your Ottawa coverage. On page 13 you say "We maintain a full-time bureau in Ottawa and engage and invite many Canadian writers to prepare articles for us on a wide range of subjects". I am particularly interested in the Ottawa coverage. Is your Ottawa coverage on the average as extensive as the Ottawa coverage of let us say the daily papers in Toronto or in Montreal?

Mr. Dennis: Well, may I answer you this way, sir. Our market is very small. We have to judge everything and how much we can spend on priorities. It is a case of priorities. We endeavour to take the Canadian Press and supplement it.

The Chairman: Well, that really wasn't the question. I meant more on a percentage basis. In other words, how would you compare the coverage in your newspaper of Ottawa on a percentage basis. I am not talking now about quality, I am talking about quantity. How would you compare it with—well, let's take two examples, let's say the "Montreal Star" and the "Toronto Star"?

Mr. Dennis: Coverage that gets into the paper?

The Chairman: Yes. In other words you describe your Ottawa coverage as extensive.

Mr. Dennis: Well, I would say that it is as extensive as any paper of our size and more extensive than any other paper in the Maritimes.

The Chairman: Well, what would be another paper of your size in Canada just off the top of your head?

Mr. Dennis: Well, The London Free Press.

The Chairman: Well, that is a good example because we have had them here this week. Would you in your judgment have as much Ottawa coverage as the London Free Press does?

Mr. Dennis: Yes, I would say so.

Mr. Shea: As a matter of fact I would say more.

The Chairman: You have more Ottawa coverage than the London Free Press?

Mr. Shea: I would say that we have more staff written Ottawa coverage than London Free Press.

The Chairman: Well, just Ottawa coverage generally.

Mr. Shea: I would say so, yes. Mind you, I have never measured. I would calculate that as so because I was the Ottawa correspondent for some years...

The Chairman: Yes, I am aware of that.

Mr. Shea: And the London Free Press correspondent is a very close friend of mine and I am reasonably sure that I wrote him line for line each day and I am reasonably sure today that Eric Dennis does.

The Chairman: Well, you don't agree with the people that argue that outside of what is sometimes called the Toronto-Montreal-Ottawa triangle, that as you proceed from that triangle there is less coverage of what is happening in Ottawa?

Mr. Shea: I don't think that is the case in the Maritimes.

Mr. Dennis: When my father was in the Senate, he always maintained one of the greatest body of news-making people in Canada was the Senate of which you people are members.

Senator Prowse: Well, things have changed.

Mr. Dennis: We were one of the first papers in Canada to insist on coverage of the Senate and we try and endeavour to do it today. I think it is an important part in the system of Parliament in this country.

The Chairman: Thank you. I think Senator McElman has the last series of questions for you. You have been very patient. I apologize for I didn't realize it is lunch hour ..

Mr. Dennis: It is all right.

Senator Prowse: You mean it was lunch hour.

Senator McElman: I take it, Mr. Dennis, that you don't join those who want to abolish us?

Mr. Dennis: No, sir, I think you have a very important part to play.

Senator McElman: Well, I was only being facetious.

Mr. Dennis: A sober body of second thought as my father used to say.

Senator McElman: Our researchers tell us that in the Maritimes, major city newspaper salaries are on an average of 25 per cent below those of the Toronto Guild salaries.

First of all do you believe this to be the case and what would be the reasons for it?

Mr. Dennis: Sir, I would say that the remuneration on our paper—I am not talking about other papers because I don't know anything about them. I would say the remuneration on our paper is better than anything in the Maritimes and would compare favourably with any in Canada today east of Winnipeg. I don't know too much about the Western papers.

Senator McElman: Well, the comparison was made by those covered by the Toronto Guild.

Mr. Dennis: Well, I would rather not mention figures but I don't think we are too far short of it.

Mr. Shea: I am not actually aware what the Toronto Guild pays so I don't know. But I do know—in a general way I can answer it this way. I think you can count on the fingers of one hand the number of people who leave our paper and come to the Toronto area for salary reasons.

Now, they may go for other reasons, Toronto is a larger city, it is more cosmopolitan, and has a team in the National Hockey League and things of that kind.

Senator McElman: I can't understand why anyone would want to leave the Maritimes by itself.

Senator Prowse: It might even cost more to live there.

Mr. Shea: Indeed it does. Mind you it is due to say that years ago there was a substantial difference. There was a substantial difference between the salaries paid in the Maritimes and the Toronto market. I do not think that is any longer the case. The gap has narrowed to the point where in most cases it would not be too beneficial for a man to leave Nova Scotia to go to Toronto.

This is of course considering all the other factors involved.

Senator McElman: At page 2 of your brief you say the following:

"Whether the concentration of ownership is essentially desirable depends entirely"—and I emphasize the word—"on the product and the kind of people involved in the ownership and management. If such people are responsible, independent and fair, concentration of ownership is not a significant matter."

Now, the words "entirely" and "significant" are the elements of this that have struck me. Is there no point at which—and I ask you as a man who has expressed real pride and justified pride in the fact that you are a family owned ferociously independent from the standpoint of a newspaper—is there no point...

Mr. Dennis: Well, let me answer you this way. I would say that during our history...

Senator McElman: Well, just let me put it another way. We have had testimony in the last few days that there are now three predominant chains in Canada which have, I guess it is getting close to 50 per cent of the circulation and we have had various opinions. One that I recall was that it might be more desirable if there were four and another was that he would become deeply concerned—and this was from one of the big chains—he would become deeply concerned if there were only two.

In view of the strength of your statement, could you tell us, sir, if there is not some limit at which you would become concerned?

Mr. Dennis: Senator, my answer to you is this. May I get back to apples which I know quite a bit about. We were talking about apples yesterday. And if you allow me I will be facetious for a moment, sir. I think the product, sir, is the end result. I think that is what the people—the majority of people—want to buy a newspaper for; what is on its pages, and what kind of a job it does day in and day out.

Personally, I feel independent ownership is their best bet at this time. Personally I think that I was brought up to that and I will endeavour to keep it that way to the best of my ability.

However, I would regret to see communities lose their local voice which a newspaper should be and I think it should be kept within the province, personally. Maybe the tax laws and the White Paper and all of this will make the laws—not only the newspapers but we appraise the whole business situation and it affects every business and every economic operation in this country.

Senator McElman: Well, let me put it in another way. I know that you have no interest in doing this, but let us just say that your corporation owned all of the daily newspapers in Nova Scotia. Do you think it would depend entirely on the product and the people involved and that this would not be a significant matter?

Mr. Dennis: Sir, I have never given that any thought.

Senator McElman: Would you give it some thought?

Mr. Dennis: Would I?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Dennis: I would like to think that Nova Scotians owned their own newspapers, sir.

Senator McElman: Well, that is not the point really.

The Chairman: Well, I don't think in fairness that he understood your question. He was not suggesting that you should attempt to acquire all the papers. He was saying that if someone did, would that be a healthy situation?

Mr. Dennis: If you are a responsible person, sir, and you live in a community, and if you were born in that community, educated in that community, with the exception of four years away and you lived there and you worked there and you associated with people, personally I think in the end product you are a responsible citizen.

I can't see anything wrong with a provincial chain or a cross-Canada chain personally. It is a distinction with very little difference.

Senator McElman: Excuse me, I know you are not trying to avoid my question...

Mr. Dennis: No, I am not.

Senator McElman: But my question is: if the Herald or any other entity owned all the daily newspapers in Nova Scotia, would this be a good thing?

Mr. Dennis: I don't know.

The Chairman: Well, I think Mr. Dennis has given us the answer; he says he doesn't know. Therefore you don't necessarily think it would be a bad thing?

Mr. Dennis: No.

The Chairman: You don't necessarily think it would be a bad thing?

Mr. Dennis: That's right.

Senator Prowse: Now, you are going the other way. He said he didn't know, now if you are going to leave it that he didn't know that is one thing and you can draw any conclusion you want.

The Chairman: Well, I am asking if he thinks it would be a bad thing?

Mr. Daley: Well, if I may interject, I believe Mr. Dennis answered that question. Given all these prerequisites of responsibility and directives and so on, he has answered by saying that if the end product is good it is not necessarily a bad thing, at least; that is my understanding of what he said.

The Chairman: Well, it is Senator McElman's question and I am sure he is going to follow it up so let's return to him.

Senator McElman: On the basis of your quotation here, Mr. Dennis, let us say that in Nova Scotia there were a conglomerate which had massive interests, 95 per cent of which were not in the media field and they owned all English language daily newspapers in Nova Scotia. What would your view of this sort of an arrangement be?

Mr. Dennis: Well, first of all, Senator, think anyone should be entitled to own newspaper—any individual or group of people or any business. Newspapers are entirely different than radios because those are public airways.

I would think that if it was a Nova Scotia and interested in Nova Scotia I can't see anything wrong with it if they do a good job.

Senator McElman: Well, let me carry it or step further then. Dosco had its great interest in Sydney which affected the economy of Nova Scotia to a tremendous extent.

Mr. Dennis: That's right, sir.

Senator McElman: To such an extent that when they suggested that they were to pull out, the government moved in and it became a government owned and operated organization. They have established its importance, believe for Nova Scotia?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator McElman: Let us cast ourselves back to the time when Dosco owned—they are the owners and we take ourselves back to the time when they were the proprietors with their thousands of employees and their great effect on the economy.

Would it have been a good thing for Nova Scotia if Dosco would have owned all of the daily newspapers in Nova Scotia?

Let me carry it a bit further so we can get it right to a case. At the time that they announced that they were going to close down, would it have been a good thing for Nova Scotia?

Mr. Dennis: Senator, if you run a newspaper—personally, if you have any conscience about a newspaper, you have to let the news speak for itself.

Senator McElman: That's right.

Senator Dennis: I have always felt that an entity should stand by itself. I don't think a businessman should interfere with another. I would much rather see a conglomerate owned in Nova Scotia than I would outside of the Maritimes or outside of the Province of Nova Scotia.

Senator McElman: Would you have rather seen Dosco own all English language newspapers in the Province of Nova Scotia—in the special circumstances of Dosco that we are all familiar with—would you have rather seen Dosco own all the daily newspapers than FP publications?

Mr. Dennis: Well, I would rather not make distinction but let me put it to you this way.

Senator McElman: Well, any of the existing chains?

Mr. Dennis: I would rather see a conglomerate in this situation have newspapers or allow us to have newspapers than have no newspapers.

The Chairman: Well, with respect, Mr. Dennis—I don't think we want to carry this endlessly but I don't think that really was the question.

The question is who would you have preferred to see own all of the newspapers in Nova Scotia? Dosco or one of the existing newspaper chains?

Mr. Dennis: I don't know.

Mr. Daley: I think probably we would rather see FP publications.

Mr. Dennis: Or the Southam people.

Senator McElman: Or any other of the existing chains?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Mr. Daley: Well, Dosco was also owned outside of the province and that was one of the problems.

Senator Prowse: We had a witness before the Committee who told us that in Italy for example, the procedure is there that nearly every big business interest—and they have to big international corporations coming in as well as their big corporations—that one of the things they are tending to do there is to immediately try to acquire the newspaper and then they bludgeon the government because the government is too involved in so many of their business operations.

He said that this of course becomes a pretty serious threat to a free press in terms of giving the people who live in the community because the paper then becomes the instrument of the corporation.

Now, let us take the question out of a particular context which may have appeared to you and let's deal with the principle which I think we have to deal with, and that is do you really think that if we are going to have newspapers today, that if we are going to have chains which we have, is there an inherent danger to the interest of the public in the ownership of the news media by the big conglomerates and particularly I have in mind the super national conglomerates that are developing today.

Now, could you answer that question without being put perhaps in a difficult personal position?

Senator McElman: Well, I am sorry. Before you do, surely there was no inference that I was trying to put the witness in a difficult personal position.

Senator Prowse: I don't suggest you were trying to put anybody in a difficult personal position. It occurred to me that the witnesses might have felt that they were being asked to comment on a situation which pretty obviously applied to somebody who is very close to where they do business now and my question was to take it out of any possible suggestion that this was what was going on and put it in such a way where we are dealing with a principle and not with a particular case.

No reflection on you or your question or anything else.

Senator McElman: Thank you.

Mr. Daley: I think that potentially there are hazards in the situation which you described, Senator. I think there are potential hazards in any newspaper. It gets down really to the integrity, responsibility and so on.

Now, whether perhaps in the situation you mentioned the hazards are greater—they may well be. And certainly in the situation you mentioned with regard to Italy that they are acquiring newspapers for that specific purpose there can be no question that that can't be a good thing.

Senator Prowse: The hazard exists from the fact that in Italy you had a situation and you have a clear cut case where a person owns a paper for a particular purpose. We will all agree on that.

Now, the situation that concerns us is where because of the diversity of a person's interests, the possible conflict could arise between his sense of responsibility as a responsible publisher and his sense of duty to the public on the one hand and his sense of duty to himself as an aggressive and responsible entrepreneur on another in a different area.

Mr. Dennis: First of all, I was born in the newspaper business. I would like to think, sir, that a newspaper and the men associated with the publisher of a newspaper would have the social conscience to let the newspaper decide what it should do, sir.

Senator Prowse: Yes, but I am not talking about you, Mr. Dennis, or men like you who have a family tradition. I am talking about a corporation that has a hired ownership which is going to move from day to day and has no sense of responsibility except to a balance sheet.

Do you follow me?

Mr. Daley: Yes, I do.

Senator Prowse: This is something that I think that has to concern us at this stage. Your opinion could be very helpful to us.

Mr. Dennis: Well, I feel sir, that a newspaper should be owned—like I do—owned by a publisher who works at it.

I would prefer that but because of the financial position of the day, gentlemen, the costly operations, the cost of freight rates, news print, the postal rates, the tax laws, the future White Paper, technological improvements, may I say to you that I would hate to think that it would have to come to that. It may be the only salvation to the newspaper industry...

The Chairman: May I ask you immediately and at once and you refer to this constantly, Mr. Dennis, and I believe it is a very important question.

You seem to imply repeatedly that the economic climate, as you have described it, is the sole reason for concentration in the newspaper industry. Do you believe that?

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

The Chairman: You don't think you are interested in making a profit? You don't think that the profit motive has something to do with the accumulation of newspaper chains?

Mr. Dennis: Definitely.

The Chairman: I just wanted to get that on the record.

Mr. Daley: I think one of the things that enables the chains to emerge is the economic climate for the independent and the tax climate.

Senator McElman: On page 12 of your brief, you give a list of those occasions when important events in 1969 which you had staffers covering outside the province and the first item on that list—I am sure because of the importance of the area—was that your staff covered the entire session of the New Brunswick legislature in Fredericton.

Mr. Dennis: Yes.

Senator McElman: How many staffers do you have there?

Mr. Dennis: In Fredericton?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Shea: For the first couple of weeks, Senator, one of our staff covered. I think perhaps the first 10 days. He came back to Nova Scotia, then another who I personally know—I went myself as a matter of fact to the rest of the session.

We had one man there at all times.

Senator McElman: Who was the other man?

Mr. Shea: Robert Smith.

Senator McElman: Was that the Premier's son?

Mr. Shea: That's right, sir, yes.

Senator McElman: Could I ask—do you think it was a good judgement? Now, I know the young man and I have great feeling for him but do you think it was good judgement?

Mr. Shea: To assign him to cover the Legislature?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Shea: Yes, I do. May I just get very personal for a moment and explain it. Mr. Smith happens to be a very, very good newspaper reporter.

Senator McElman: I agree.

Mr. Shea: He loves to cover politics and we have been reluctant to permit him to cover politics within our paper because of the fact that he is the Premier's son. As a second thing—we couldn't allow him to cover politics in Nova Scotia so we allowed him to cover it elsewhere. So he went to New Brunswick and that reason. In all the years that I have known Rob Smith and that is going back quite a ways and in all of the copy that I have seen him write, I never, even to this day, I have never seen one single example of a Rob Smith piece of copy which was slanted one way or the other because he happened to be the Premier's son. He is a very fair and very rational gentleman.

Senator McElman: Well, let me say at once that I agree with that entirely. But in your judgment he should not cover the Nova Scotia legislature?

Mr. Shea: No, I didn't say that. We had decided not to use him on politics because we didn't want to injure him.

Senator McElman: Well, this is the same standpoint on which I am approaching it.

Mr. Shea: I see. Whether it was good judgment to send him to New Brunswick or not—I would say, yes. I would do it again tomorrow if he were on the staff. He works for a rival paper at the moment.

Rob Smith is a very capable reporter and so that I am sure that anyone in public life would say is an unbiased reporter.

Senator McElman: Well, in the context of your paper not circulating largely in New Brunswick and the members of the legislature not knowing Rob as well as you and I do and not consequently being able to have a very strong respect for him, would you not agree that he would be suspect?

Mr. Shea: Well, I think he always is suspect because of the fact that he is the Premier's son. It comes back to the fact that I think he has shown in every single story that I can recall that he has ever written that he is totally unbiased.

Mr. Dennis: Senator McElman, I think if we were wise not to allow him to cover provincial politics or on a local level—but I still don't think that he should be penalized extensively because he is the son of a man like that. His integrity I do not question. As far as I am concerned he is an able and honest . .

The Chairman: You will agree, Mr. Dennis that Senator McElman didn't question that at all?

Mr. Dennis: No, I know. Personally, I am just saying that we removed him from the political situation which he personally understood. I don't think he should be penalized excessively because he is the son of the premier.

Senator McElman: Neither do I, sir.

Mr. Dennis: Well, that is all I say. I don't think it did any harm at all.

Senator McElman: Well, there are other questions I would have liked to have asked but the time has gone on and I shall end here.

The Chairman: The time has indeed gone on and it has been a long session. I apologize to the gentlemen from Halifax. But I say to you, Mr. Dennis, that it is an indication of our interest that this hearing has gone on so long. It has been interesting and very helpful.

Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, January 27, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call the meeting to order.

Mr. Balfour, before we tend to deal with the Southam presentation, I have several announcements which are very brief and to the point. First of all, I would like, for the benefit of the senators and others, to indicate the nature of our schedule this week to make sure everyone is clear. We have Southam press this morning. The Calgary Herald at 20 p.m., the Vancouver Province at 3.30 p.m. and the Hamilton Spectator at 4.30 p.m. Will the members of the committee also please note that tonight at 8.15 p.m. we will be meeting in camera at 140 Wellington Street. I hope all who can will attend.

The schedule for tomorrow, Wednesday, at 20 p.m. the Montreal Star. Eight o'clock tomorrow night Senator Allister Grosart and at nine o'clock tomorrow, Wednesday, Earl J. Battie, Professor of Journalism, University of Western Ontario.

Then on Thursday at 10 a.m. the Canadian Society of Professional Journalists, and at 2.30 p.m., the Just Society Movement and at 4 o'clock Donald Cameron, editor of The Mysterious East, then Friday, January 30 at 10 a.m. the Toronto Star.

The second announcement is in connection with a CBC program which is on this coming Thursday night on the state of journalism. We noticed several references to our participation in various weekend papers.

The entertainment section of the Telegraph Journal and the Evening Times Globe for this past Saturday made reference and I quote:

"The confrontation between some members of the Senate committee on the Mass Media and some members of the CRTC" and reports special situations and reactions of the press and so on.

Again in the Toronto Telegram, Television Guide on January 23, I quote there:

"An added feature planned for Thursday night is a confrontation between members of the CRTC and Senator Keith Davey's Senate Committee on Mass Media."

"Because of these and other references I should read into the record a letter I sent to the CBC research person who has been in contact with us. I wrote her as follows on the 23rd of January.

"I am sorry we are unable to appear on the Media program which is planned for next Thursday evening. At the moment our Committee and most of its members are working almost literally on an around the clock basis. This weekend, for example, I intend to re-study all the briefs of those publishers who will appear before us this week.

This involves, as I am sure you appreciate, an enormous amount of preparation. The work of the committee has already attracted a great deal of public attention. The national coverage, while not exhaustive, has certainly been thorough. There is perhaps little we could usefully add at this time that would not be repetitive. Certainly it is not possible to make definitive comments or suggestions while the hearing phase of our study is still in progress."

Also for the record, senators, Douglas Fisher in a column in the Toronto Telegram on Friday—it may have appeared in others but I saw it in the Toronto Telegram—began as follows, and I quote him:

"The Senate committee on the media sat for nearly nine hours yesterday. Don't feel sorry for the 15 members of the committee. No more than six were there at any one time; the average was four".

For the record in fact it would not be possible for our average number of senators to be four because, of course, a quorum is five. At no time during the hearings in the past or in the future will there be fewer than five senators present.

Still for the record I have two telegrams I would like to read which we have received. The first is from Mr. D. B. Scott, editor of The Gazette, University of Western Ontario, London.

He says, and I quote:

"As much as we are flattered by Mr. Blackburn's comments regarding The Gazette's position of competition to the Free Press in London, some reply is necessary. The Free Press Holdings do have a virtual strangle hold on information processing and dissemination in London. The Gazette with a small and controlled circulation can only publish that which the Free Press refuses to publish. We are in the business of communicating student news to the students with some comment on the community. We do not Repeat, we do not—in any way form effective or even undesirable competition in the passage of information to the London Populace".

"The Free Press and particularly CFTL Television are in complete monopoly here.

Any assertion to the contrary is grasped to justify the unjustifiable."

The other telegram received on the weekend is from John Bassett, and I quote:

"Dear Keith:

Have just finished detailed discussion of Simon's testimony with regard to his statement that he was ordered to change stories by editors. Have questioned editors closely and would appreciate if you would put into your record my statement that Mr. Simon is an unmitigated liar. It's just as simple as that.

John Bassett."

I apologize, Mr. Balfour. I had to get those things into the record. I think they were of importance.

As requested, the Southam Press Limited forwarded to us briefs which, Mr. Balfour, have been read and circulated to all the members.

I should perhaps begin by introducing you. I am sorry. On my immediate right is Mr. St. Clair Balfour, President and Director of Southam Press Limited. On his right is Mr.

The brief has been circulated to the senators and it has been presumably read and studied. You are now free, if you will, make an oral statement of perhaps 10 or 12 or 15 minutes. You can explain your brief, expand on it, add to it, put in any clarification you may want to, or indeed you may cover other matters. Following that time I can assure you the senators will want to question you on the contents of your brief and the other things which you may say.

If during the questioning there is anything you feel is of such a confidential nature that you prefer to answer it in camera, then, I think we can oblige you.

Mr. St. Clair Balfour, President, Southam Press Limited: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Chairman, honourable senators, I hope to be at least as frank but perhaps not as emphatic as John Bassett.

Also, of course, Mr. Fred Auger, Mr. T. Nichols, Mr. Frank Swanson who with the editors, Mr. Paddy Sherman and Mr. Gordon Bulloch and Mr. Richard Sanburn will appear before you this afternoon and are now here and available to answer any questions on the operation of an individual newspaper while we at the corporate level may not be able to answer.

Your committee has already performed a useful function by encouraging us to take a hard look at the direction in which newspaper publishing may be heading and at the implications arising therefrom.

The questions you have asked of those who have appeared before you seem to indicate two major, but inter-related areas of concern—the preservation of independent publishing voices and, assuming a continuing trend toward group ownership, the desirability of limiting this concentration. Given the present taxation systems, it seems apparent that small and medium sized newspapers will in the long run pass from individual ownership.

Our written brief has recognized that the sale of newspaper properties is frequently dictated, or at least encouraged, by the combined impact of gift and death duties. The effective rate of these taxes has increased recently by government legislation. The new rates, taken with the proposed application of a capital gains tax will aggravate this whole problem in its application to all businesses, not just to newspapers.

It is characteristic of business that increases in productivity and a higher standard of living flow from the investment of capital. The reduction in available capital that results from high rates of capital taxes leads not only to the sale of many businesses, often to foreign corporations, but also reduces the capital available for reinvestment in greater productivity.

At least three of the publishers who have already appeared before your committee, Mark Farrell, John Bassett and Walter Blackburn have argued that some newspaper owners should receive special treatment insofar as death duties are concerned. We share their concern, but reject the concept of special treatment for our industry. There are always strings attached to special favours.

To our way of thinking this problem has an importance to Canada far broader than its impact on newspaper ownership, although it does indeed affect it. The reduction of capital available to Canadians will make the retention of Canadian ownership of all companies even more difficult.

One possible solution which we would ask you to consider is that all death duties should be abolished.

This idea is neither new nor revolutionary. Some provinces have abolished the provincial levy.

The tax revenues produced by death duties are not large—nor are they predictable. Capital gains taxes at appropriate rates will more than make good the lost revenue.

Further, and of equal importance, we recommend that capital gains taxes should be assessed only when a capital gain has been realized, either by sale, or by gift, or at death. When the control of a business is involved, the taxpayer should be allowed to spread his payments over a number of years, at no interest, so that the forced sale of assets and a change in the control of businesses can be avoided in the majority of cases.

The Minister of Finance has already recognized the unfortunate results which would flow from the five year evaluation of certain assets for capital gains purposes. This five year cycle was originally justified on the grounds that it would avoid the coincident payment of both death duties and capital gains taxes upon death. This double payment can also be avoided by the elimination of death duties. It is our conviction that the White Paper underestimated the impact that these proposed methods of taxation would have on Canadian society.

We can appreciate that government revenues must be maintained and even increased if Canadians are to receive the government services of all kinds that they demand. We simply point out that the application of the taxes proposed, in the way they are proposed, will lead to results that appear inconsistent with the national objectives of growth and Canadian ownership. Your committee sits here today, studying a situation that exists, in some measure, because of the results of past tax policy.

We have followed with great interest the appearance of the various witnesses who have preceded us. Some of them, we feel, have tended to conclude, without justifying the conclusion, that independently owned newspapers have some absolute and special virtues distinct from the actual performance of such papers in their communities.

It is our opinion that good newspapers are those published and edited by competent and well motivated men. Such men, in our view, are just as likely to be found working for group companies such as Southam as in independently owned newspapers. In fact, talent of the kind we are discussing may be more likely to appear in the larger companies where opportunities are more varied and ability rather than birth is the standard of measurement.

Actually one cannot generalize about newspaper groups. Most are private companies, owned by an individual or by three or four associated shareholders, some of whom have extensive interests apart from communications. Of the two which are publicly owned, the Thomson Company is controlled by one man and his family who hold more than 75 per cent of its shares. Southam Press is owned by nearly 3,000 shareholders, 8 per cent of whom are employees. No single shareholder owns more than 3 per cent of the company.

I would like to emphasize that for many years it has been firm company policy for Southam Press to avoid investment in businesses outside of communications and printing. Another policy has enjoined company executives from associating themselves with other non-communication corporations as directors.

These policies reflect this company's strong conviction that the newspaper's role in society can best be performed by individuals without conflicting interests. The drama critic should not be an actor in the play he criticizes.

The whole tradition of Southam Press, since its inception, has been against centralized control. Our files contain many letters reaffirming the company's policy of editorial independence.

However, in spite of this policy of local independence, we recognize that there can be risks in the concentration of ownership in this as in other businesses. The problem, of course, is to define just what steps should be taken to avoid such risks and to decide who should take them.

Before making any suggestions, we would express the opinion that there is not now sufficient concentration of newspaper ownership in Canada to warrant "across-the-board" restrictions of any kind. Both Southam and Free Press each own newspapers with approximately 18 per cent only of total national circulation. Thomson controls substantially less. There may be unique situations in the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick that require special study, not so much because of the total circulation controlled by the group owners, but because of the other business interests in which these owners are involved in these provinces.

It seems to us that if in the future the public interest is felt to be endangered by excessive concentration, the matter would then become appropriate for review under legislation covering combines or restrictive trade practices, which we understand is being redrafted.

We suggest that the following criteria be considered with reference to each individual case that might arise:

1. Would the proposed purchase tend to reduce or improve the quality of service being provided within the community involved?

2. Would it tend to limit local editorial freedom?

3. Would it tend to reduce or to increase competition within the community involved?

4. What is the size and editorial influence of the property being purchased?

5. What would be the result in terms of regional concentration?

6. What are the other business, political or special interests of the proposed purchaser?

7. What are the other media interests controlled by the proposed purchaser?

8. What is the total circulation controlled by the proposed purchaser?

We suggest for your consideration that there should be no special legislation limiting the size of newspaper companies. If it should be deemed desirable to investigate and perhaps prohibit a specific purchase, this should be done under the same laws and by the same authority which handles sales or mergers of any other type of business. Special legislation designed to deal specifically with newspapers would be dangerous because it would give power to regulate them in special hands. We feel that the best course is to have the matters dealt with by authorities independent of the Government of the day whose decision may be appealed to the courts rather than to the Cabinet.

Some witnesses have suggested that eventually there will be only three possible buyers for newspaper properties—F. P. Publication, the Thomson Company and Southam Press. Thirty-five years ago, Southam Press was the only company owning a significant number of newspapers. Today there is Thomson, F. Gelco and K. C. Irving. Others such as The Toronto Star, The Montreal Star, the Toronto Telegram, the London Free Press and Armada Corporation are of a size and have the management strength to go public and become potential purchasers. In our opinion there would be lots of competition to buy a major property if one came on the market. May I remind you what happened when the Globe and Mail was sold by the McCulloch estate?

In closing we would repeat our opinion that all existing independently owned newspapers will come on the market in due course because of the tax implications now facing Canadian business owners.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Balfour.

We will now turn to the senators. I might say that if there are any questions which you wish to turn over to your colleagues, please do.

Mr. Balfour: Thank you, sir, I hope to.

The Chairman: I think the first questions this morning will be from Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. First of all your verbal comments have eviated a good many of the questions I have. I was interested in your reference to death duties, and so on. There are suggestions by a good many witnesses that this has almost prepared the ground for the chain extending in their implications on the smaller companies and family type operation. So I think it will be clear on the record, you were speaking of the principle, not of any possibilities for expansion of your own organization.

Mr. Balfour: No sir. I was speaking of what has happened and what we think will happen. Of course, this does affect our own organization because as a publishing company, regardless of who the shareholders are, it will presume to continue to exist.

Senator McElman: We have had testimony that one of the groups is actively searching for new papers to purchase. This is the Thomson group. We have talked with F. P. about their purposes.

The Chairman: Excuse me, senator. The people at the back are indicating they would like you to speak louder, please.

Senator McElman: We have talked with the F.P. as well about their intentions as to whether they are actively seeking other acquisitions in the media field.

We have had testimony from at least one who suggested if his paper were for sale he would be trampled in the rush by the chains. Are you actively seeking or are you waiting until things come on the market?

Mr. Balfour: Do you mean, sir, I was making direct efforts to anyone, no.

Senator McElman: There are no recent incidents where you have been actually seeking a purchase?

Mr. Balfour: No sir.

Mr. Gordon Fisher, Vice President and managing Director, Southam Press Limited: May I make an opening statement, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fisher: I was intrigued by Dick Malone's indifference as to whether his company was called a chain or a group.

I have some confidence in spite of the number of publishers of seven papers that are in the room today, probably the one subject in which I can express an opinion that they might not disagree with is the distaste we feel at being called a chain, and I suppose the reason is that we are conscious that chains are used for many things and the common characteristic of the application is that when you pull one end of the chain all the little links in it between and indeed the end follow along in a very predictable way.

I think you will find that when you are through with us today if you pull one end of the Southam Press Limited, all the other ends will react differently. Some of them will, no doubt, smile with amusement; some will shrug with indifference; some of them might bellow with rage and I suppose some howl in protest.

"Chain" is not a word we like to apply to ourselves and the feeling that it gives is a feeling that we do not encourage in the company. We are not as indifferent as Mr. Malone is to the use of the word "chain".

Senator McElman: In the area of operating cost...

The Chairman: May I just interrupt. Senator McElman, on your first question, I would like to just be clear on that answer. Were you going to return to that?

Senator McElman: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Is the group interested in expansion?

Mr. Balfour: Yes. The group would be interested if another or other good newspaper became available. We are not going to Brantford and say "Will you sell your Brantford Expositor?"

The Chairman: But, if the Brantford Expositor was interested in selling, you would go to Brantford then?

Mr. Balfour: Not necessarily so, sir, because it is very close to Hamilton.

The Chairman: Well, the group is interested in expansion. I don't want to quarrel with words here.

Is the group actively interested in expansion? That is a pretty tough question, I agree. Let me phrase it another way. How interested in expansion are you?

Mr. Balfour: I think perhaps I would have to go a long way around to answer that question. In 1969 we acquired three newspapers, the Montreal Gazette, the Owen Sound Sun-Times and the Prince George Citizen. In each instance the proprietors of those newspapers approached us. They knew of course that we were interested, or would be interested, or would probably be interested, but this was not a case of the direct approach by Southam Press to those people.

The Chairman: Do you think there will be any purchases in 1970, from past experience?

Mr. Balfour: I cannot answer that question, sir. I am aware of none.

The Chairman: I am glad you gave the answer you gave there because I was going to ask you this: there was considerable activity in 1969 and it is interesting to note for the record that the approach in each case came from the papers.

Senator Hays: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: Is it a supplementary question?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Is there any thought of amalgamation say on the basis of where F.P. would take over one of the Winnipeg papers and Southam would take over the Calgary paper and a deal be made on that basis?

Mr. Balfour: There has been no deal discussed, sir.

Senator Hays: I often wonder why there was not.

The Chairman: Is that a question or a comment?

Mr. Fortier: Within this context, Mr. Balfour, of your declared interest in acquiring newspapers should an occasion arise, where would you yourself draw the line at acquisitions?

Mr. Balfour: I think the criteria that I gave in my verbal remarks really set the ground rules, Mr. Fortier. We would avoid a regional concentration, a greater regional concentration. For instance, in Alberta a greater regional concentration. We were offered the Red Deer Advocate before it was sold to the Liverpool Post and we said "No thank you. We do not think we should have it".

Mr. Fortier: So the regional criteria is the all-important one, is it?

Mr. Fisher: We have published in our annual report, Mr. Fortier, a copy of which was included in our brief, and amongst other things, that that says is that there is mention of the company's policy against owning two kinds of media within a community, so I think we would consider what other interests we might have in a community in looking at a newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I was going to come back to your interests in the electronic media at a later time, but for the moment I am thinking in terms of newspapers and I suppose the question that I am really asking is one you have asked before.

Within the field of newspapers, how much would be too much in what area?

Mr. Balfour: I do not think there is an absolute answer to that, sir. It depends on the concentration in that area and whether there are other strong voices in that area.

Mr. Fortier: There is no corporate policy on this point.

Mr. Balfour: There is no board minute on it. It is something, of course, which we have discussed. Shall I put it this way? As I mentioned Red Deer. We bought Prince George but we didn't buy some other British Columbia papers which were offered to us because we felt that Prince George was far enough away from Vancouver not to be a concentration.

I think we would look very hard at Brantford, because it is very close to Hamilton, for instance.

Mr. Fortier: Let me ask the question. You would look very hard at Brantford because of its proximity to Hamilton. Would you look very hard at the Telegram because of its proximity to Hamilton?

Mr. Balfour: Hamilton and Toronto do not speak to one another. We would not think that was too close to Hamilton.

The Chairman: Mr. Balfour, I am sorry. There are all supplementary questions. But I would like to ask this question: Standing back from Southam and looking at the general problem of concentration in Canada—you have heard us ask several questions which we are afraid of people like yourself—how much concentration is too much?

The Chairman: I am sure you will agree for example if one company owned all the newspapers in Canada it would not be a healthy situation. Is your answer simply the criteria that you listed in your oral statement?

Mr. Balfour: Sir, I would agree with you that if one company owned all the newspapers in Canada it would be a bad thing. We would think it would not be socially desirable for one company to own all the newspapers in a particular area.

On the other hand, if an opportunity came to invest in a newspaper in the Maritimes, I think we would be interested, not just because of the possibility of expanding, but because we think it would be of indirect benefit. The tendency of Upper-Canadians is to turn our backs on the Maritimes and this would involve us, as a company.

I think it has been good for our fellow publishers that we are now involved in the Province of Quebec in The Gazette. Our board meets regularly four times a year and all our publishers, who are officers of the company, attend. They all meet one another. They discuss problems. They hold committee meetings of their own to discuss problems such as news service, the sale of advertising, or this sort of thing.

I think it has been a good thing for our western publishers to have some one from the Province of Quebec, to be available, to rub noses with westerners, some of whom may not be as interested as they might be if they had more direct contact.

I would hope the same benefit would accrue if we owned a newspaper in the Maritimes.

The Chairman: Perhaps this is a natural point to return to Senator McElman.

Mr. Fortier: With Senator McElman's permission, and the Chair's indulgence, might I ask another question on that point because I think it really should be asked now?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Later the whole context will be lost and even perhaps the atmosphere. Mr. Balfour, you stress throughout your brief and you have also stressed in your verbal presentation the local independence of your individual newspapers, of the newspapers in your group.

If that is so—and I am not putting it in question at all—why do you fear this concentration?

Mr. Balfour: Because, sir, we also said in our group that ideally there should be many voices, and even with our local independence I think the public would tend to doubt that those voices were as independent as in fact they are, and this would have an adverse effect on the newspaper.

If we look at the situation in Vancouver where there is editorial independence and strong competition between the Vancouver Province and the Vancouver Sun—when we first formed Pacific Press the reaction in the trade and in Vancouver was "You have just stuck two things together and that is the end of it". It has taken, I think, a long time to convince the citizens of Vancouver we meant what we said when we formed Pacific Press, that there would be two voices in that community.

Mr. Fortier: How would you apply that reasoning to Victoria?

Mr. Balfour: I do not.

Mr. Fortier: In this area what do the people of Victoria think? What do they believe?

Mr. Balfour: I do not know.

Mr. Fortier: What you are saying really is: What is important from your group's point of view is not only that independence be but that independence appear to be.

Mr. Balfour: Be seen to be, yes sir.

Mr. Fortier: Be seen to be.

Senator McElman: I was quite taken by the suggestion by Mr. Balfour that there be no special intervention by government with respect to media. Can we sum it up at your suggestion as does the current report on the Combines and Restrictive Trade Practices legislation, that the whole area of media should be carefully considered in this, not as a special thing, but as related to any companies.

Mr. Balfour: Yes sir.

Senator McElman: And that each case of further concentration or ownership by conglomerates or multi-media ownership be considered on its own merits.

Mr. Balfour: I think that is a fair statement.

Senator McElman: I think this can be important, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator McElman: This is the first real suggestion we have had along these lines.

Mr. Fisher: Simply to emphasize the point, I think what we are saying is that we do not seek special legislation but we are interested, if there is to be legislation and legislation that would take into account the special characteristics of newspaper publishing, all media activities, there are special factors involved.

Senator McElman: And with the additional interesting proviso that references from this lead to the courts, not to the Cabinet.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, indeed.

Senator McElman: I believe I interpreted it correctly from your brief—your policy is to be active in the operation of newspapers, but not overly active in the electronic media, is that correct?

Mr. Balfour: Well, we have fairly substantial investments in the electronic media but we do not either manage or control any units of the electronic media.

Senator McElman: Is this the result of a basic policy decision or concern that if there were too great an element of multi-media ownership in concentration, that that would in fact provoke government intervention?

Mr. Balfour: Sir, we made that decision in 1960 long before there was any suggestion that there might be government intervention. We made it voluntarily as a matter of policy and at that time we sold the control of two radio stations we then owned.

Senator McElman: Just as a matter of interest: may I have your reaction to the attitude recently shown by Selkirk when it appeared before the CRTC and microwave was the main subject?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator McElman: And Selkirk's brief supported the microwaving of U.S. programs into the Prairies where, contrary to this, there is a very strong body of opinion that this is really in the Canadian public interest, culturally or otherwise.

Could you comment on that?

Mr. Fisher: This was, of course, Selkirk's representation, not ours, although we are shareholders of Selkirk. We knew something about it. I think this is a conflicting problem because on the one hand you have the question: Should the Government begin denying from some Canadians that type of program which others can receive, without the Government policy restricting it? You have the question: Should the Government policy protect the television and broadcasting industry from having that type of competition that cablevision would produce in the City of Edmonton, as an example, or Calgary?

Against that there is the very difficult question on which the CRTC has to deliver an answer—if they allow microwaving and the allow expansion of cable television into the communities with the almost certain damaging effect it could have on existing broadcasters, who have been franchised by the same board?

I think Selkirk's position was that in an area of doubt like this perhaps the thing to do was to allow more competition rather than more restriction, but it is a very complicated matter.

The Chairman: Is that a satisfactory answer, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Would you care to move into it?

The Chairman: No, I really wanted to know if you were satisfied.

Senator Hays: May I ask a question on this point?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Hays: Still in this regard, some newspapers—I am not sure—but it seems to me that editorially some of your papers took quite a strong stand in so far as this position was concerned.

Mr. Balfour: Did they?

Mr. Fisher: I have no doubt that the citizens of the cities involved felt very strongly in favour of expansion of the variety of programming they could see.

Senator Hays: I have another question. If you were the sole owner of one of the stations of which you were interested, would you feel the same editorially or would you give a preference from your head office in so far as this was concerned?

Mr. Balfour: Senator Hays, if I did, I would be slapped down by the publisher concerned.

Senator Hays: Would you replace him?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Mr. Ross Munro, Vice President and Publisher, The Edmonton Journal: We took a very strong stand in Edmonton against this decision because we think it is entirely wrong for a remote city not to have greater facilities and I have not heard anything—I do not know whether anybody in head office even read the editorial.

Senator Hays: May I pursue this?

The Chairman: You can pursue this after I ask this question. Do not people in the head office even read editorials?

Mr. Balfour: Not every day.

The Chairman: Is there anyone in head office who reads the editorials every day in every paper?

Mr. Balfour: No.

The Chairman: Do you not think maybe they should?

Mr. Balfour: No, because we have confidence in the people who are running these newspapers. We mean what we say when we say they are running it and running it independently.

Senator Hays: If then there is judgment microwave would destroy the existing media, in so far as television was concerned because they have to live with certain criteria, do you think that that would be good? Did they weigh it and how did they come to this decision?

The Chairman: Mr. Fisher says it was a very difficult one.

Mr. Munro: Senator Hays, we did not consider the position or any relationship our company had with any electronic company at all. As a matter of fact, I don't really know much about it. We only considered what we thought was best for the City of Edmonton and Northern Alberta.

We thought the citizens probably deserved better treatment with only two stations up there which is very limited, two stations in Edmonton and only five in that great area of the north and we looked at it entirely from the point of view of the service to the citizens of greater variety of information and entertainment.

Senator Hays: Would you feel then that the ground rules under which certain TV stations now have to operate should have been changed before there would be a decision in so far as microwave was concerned?

Mr. Munro: I would say they should all be on the same basis. I do not know enough about the television industry to answer that question.

Senator Hays: You felt quite confident when you were writing about it editorially.

Mr. Munro: I was only trying to reflect what the people need and that is our primary purpose, I think, in this.

The Chairman: Mr. Munro, I think if we were to ask every publisher about every editorial the committee would be endless. However, I do want to ask you a question about that editorial because its content bears directly on the work of the committee.

Are you concerned about the supersaturation of American programming in Canada and in particular television? Do you not consider this a problem?

Mr. Munro: Oh yes, this is a problem and a very great problem. In fact, I would like to see a lot more Canadian programs. On the other hand, there is still discrimination, which is a popular western world. You can get this in the east and we cannot get it, so there we are. This is the main fundamental point.

The Chairman: Some easterners think you have an advantage.

Mr. Munro: That is possible.

Senator McElman: Along the same line, it is quite obvious that the CRTC is trying to recover ground that has been lost to a degree already through this saturation by U.S. programming. In the light of this, that they are trying to develop a policy. You have, I believe, on Selkirk's Board a vice president from Southam. Is that correct?

Mr. Balfour: One of our vice presidents, in fact two of our vice presidents are directors of Selkirk, Gordon Fisher and Michael Harrison.

Senator McElman: One of them is a vice president of Selkirk, is that correct?

Mr. Balfour: No sir.

Senator McElman: That is not the case?

Mr. Balfour: I don't believe so.

Mr. Fisher: No.

Senator McElman: I understood it was. You have two directors on Selkirk's board. In a matter of this importance presumably there would be some discussion of policy in advance of a presentation of such importance to the CRTC.

Did the directors of Southam in fact make any representation to the board either for or against this extension of microwave?

Mr. Balfour: As directors of Southam, are you asking, sir, whether the board of Southam perhaps took any position and instructed those directors on the Selkirk board to take a position.

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: No.

Senator McElman: None?

Mr. Balfour: None.

Mr. Fisher: Nor did in fact the directors take the position with or without the direction of Southam's board.

Senator McElman: What I am getting to is the next question. Then Southam had no part to play in the policy approach of Selkirk?

Mr. Balfour: Not as a corporation. I am not a director of Selkirk. Gordon Fisher is. He will have to give any further answer on that, sir.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Fisher, you are on the Selkirk board. Did you take any part in any of the discussions about policies with regard to Selkirk's attitude on the extension of cable TV or non-extension?

Mr. Fisher: No, I did not, senator, but since you asked I am rather inclined to the view perhaps I should have. Perhaps it should have come up at Selkirk's board but in fact it did not.

Senator Prowse: It did not come up Selkirk's board.

The Chairman: I think, if I may say, senator, questions on Selkirk are germane given the Southam involvement, but I would remind you at the same time that Selkirk will be coming before the committee later on in the course of the hearings.

I am not trying to eliminate questions on Selkirk. I just want you to realize they will be coming.

Senator Prowse: Following on that same comment, for example, Mr. Munro has told me that the Edmonton Journal took a very strong stand against the CRTC decision with regard to permitting that.

Now, as a matter of principle—and perhaps Mr. Balfour can answer this—you own the Medicine Hat News too.

Mr. Balfour: Yes sir.

Senator Prowse: One of the arguments that somebody put up somewhere would be if they had allowed cable to go into Medicine Hat, the independent TV station there—I believe it is independently owned. Is anybody aware of that?

Mr. Fisher: I believe it is but I am not sure.

Senator Prowse: It would be unable to remain alive because of the very limited market and to cut down their hearing or threatening audience would mean they would never become viable.

Do you know whether the Medicine Hat News paper took any attitude in that regard?

Mr. Fisher: I do not know.

Mr. Balfour: I do not know.

Senator Prowse: If the local television station were eliminated in Medicine Hat, would you feel this would be a benefit to the Medicine Hat News, financially?

Mr. Fisher: You mean eliminated by the existence of a cable company bringing in three or four or five stations?

The Chairman: Just eliminated period. In the course of business, I presume, is what you mean.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Fisher: I think almost certainly that it would benefit the Medicine Hat News. It is competition. To the extent that lack of ca-petition enables a newspaper publisher to benefit in some ways, then it would benefit the Medicine Hat News.

The lack of competition also has some disadvantages and the Medicine Hat News would suffer from those disadvantages.

Senator Prowse: What are those disadvantages?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Munro, you talked about this. Do you want to say what the disadvantages are of publishing newspapers without competition?

Senator Prowse: Let us stay with the Medicine Hat.

The Chairman: I think the statement that Mr. Fisher made was a general statement in answer to your question. Mr. Munro should be equally general and that is: what are the disadvantages of not having any competition?

Mr. Munro: Well, the disadvantages are very considerable, I think, because you feel uneasy about the effort you are making every day. You are the only voice in the community. I dwell on this in my brief that I submit to your inquiry.

We have always worked in competitive situations and in all those circumstances, in competitive situations you know at the end of the day whether you were right or wrong or whether you had passed that day.

In non-competitive situations, as far as the point goes, I think it is really more trying at times—although I know many of my colleagues here would not agree with that, but I find it so.

You have really—this perhaps sounds platitudinous—a greater burden of responsibility if you actually have nobody—may I use the phrase—to blow the whistle on you, in your community or in your town in the print area.

The Chairman: I think I should add, senator, that Mr. Munro's brief was one of the written briefs that we received.

Mr. Munro: Yes.

The Chairman: I am going to have to end the discussion here on this point. It has been a useful point.

Senator Prowse: He deals with another question in his brief. I am not sure whether we should take it now or leave it until later.

The Chairman: I think I would prefer to leave that perhaps until this afternoon.

Senator Prowse: He is not going to be here this afternoon.

The Chairman: Well, I am sure he will be agreeable to answering the questions.

Senator Prowse: Would you prefer to take it now?

Mr. Munro: Is it a question on the Journal?

Senator Prowse: This is a question on how do you deal with extra voices when you are the one paper in the community?

The Chairman: Would you agree that you will deal with it this afternoon? Would you care to deal with it this afternoon?

Mr. Balfour: We will be here.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Hays: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: Is this a supplementary question?

Senator Hays: No, mine is a new one.

The Chairman: Senator McElman still is questioning, I believe.

Senator McElman: I have page 1 of the Toronto Telegram of Wednesday, January 21. There is a report in it of a speech that was made to the Progress Club of Canada by Mr. E. S. (Ted) Rogers, President of Rogers Cable TV, and I would like very briefly to refer to some of his comments.

He suggests:

"Canada's most powerful means of communication and national unity, cable television, is being given away to Americans."

He goes on:

"That it is currently owned in excess of 55 per cent by Americans..."

And he pleads for government measures to prevent microwave from picking up U.S. stations for a Canadian market.

He made further statements, but I think those are the principal ones I want to refer to.

Now, your group, with its numerous statements has, I think, approximately 22 or 23 per cent of Canadian circulation—that is in dailies.

Mr. Balfour: Eighteen, I think, sir.

Senator McElman: Eighteen as it reaches to the population. Well, I do not argue that point. In any event it is very...

Mr. Fisher: Thomson Newspaper, senator, gives us credit for 18 per cent in their brief where they set out circulation and we do not disagree with it.

Senator McElman: I understood your reach to the people was 18 per cent and that your actual circulation was 23 per cent. However, we will not argue that point. You are one of the larger. You must obviously be constantly studying effect of other media and I would like to get from Southam, if possible, your comment on these views expressed by Mr. Rogers.

For instance, as a major group, do you feel that there is a real danger developing from what is supposed to be the most powerful of the communication elements in the Canadian picture?

Mr. Balfour: Cable television?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: My understanding, sir, is that the CRTC has already ruled that this American ownership, of which Mr. Rogers speaks, must be given up, I think, by a date in 1970.

Mr. Fortier: September.

Mr. Balfour: Famous Players, who have a big concentration, is already disposing of it. I think Columbia Broadcasting System has a major holding in Vancouver. Is that correct?

Senator Beaubien: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: And presumably they will have to dispose of it. So I think at least one of the points Mr. Rogers makes is being taken care of.

Senator McElman: That is on ownership.

Mr. Balfour: On ownership.

Senator McElman: Well now, what about content?

Mr. Balfour: I am not an expert in this field, but I find it very difficult to understand why if in Hamilton or Toronto, or anywhere along the border, listeners can receive the U.S. stations directly or by cable Mr. Rogers says that we are being taken over.

The Chairman: Well now, are you quoting Mr. Rogers accurately, in fairness to him?

Senator Hays: It is in the newspaper. How can you be sure?

Senator McElman:

"Canada's most powerful means of communication and national unity, cable television, is being given away to Americans."

Mr. Fisher: Well, I think we can disagree with that.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator McElman:

"I don't blame Americans" he goes on

"I blame Canadians."

Then he makes his appeal for Government intervention.

The Chairman: I think your answer is both Mr. Balfour and Mr. Fisher said they disagreed with it.

Mr. Balfour: I suggest intervention has already taken place.

Senator McElman: On ownership.

Mr. Balfour: On ownership. And after cable, as I understand it, is a medium transmitting a message. It is a public carrier. All cable stations in our part of the country must carry the signals of all Canadian television stations in their particular area. This is a must.

Senator McElman: It is a priority.

Mr. Balfour: They have to carry it. Then they have additional channels they can carry other American ones as well which, of course, they do.

Senator McElman: I appreciate in some parts of our strung-out nation the viewers can get, without cable, American stations. Now there is little one can do about that. I do think it enters the question we are dealing with.

But, do you feel that if there is the necessity for protection of the Canadian entity that the CRTC or a government agency should turn back the clock; that is to reduce the number of American stations that can be brought in by cable in any part of the country?

Mr. Balfour: No. I do not personally nor do I think it would be proper to stop American newspapers from coming across the border.

Senator McElman: That is quite a different situation.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, there is a difference but you are talking here—. To me, we are talking about a message.

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: And after all, both our major networks, including the Government one and the private one, are carrying a far greater volume of American programs now. What cable would perhaps give is a better signal and perhaps more.

Mr. Fisher: Senator McElman, are you really asking for our opinion as to the possible effect on the fibre of Canada by the importation of American programs to all major communities in the country and in substantial quantities? Is that your question?

Senator McElman: I am asking you about the U.S. stations being brought in and their effect in addition to the American content which is already coming through our Canadian stations.

Mr. Fisher: This is your question. How great an impact can this have on Canada?

Senator McElman: And should we turn back the clock on it?

Senator Prowse: Can we?

Mr. Fisher: No. I guess I would argue that it is a legitimate consideration for a Canadian commission like the CRTC to concern itself with the possible implications of allowing more American programs into Canada. I guess I would also say I am glad I am not the Chairman of the CRTC and have to make a decision on it.

Senator Prowse: Where do you live?

Mr. Fisher: Toronto.

Senator Prowse: Then you can get the American stations without the assistance of the CRTC.

Senator McElman: Before you leave that point. Out of Mr. Balfour's reply it would follow then that if the CRTC is not to turn back the clock on existing cable television and permit a continuation of U.S. stations being brought into Canada to quite a heavy degree, that other Canadians should have the same privilege.

Mr. Balfour: I certainly thought so until I talked to one of your consultants or one of this committee's consultants who was also, I gather, a consultant to the CRTC.

I came down on the plane with him the other day and he told me that in his opinion—and I hope I am quoting him correctly or attributing the correct remarks to him—that the danger of extending the cable system to cities which did not now have it would mean that within a very short time American advertisers would probably go on American stations and not on Canadian stations, and therefore the Canadian stations would never be viable.

I find this very difficult to believe because Southam Press was one of the companies which founded CHCH in Hamilton and it is an independent station. It has no network affiliation and we had managed to exist.

Mind you, we are in a very well populated part of the country, but where the station has tremendous competition from both American and Canadian stations it has still managed to exist.

Now, whether this same situation would apply to Medicine Hat, which is a very small community, I am not in a position to answer, but I think your consultants perhaps could.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, do you have any further questions?

Senator McElman: Not on this question.

The Chairman: The only point I was going to make, senators, is that as interested as we are in this electronic phase of our studies and particularly as it relates to Southam and the other companies, I would hope we can turn now more to the newspaper side of the case.

Senator McElman: This is what I propose to do.

The Chairman: This is not a direction by the way. Do whatever you want.

Senator McElman: No. I have finished my questions on this phase.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator McElman: In the area of operating costs of newspapers, one of the largest elements is salaries and wages.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator McElman: In wage negotiations, are those all handled at the local level?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator McElman: There is no part played by head office in this?

Mr. Balfour: No direct part played by head office. One of our vice presidents knows something about labour contracts and he looks at the contracts and suggests to whoever the local negotiating committee may be the areas where he thinks there may be some problems, but it is up to the local people to deal with them.

Senator McElman: It is unnecessary then for a local manager to clear the contract finally with head office before signing?

Mr. Balfour: No. We had a strike over that in 1946.

Perhaps I should enlarge on that, sir. The International Typographic Union tried to force centralized bargaining and we insisted, quite correctly, that this was a local matter and they struck a number of Southam newspapers.

Senator McElman: And obviously your group would not be trying to establish relative scales of wages throughout the whole ball of wax.

Mr. Balfour: No.

Senator McElman: Another of the large single elements of cost is the newsprint. Does each of your newspapers do its own purchasing of newsprint?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator McElman: There is no general head office purchasing in quantity?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Senator McElman: Why not?

Mr. Balfour: Because we are spread out very widely. I think if you are going to have any bargaining power with a newsprint mill you have to have quite a lot of tonnage and our papers—none of them individually are that large, and they are spread across the country so that they are not buying from the same mill.

We have never found it practicable to date in any way to do central purchasing for newsprint.

Senator McElman: Some of the newsprint industry are also becoming quite spread out across the country. Would there not be an advantage in trying to do your purchasing at the central level?

Mr. Balfour: We have not.

Mr. Fisher: Correct me if I disagree. I think there is a strong point of principle here. I think our attitude would be if we came to the conclusion that we could buy newsprint at a cheaper price by buying it centrally than we would by buying it locally, we would certainly look very seriously at that.

I guess that would depend upon the laws of supply and demand in the newsprint industry.

Senator McElman: I take it then you buy from a multiplicity of sources.

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Senator McElman: For newsprint is the any variation in prices aside from transportation costs?

Mr. Balfour: I don't believe so.

Mr. Fisher: No. I cannot be specific either. I think there are the normal variations that any other newspaper publisher would enjoy in the same communities we publish in. The mills are different distances from the...

Senator McElman: I said aside from the cost of transportation, is there any difference in price?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Senator McElman: Have you ever tried to dicker a price?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

Senator McElman: What reasons are given for not being able to dicker a price?

Mr. Fisher: Do you mean by the newsprint people?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Munro, you do more bargaining than we do.

Mr. Munro: I deal with two companies and they are pretty tough about it. They say "it's $140 a ton or $145 a ton and that is it". They just put the price up $5 a ton which, in case, means $100,000. We are buying 20,000 tons a year. I tried hard. I couldn't get it anywhere.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Munro, was there not a difference between the price say in the east and the price from the Great Lakes at the same stage?

Mr. Munro: That would be the transportation?

Senator Beaubien: No. I am talking about the basic price.

Mr. Munro: I don't know.

Senator Beaubien: The price was put up at the same time.

Mr. Munro: I do not recall that incident, Senator.

Mr. Balfour: I had forgotten for the moment, but there was a difference in the basic price between east and west, the west east mill.

Senator Everett: Five dollars a ton.

Senator Prowse: Which is the higher?

Mr. Balfour: I think the east is the higher.

Senator McElman: You have never had discussions, I take it then, with others of the group that you might, amongst you, because this is such a tremendous element of your cost—you have never had discussions and got together groups with the newsprint industry to talk about price?

Mr. Balfour: No, not with the other groups.

Senator McElman: Do you think any purpose would be served perhaps by this committee discussing the matter with the newsprint industry?

The reason I raise this question is that Mr. Bissett has spoken out not only before this committee but in his newspaper and elsewhere that it is a combine and something should be done about it.

Do you think that because of the importance of this element of cost, perhaps this committee should discuss it with the newsprint industry?

Mr. Balfour: If this committee can get a reaction in the price of newsprint, we would be very grateful.

Senator Prowse: On this question of newsprint, I would like to ask Mr. Munro. You said you got your supply from two places, or are there two suppliers that you can take?

Mr. Munro: Two companies.

Senator Prowse: Where are they located?

Mr. Munro: In British Columbia.

Senator Prowse: Both in British Columbia.

Mr. Munro: As you know, there is no newsprint yet in Alberta. There is talk of one coming in or maybe two.

Senator Prowse: That talk has been going on for a long time.

Mr. Munro: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Are these two companies separate companies or separate mills in the same company?

Mr. Munro: No, two different corporations.

Senator Prowse: Are the prices the same?

Mr. Munro: Yes.

Senator Prowse: They quote you the same price now?

Mr. Munro: That is right.

Senator Prowse: And they just raised it $5 a ton and both of them raised it $5 a ton?

Mr. Munro: Not exactly the same date.

Senator Prowse: How many days apart, do you remember?

Mr. Munro: No.

Senator Prowse: On your attempts at negotiations with them, how far do you get? Do they just say "It is not negotiable. That is the price"?

Mr. Munro: No, they don't do that. They talk about it and they make quite an impressive case about their own costs rising. They have got problems too as we have with rising costs. They make a very impressive case. It is not my responsibility to swallow it. I was trying to get the best price I could and I think that my experience is not unique in Canada at all.

Senator Prowse: What are your freight costs in there per ton?

Mr. Munro: The freight costs would be $5 or $6 a ton, or something like that, in that neighbourhood.

Senator Prowse: They would be on Mountain rates.

Mr. Munro: It would be on the Mountain rates. We get a pretty fair break on the freight allowances.

Senator Prowse: Do you have much damage to your stock in shipment?

Mr. Munro: No. It goes by train and both mills are meticulous about this and we have good equipment to bring it from the siding down.

Senator Prowse: Those are all the questions I have.

Senator Hays: I notice on your Board of Directors you are fairly well represented right across Canada.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Hays: Wherever your group participates.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Hays: Do you have any strong stands on, say, drugs or tobacco when you do have these group sessions in so far as policy is concerned or is this left entirely up to the...

Mr. Balfour: Clearly up to the local people, sir.

In the past some of our newspapers, for instance the Ottawa Citizen, for many years did not carry any patent medicine advertising at all. This was the decision of the local publisher.

Some of our newspapers in the past have not carried liquor advertisements and again it is a local decision, not a board matter.

Senator Hays: The fact that you do not have any policy in so far as the news is concerned—it probably is just economics, I suppose, after a board meeting. Would there be an advantage to a newspaper that belonged to a group say to have an advisory board in the city in which they serve? Is this done? Has it ever been done? For instance, such as a trust company and some banks and other groups that operate with a chain or group do.

Mr. Balfour: We discussed this in our office, not at the board level, a number of years ago and came to the conclusion that there would not be benefit to the newspaper; that having a local board might bring pressures to bear on the publisher and reduce rather than increase his independence. This is just matter of opinion.

Senator Hays: So it has been considered. It was felt that the publisher alone could make better decisions than a group that is interested in this community.

Mr. Balfour: I think so because when I saw the publisher—certainly I hear from all kinds of people at all levels about the performance of the paper and whether we are doing it well or badly, or what we should be doing, or what we should be helping.

I believe the publishers who come on the afternoon will give us a more up to date answer but I do not think any of them feel that they are operating in a vacuum.

Senator Hays: As a publisher you pretty well call the tune.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Hays: That dribbles all the way down. It was what you thought.

Mr. Balfour: No.

Senator Hays: In so far as policy was concerned?

Mr. Balfour: No. The publishers would answer for themselves. Perhaps I should refer this to Mr. Munro to answer now and I will in a second, but when I was a publisher, editorial people talked to me daily and I let them and they ran the editorial side of the paper.

I was fully informed of what was going on. I very often and usually did not see editorials until after they had been published in the paper because I had confidence in Mr. Nichols, who was then the Associated Editor—he is now the publisher of The Spectator—because I knew that if there was a difference of opinion between us, or a difference in which he thought there may be a difference of opinion between us, or a difference in which he felt he wanted to consult me, he would come in and do so.

Mr. Munro: It is not just the publisher's opinion that prevails. Certainly in the end probably it can prevail. You have to have a boss in any operation, but at our place the decisions regarding policies and editorial opinion are arrived at by a group discussion—maybe half a dozen editors. The head of the editorial page, the editor himself, the managing editor of media, the news editor, the editorial writers of any specialists.

For example, in the oil business, we have to have specialists in that field. We call them in for discussion and maybe we are talking about pipeline down the Mackenzie, or this export problem, or how we can look after the tundra in the Arctic, or that the Imperial strike is big, and that sort of thing.

It is not just me calling the tune every morning off the top of the deck or anything like that, no.

Senator Hays: What pressures would you be worrying about with an advisory board, Mr. Balfour? After all, you select these people and it would be a cross-section of the community.

Mr. Balfour: Well, Mr. Munro, how would you like an advisory board?

Mr. Munro: This is an interesting question I think to all of us. I do not think I would like an advisory board because you would probably have a banker on it. You might have somebody from the retail trade and somebody from the oil industry, or somebody from a trust company.

This seems to be a kind of pattern of advisory boards and they are very useful to a company like a trust company that wants its antenna spread widely and its interests represented well, and it is a real honour to serve on these local boards; but a newspaper is so different, I am afraid some of the editors would be inhibited, in all good conscience, if, say, a Bank of Montreal man sat on our advisory board.

I think one way of meeting this problem of that sort of contact with the paper is to have gatherings from time to time of people in the community of the type you have in mind, I would imagine.

I know Bob Southam does that here in Cowasa. I have not been doing it in Edmonton, but I intend to do more of this, getting groups together to discuss the paper and local problems. I think this is the way I would prefer to do it.

Senator Prowse: By invitation.

Mr. Munro: Pardon?

Senator Prowse: By invitation.

Mr. Munro: Yes. We could gather quite a few people in a period of a year, Senator Prowse.

Senator Hays: So you do not think this is all bad. It is just you do not want to take orders from them.

Mr. Munro: It would not be taking orders. I do not think any of us would, but the pressure might indirectly be there to maybe favour the Bank of Montreal, or not say something about the Bank of Montreal you should be saying. I think there is some risk and maybe not just a little risk in it.

Mr. Balfour: Is it not just the adverse of not having any of our publishers on the board of any company?

Senator Hays: Yes. I see you have that covered in your brief.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, therefore we do not want our publishers to feel that they have anybody in the community unnecessarily influencing them. We could not put it clearer.

For instance, George Crawford is a director of the Southam Press and therefore George Crawford has no direct voice in the operation of the policies of the Calgary Herald.

The Chairman: I wonder if I might ask you—I am going to adjourn in about two or three minutes, but before I do—I would like to ask you some questions myself.

On page 4 of the brief you talk about the economic conditions that have encouraged group ownership.

"Competition, the requirement for increasing amounts of capital, the need for more professional management and last, but not least, estate taxes..."

You elaborate on that in your brief. I am interested in the fact that nowhere in that list do you include "the opportunity of making some money". Therefore I would like you to comment on that.

You have very kindly appended some briefs. I would like you to refer to page 1 of Mr. Nixon's brief. "Trends in U.S. Newspaper Ownership: Concentration with Competition".

In the first sentence, Mr. Balfour, the last paragraph of that page he says:

"Nevertheless, most U.S. publishers for several years have been basking in the glow of record-making profits, which have led in turn to the fabulous sums being offered by chain owners for newspapers in strong 'monopoly situations'."

In the light of that statement, with which I am sure you will agree, do you not think section 12 on page 4 should have had "emerging economic conditions" as one of them?

This is not in any sense a criticism but surely you will agree the chance to make some money is another reason.

Mr. Balfour: I think, sir, what we meant here was these economic conditions which were forcing papers out of private hands into groups.

The Chairman: But the groups, in acquiring, are motivated at least in part by the opportunity to make some money.

Mr. Balfour: Any business, I think, tries to operate profitably.

The Chairman: I agree.

Mr. Balfour: And we do.

The Chairman: Well then again, referring to Mr. Nixon's article that...

Senator Everett: Might I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: I wondered what the dividend rate of Selkirk is?

Mr. Fisher: Thirty cents a share.

Senator Everett: Thirty cents a share. What return would that be on your investment in Selkirk, not on its present market price, but on your particular investment?

Mr. Fisher: I cannot answer that, senator.

Mr. Balfour: We will get it for you. I have not got it here.

The Chairman: Is that satisfactory?

Senator Everett: It would be very interesting to know that.

The Chairman: You will send it to us?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Everett: Do you happen to know what your investment in Selkirk is, the cost of it?

Mr. Balfour: No. I will send it specifically in writing rather than generalizing verbally.

Senator Everett: Why?

Mr. Balfour: My answer to that would be because I do not know the answer now.

The Chairman: On page 5 in the Nixon article, he refers in the second last paragraph which begins "The fact—". Then the sentence which begins:

"The pattern today is clearly for only one daily in cities up to approximately 150,000 population; a morning and an evening paper under single ownership or in joint operating arrangements in cities from 150,000 to 750,000; and two or more competing dailies only in cities of more than 750,000."

Would you think that those statistics are valid in Canada?

Mr. Balfour: We have talked a lot about this, senator. We do not know the answer. We do know that the level seems to be rising constantly as costs are rising.

The Chairman: Well, the next question was going to ask you to comment, of course was in Edmonton the city and retail trade zone is, I understand, around 870,000 people. Is that right?

Mr. Munro: Approximately 430,000 in the city.

The Chairman: But 870,000 in the trade zone. I guess the more specific question is: there room for a second competing daily newspaper in Edmonton?

I apologize to Senator Prowse. That coming close to his question, I realize, but just put that to you, Mr. Balfour.

Mr. Balfour: Not yet.

The Chairman: Not yet, but when will there be?

Mr. Balfour: I don't know. As I say, the minimum figure is rising because costs are rising so rapidly and whether the growth the city will...

The Chairman: What about under a Pacific Press kind of arrangement where F.P. would publish a paper?

Mr. Balfour: We have been asked about this, of course. We have thought about it. When I say "We have been asked about it" do not mean we have been asked by F.P. We have been asked by other people.

I was involved in the Vancouver Pacific Press deal and our legal adviser told us that is no way would the Combines Commission allow such a similar situation to take place in Edmonton and in Vancouver, if you had read the findings of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission...

The Chairman: Yes, I have.

Mr. Balfour: They said that only because it seemed that the only way to preserve this second voice in Vancouver would they agree that we could do what we were then doing.

The Chairman: May I ask you one more thing? I meant to ask Mr. Malone the other day and it has been on my mind all weekend. In a situation like Pacific Press where they own 50 per cent and you own 50 per cent, who makes the tough decisions when it comes down to the crunch?

Mr. Balfour: These things are argued out at the board and there is no—there has to be a consensus. There is no one who can make a decision.

The Chairman: Who is the Chairman of the board?

Mr. Balfour: The Chairman of the board alternates. At the present time it is Mr. Fred Town of Vancouver. He has been alternating with Mr. Harry Rex. The company has no president. It has a chairman, and the powers of the chairman are to preside at the meeting.

The Chairman: Does he have to break a tie?

Mr. Balfour: No, he has no tie-breaking vote.

The Chairman: Well, surely, there must have been matters then on which you cannot reach a consensus and which you must postpone to a subsequent meeting?

Mr. Balfour: There have been on occasion. We have been now around 13 or 14 years and we managed to live with Mr. Cromie for several of them, and now we are living with Mr. Malone and his associates.

The Chairman: I have just two other questions.

Senator Everett: May I ask a question, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: What is your distribution policy on the profits of Pacific Press?

Mr. Balfour: Senator Everett, Pacific Press is owned equally by Southam and the Sun Publishing and we therefore share the profits.

Senator Everett: I am talking about the distribution of those profits to the shareholders. Do you drain it out every year?

Mr. Balfour: In the contract agreement between the two companies the directors agreed to use their best efforts to see that not less than 40 per cent of the profits were distributed and this is about what has gone on since the inception of the company.

Senator Everett: Is that in each and every year, or over a total number of years?

Mr. Balfour: In each and every year.

Senator Everett: Sixty per cent is ploughed back?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Everett: And that is part of a minute of agreement, is it?

Mr. Balfour: Yes, it is.

Senator Everett: Was that made with Cromie?

Mr. Balfour: That was made with Cromie at the time Pacific Press was formed.

Senator Everett: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: I just have two other questions then.

Mr. Balfour: That was made with Sun Publishing.

Senator Everett: While Mr. Cromie was there?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Balfour, going back to the bottom of page 10 in the Raymond Nixon article in which he attempts to give the value of these newspapers he says:

"A few years ago the value of a successful daily in a 'monopoly' city usually was estimated at approximately $100 multiplied by the daily circulation as against $30 multiplied by the circulation for a competitive daily."

In terms of the study which this committee has undertaken, would you think that these rule of thumb statistics have any validity in Canada at the present time.

Mr. Balfour: There are a number of rules of thumb you can use, sir, and after you have made an evaluation basis on that then you have to get down to the nitty-gritty and decide whether you are really going to bid it or not.

The Chairman: I am asking you specifically about this. This is one rule of thumb. It is contained in your brief. I agree it is an appendix to your brief, but is it a valid rule of thumb?

Mr. Fisher: No, I do not think it is a valid rule of thumb, Mr. Chairman. It suggests that the value of a newspaper property is directly related to its circulation and I do not think the value of a newspaper property is directly related to that. It increases as the circulation goes up.

The Chairman: He says on page 13, on the final page of the article the author says that there is a point in size and he says:

"That there is a point in size—in the United States at least—at which the economic advantages of group operation fail to compensate for the traditional opposition of Americans to absentee ownership."

Do you agree with that statement for Canada?

Mr. Balfour: I think it all depends on the kind of group.

The Chairman: Do you agree with it for your group?

Mr. Balfour: No.

The Chairman: Are there any groups in Canada that you would agree with it for?

Mr. Balfour: I don't think so. I think it depends entirely on the management, just as in any other business. If the company gets too big to manage and those who are managing it are not able to change the method of managing to cope with the size, then it will break down. Hearst tried to run the whole show and it broke down.

The Chairman: Then, my comment may sound snide. I do not intend it to, but you would think in reading that Nixon article that we should be mindful it is an American article.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

The Chairman: In the appendix.

Well, senators, Mr. Balfour and gentlemen I think we should give the reporter a break. We will reconvene in exactly five minutes and I hope we can keep you until one o'clock if that would be possible.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, indeed.

...Adjourned at 11.40 a.m.

Resumed at 11.45 a.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I might call the meeting back into session please.

Senator McElman has requested to follow up on a couple of questions he has and then am going to turn to Mr. Fortier, and I would remind Senator McElman and Mr. Fortier that I have three other senators who have indicated that they wish to question Mr. Balfour. Hopefully, we might be able to adjourn at one o'clock.

Mr. Balfour, you wanted to clarify something, I believe?

Senator Prowse: Do you want to make four senators?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Chairman, if I may go back to Senator Everett's question about Pacific Press. This is a most peculiar arrangement in that there is an agreement which was worked out between the two original parties, Southam Press and Sun Publishing, under which although the equity is owned as 50 per cent, the rights of each company to operate an individual newspaper are completely unrestricted.

One of the operating companies could, legally speaking, break the company spending money. No one could stop it. There is no limit about the amount of money that the Province can spend on editorial quality, circulation and this sort of thing.

The board of directors is not the final arbiter. This is in the agreement and a copy of the agreement has been filed if you want to read it; but it is a most unusual agreement. It was the only way in which we could work it out in order to really preserve the independence of two voices in Vancouver, and this is one of the reasons why it would be very difficult to try and get anyone else to try and agree to a similar sort of agreement, I think, in any other city.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

Senator McElman: Just to follow on that: why then is not, let us say, the weaker of the two newspapers really pushing to get more of the circulation and advertising of the market?

Mr. Balfour: It does, sir.

Senator McElman: It is just not successful.

Mr. Balfour: It is increasingly successful if it has not passed the leading one.

Senator McElman: And then in fact the stronger of the two is truly subsidizing the other to a degree, is that correct?

Mr. Balfour: No, because when we formed this company, Southam Press contributed the assets of the Province plus a cash payment in order to equalize the ownership.

The revenues belong to Pacific Press. The costs are paid by Pacific Press. For our own purposes we do, what Senator Everett has referred to I think as, branch or plant accounting.

I am not a financial man. We might do direct accounting which would give different results. There would be a different allocation of the costs. This is the way we started because we just took two newspapers as they then were and put the figures in the books of Pacific Press on the same basis because we thought this would give us some idea of where we were going and how we were going.

Senator Everett: I think what Senator McElman is suggesting is that the advertising rates are so structured, the combined rate creates a subsidy from the Sun to the Province.

Mr. Balfour: I do not agree.

Senator Everett: We are not saying we are right. The presumption is raised.

Mr. Balfour: The combined rate, sir, is based on the aggregate circulation of the two newspapers which is the way it is based on the aggregate circulation of any morning and evening combination in Canada and, I think, in the United States.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Balfour, how do you allocate then the amount of advertising revenues that comes in between the two; as per the circulation? If you take in $1 million in advertising, who gets what?

Mr. Balfour: The only place there is a combined rate is in general advertising. The retail advertising and classified advertising is sold by separate space separately and the rates are established by the publishers of the two newspapers. The rates for the combined advertising are also established by the publishers of the two newspapers.

Senator Everett: You split the profits fifty-fifty.

Mr. Balfour: Because one company owns the two newspapers.

Senator Everett: You say there is no combined rate for retail advertising?

Mr. Balfour: No.

The Chairman: How about department store advertising?

Mr. Balfour: No.

The Chairman: Mr. Auger will be able to go into detail with us this afternoon during the Province's appearance this afternoon.

Mr. Balfour: I am a director but not an officer.

Senator Prowse: By "general Advertising", do you mean national?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

The Chairman: I do not want you to think you are on the stand, Mr. Balfour.

Senator McElman: Back to the supplementary: I want to deal again with the two great elements of operating costs, salary and wages and newsprint.

Presumably your people do hard bargaining on the local level. You refrain from any head office or across-the-board bargaining. You in fact have had a protracted strike, I take it, over this very thing.

Mr. Balfour: That is just one of the causes of it.

Senator McElman: Presumably there would be in your newspaper some editorial along the line about rising labour costs in general, not necessarily in one particular element, but in general.

Yet the other great element of costs you accept apparently at head office and at the local level a set price which is not negotiable and there is no strong outcry publicly or otherwise about it.

Do you not think that is an anomaly of attitude?

Senator Beaubien: Are you talking about the set price of newsprint?

Senator McElman: That is right. On the one hand hard bargaining and in the other, none.

Mr. Balfour: I think there is hard bargaining on the newsprint. We have not been very successful.

Senator McElman: Why would there be no public expression over a period of ten years of your inability to negotiate?

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Munro, would you answer that, please?

Mr. Munro: I am not sure whether it is correct to say that it is not negotiable. There is always the possibility that a newsprint company is going to give you a better break.

You asked me a direct question and I told you I couldn't answer it on this round but there is always that possibility open. I do not think it is completely closed.

Senator McElman: Has anybody ever been successful in it?

Mr. Munro: If they are, they do not talk about it. That is one thing.

Senator McElman: Quite.

Mr. Munro: I do not know. I have heard rumours of some companies—some newspapers have received a somewhat better deal with this last round, but I do not know.

Mr. Balfour: I think when you talk about newsprint rates somebody—not you Senator McElman—said freight rates excluded. There is an area for bargaining here in the cost of delivering paper.

Mr. Munro: This is an important area.

Senator McElman: Would you care to elaborate on that?

Mr. Balfour: Well, obviously, it is less expensive to ship paper from a mill which is close to a newspaper plant than it is to ship all across the Rockies to the Edmonton Journal, and some papers certainly are able to achieve a rate which is almost f.o.b. and then do their own trucking or their own freighting.

Senator McElman: Then really this is not...

Mr. Balfour: It changes the final cost to the newspaper.

Senator McElman: It seems to me the advantage here would still lie with the newsprint producer rather than the newspaper group.

Senator Beaubien: It all depends on supply and demand or individual, except for Mr. Bassett's paper, public outcry on behalf of the industry about the price of newsprint.

Mr. Balfour: No. I think there has been the past complaints about it. I do not think a company we have complained about it. I know that a number of years ago when newsprint was in short supply and the Canadian newspapers were not getting it, I did use power play to make sure that the newspaper did get a supply of newsprint.

Senator McElman: But supply was the situation then.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, the shortage. I have been talking about the other aspect of it, the price.

Senator McElman: Would you comment well—I do not believe there is a difference between domestic and export price. Is that so?

Mr. Balfour: Yes, there is.

Senator McElman: There is?

Mr. Balfour: Yes. The price in the east anyway is based on New York and there is a differential which is supposed to arise from the difference in freight, the cost of delivering paper to the American market and the Canadian market.

Senator McElman: Again largely based upon transportation.

Mr. Balfour: That is the theory.

Senator Smith: I had a question I wanted to ask later on but Senator McElman has touched on it. It is on the cost of newsprint. There has been asserted—and everyone has known this for some years—there has been a very tight combine in this newsprint thing.

Now, I do not know the management of any other newsprint manufacturing companies except one, and that is in my home town, Liverpool, Nova Scotia. They did not do very much of their business—they are part of the Bowater organization which does a little business in other parts of the country. The experience indicates to them that there is presently, at least, hard bargaining in the question of purchasing newsprint.

If I may be permitted to clarify this as background for you to answer.

Mr. Bassett, when he was down, made quite a plea for a further addition to differential which was at one time $3 or $4 and now, if my memory serves me right, is $9 or $10.

He suggested that there should be a tax incentive particularly directed to the newsprint manufacturing companies to enable them to increase their differential.

Would you think that would be a way to make the news publishing industry a healthy one in this country?

Mr. Balfour: Well, anything which reduces the cost of one of our major raw products would, of course, make newspapers economically more viable.

Senator Smith: My question was really: Do you think a tax incentive to the newsprint industry was the way to go about this?

Mr. Balfour: This is possibly one way.

I have not studied that question, sir. You said there is hard bargaining. There is hard bargaining when newsprint is not tight, but when mills are running at high operating rates, they are not very interested in doing things for customers, special things for customers.

Senator Smith: Of course, we are arriving pretty close to that situation today.

Mr. Balfour: It has certainly been tighter in the last year.

Senator Smith: We are able to arrive at a figure that on the consumption of newsprint of the Toronto Telegram from Mr. Bassett's figures—which did not take into account the difference in the American exchange between the Canadian and U.S. dollars—that the benefit to his company presently was in the order of half a million dollars a year. That is, even using his figure, and my figure was about $1 million when you take into account the differential in the Canadian dollar values, but one of the things that made that differential was the fact that newspapers today are able to get varying credit. It may be 30 days in some cases, and in other cases it may go as high as 180 days.

Well, with interest rates as they are today, that is pretty substantial, of course.

Unless these Bowater people do not know what they are talking about, and their experience is an isolated experience in the Ontario market.

If they are not wrong there is and has been right up to the present time pretty hard bargaining, such that they could not afford to sell newsprint to the Halifax Herald on special terms if they were going to make that available in the Ontario market for the publishers up here, because it was not economical.

The kind of terms that were being given were not economical for this particular delivery from Newfoundland.

Mr. Balfour: There is only one point I would disagree with, sir, and that is that the Canadian newspapers are getting the benefit because of the exchange. The newsprint mills are getting the premium because of the exchange. These companies are in Canada where the Canadian dollar is legal tender. They are able to sell to the American market and get the benefit of the premium.

Senator Smith: Well, of course...

Mr. Balfour: We are not benefiting.

Senator Smith: ...but you also give the other side of that. Their price to the American publisher would have to go up to that extent for the most part. I think that is all I wanted to ask.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, still on this matter of newsprint. Your member companies are strong supporters of the CDNPA, the Publishers Association?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator McElman: With the talk that we had expressed before this morning—perhaps in other words that—that things must not only be kosher but appear to be kosher, and since obviously the bargaining which reputedly goes on on the price of newsprint has not had any effect, has this matter been discussed at any length or in depth by the Publishers Association at any stage, do you know?

Mr. Balfour: There is a Newsprint Committee of the Can. Daily Newspaper Publishers Association which is headed by Mr. MacCallum of the Halifax Herald. He has been in correspondence with me and I presume with a number of other newspaper publishers about the newsprint and its supply and its cost.

The CDNPA as an association meets annually with the newsprint manufacturers. We seem to discuss everything but prices at those meetings. There seems to be an unwritten law that price shall not come up at those meetings.

There is a similar meeting with the American newspaper publishers. The reason price does not come up is that it is an individual matter between the individual paper and the individual mill. It is not a matter for an association.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Balfour: In number 16, page 6 of your brief, you discuss and indeed you make a very good case for the tendency of the larger newspapers to drive the smaller paper out of the field. You recall that?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Could you tell the committee why this phenomenon has not happened in Calgary and Winnipeg where you do have a strong newspaper and a weaker newspaper?

Mr. Balfour: I can tell you why it has not happened in Winnipeg. The Winnipeg Tribune is strong enough to withstand the Free Press...

Mr. Fortier: If it was independently owned do you feel the Tribune would have ceased publication?

Mr. Balfour: I think if the Tribune had been independently owned the owner would probably have come to a group and asked to sell his paper.

Mr. Fortier: To use an expression which was used earlier this morning, is it still bleeding?

Mr. Balfour: Is it still bleeding?

Mr. Fortier: You were referring to the Vancouver situation. You said that the bleeding point had not yet been passed. Has the bleeding point, so far as the Tribune is concerned, in Winnipeg...

Mr. Balfour: As far as the Tribune is concerned, it is still a viable paper.

Mr. Fortier: Is it making money?

Mr. Balfour: It is a viable paper.

Mr. Fortier: Is it a property which will continue to be viable within the Southam group, as you envisage it today?

Mr. Balfour: We certainly hope so and expect so.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be more viable if you had an agency type of agreement in Winnipeg as you do in Vancouver?

Mr. Balfour: We would have to go into the morning field in that case.

Mr. Fortier: This would be the reverse.

Mr. Balfour: There would be a benefit in that there would be common use of a plant of a certain plant.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever looked into the possibility?

Mr. Balfour: We have never discussed it.

Mr. Fortier: Would you entertain such a suggestion in Calgary where your newspaper is in the dominant position?

Mr. Balfour: I would be reluctant to do in Winnipeg. I think I am speaking personally. I would be reluctant to do it in Calgary unless there was no other way in which the Albertan could be kept going as an independent newspaper.

I think it is better the way it is.

Mr. Fortier: You will recall I asked the question of Mr. Malone. Is there any sort of an unwritten agreement between the two newspapers in Calgary and in Winnipeg as circulation drives, for example, or attempts to get more advertising, and that sort of thing?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Mr. Fortier: I am sure you will recall a book that was written by Mr. Bruce about two years ago. It was entitled "News and the Southams".

I believe it was commissioned by the Southam Press.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, the Southam Press.

Mr. Fortier: There are on pages 99 and 100 of that book references to what the author calls "Working arrangements between the Ottawa Citizen and the Ottawa Journal"?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In miles of circulation and miles of advertising. You are well familiar with this?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: The author also seems to indicate that those arrangements are no longer in existence.

Mr. Balfour: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: So my question to you is: Were there at any time any similar arrangements in Calgary or in Winnipeg? To be pure today is one thing. To have always been pure is another thing.

Mr. Balfour: I am not sure about Calgary because the Albertan was in very great difficulty during the depression—and this is where I had an executive position with the company—but my recollection is that we gave some financial help at one time to the Albertan, or did something, but I am not...

Mr. Fortier: Is there anyone in attendance here, Mr. Balfour...

Mr. Balfour: Nobody here would know this. This is long, long ago.

Senator Prowse: Would that be while the Social Creditors owned it?

Mr. Balfour: I doubt it.

Mr. Fortier: So these working agreements which were in existence in Ottawa are no more?

Mr. Balfour: That is correct, and Ottawa was the only place there was one.

There was a circulation agreement in Ottawa, the details of which I have not with me, but the proportion of the circulation market in the city and in the country was made from a period and if it varied by a certain percentage, above or below that, the second paper was entitled to do all the promotion and the leading paper would stop promoting until the balance was restored.

In fact, at one time there was a common circulation bureau and this broke up at the time of the strike in 1946.

Mr. Fortier: Is it possible, Mr. Balfour, that the effect the end result of the Pacific Press arrangement in Vancouver is the same as what prevailed here in Ottawa between the Citizen and the Journal some years ago?

Mr. Balfour: I had never thought of it that way.

Mr. Fortier: Is it possible?

Mr. Balfour: No, I do not think so. I think the Pacific Press has far more corporate involvement in Pacific Press than there was in Ottawa. You still had two competing evenings in Ottawa, with an undertaking that one would not put the other out of business.

Mr. Fortier: But in effect because of the extent to which one of the newspapers in Vancouver would be called upon to subsidize the other one, should the other one not do well, I would think that the first newspaper had an interest in seeing that the matters are balanced out, so to speak? I am really just asking a question.

Mr. Balfour: I can just tell you, Mr. Fortier, that Mr. Malone does not agree with that theory at all. He believes that they should do everything to keep the Sun as powerful a paper and as large a paper as it is possible.

Mr. Fortier: But theoretically, you can follow my reasoning that the Sun and the Province should have somewhat similar results at the end of the year and it is in the interest of both newspapers to see to it that the other one does reasonably well, failing which in fact it will have to subsidize the other one.

Mr. Balfour: That is not so.

Mr. Fisher: I guess the point is simply this, Mr. Fortier. It does not necessarily follow that Pacific Press will make more money by the Sun giving up some profits so that the Province can have some more.

Mr. Fortier: No, but it could happen that way.

Mr. Fisher: The economic studies do not suggest it would happen that way.

Mr. Balfour: I suppose that there is a clear suggestion that if in fact the Province were to be discontinued, that Pacific Press may make more money than it can do any other way, but that is not the determining factor in the arrangement.

You referred earlier to the type of working arrangement that existed in Ottawa some time ago. There is no way in which the officers of F.P. Publications can stop the officers of Southam Press through their interest in the Sun Publishing from spending exactly what we want to promote circulation, or encourage advertising, or any other expenditure in the Province.

Mr. Fortier: Do you see a point in time, gentlemen, where—I think I will take the Calgary situation where you are in the dominant position—it may be in the interest of the reading public which, as you say, should be exposed if at all possible to two points of view emanating from the written press—do you see a point where it may be in the interest of the public to enter into that sort of working arrangement with the paper in Calgary so as to prevent the Albertan from disappearing?

Is that a valid hypothesis?

Mr. Balfour: It could happen. I do not know what the Albertan's financial position is. I do know it has a commercial printing plant which I believe is attached to it. It does contract printing for such people as the Financial Post. It publishes the western edition of the Financial Post and I think it does everything it can to keep that company going.

I do not believe that it would have kept going if it had not been owned, I believe, by F.P. or prior to that by Mr. Bell as an individual who has other resources, but I do not know.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Fortier, I think that when Pacific Press was investigated by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission and they made its report, this report validated, if I may use that word, the existence of Pacific Press and the arrangement largely because it would give a second editorial voice in Vancouver, and I think we felt that was a good conclusion.

Mr. Balfour: I would have to admit the situation might arise in Calgary where exactly the same circumstances would come to pass.

I think Mr. Balfour testified at the time of the Pacific Press hearing that it was the last recourse, that it was one that the company instinctively resisted, and at the time we did reach an agreement with the Cromie family, it has come to pass since that we are partners with F.P. Publications which is the other largest newspaper publishing company in the country probably, and I hope that the officers of F.P. Publications who are here will not misunderstand me when I say that they are the people that we instinctively least want to get into that sort of arrangement with in any other community.

Mr. Fortier: I was going to ask you that question: Whether you were surprised when you woke up in bed with F.P. at one point?

Mr. Balfour: Yes. I think the point is that...

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Malone said you were.

Mr. Balfour: Yes. For all the obvious reasons we do not look forward to the day in Calgary when that type of arrangement might be the only logical arrangement and least of all of the people we want to seek it we happen to be the publisher of the paper there.

Mr. Fortier: You have made that point very clearly. I was interested earlier this morning. I believe to the Chairman's question from the Chair, that you did not at head office read the editorials published in newspapers belonging to the group on any given day.

Mr. Balfour: That is correct. I cannot do it.

Mr. Fortier: I think you added to a supplementary question that there was no one either at head office whose responsibility was to specifically read all the editorials of your member newspapers.

Mr. Balfour: Every day, no.

Mr. Fortier: And I would presume that statement is valid also to the news content of the newspapers?

Mr. Balfour: Yes. I read some of the new papers, but not all of the newspapers, and do not read them every day.

Mr. Fortier: Because you said one of the reasons for that was because you had faith in your publishers.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I am forced to ask you that question. If you do not do this sort of constant reading, on what do you base this faith in your publishers? How do you keep up with the way your publishers are reporting?

Mr. Balfour: We are constantly visiting. I visit all the papers at least twice a year. Gordon Fisher visits. Peter Southam visits. John Ward visits. Peter O'Brian visits. We do. We all read when we are there. It is very much easier to judge a newspaper if it is read when it is fresh in its own community than when it is after Mr. Kierans has taken a week or so and get it down to us.

The Chairman: I should perhaps say that Mr. Kierans is going to have equal time on the committee. He will be here, I think, on February 11.

Mr. Fortier: The night Toronto is playing the Montreal Canadiens, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: But is there any scrutiny of professional standards, Mr. Balfour, in the individual newspapers which belong to the Southam group?

Mr. Balfour: Well, scrutiny of professional standards is, of course, by the publishers of those newspapers, and these are people who are just as experienced—and in many ways a great deal more experienced than I am—in the publishing business.

All our people are pros who know their business and they are just as capable of running a good newspaper as any independent publisher.

Mr. Fortier: So we cannot speak of central scrutiny. We can speak of a number of different scrutinies, so to speak, is that correct? There is no central supervision from Toronto?

Mr. Balfour: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: In so far as professional standards of the individual newspapers are concerned, an analysis thereof or an appraisal thereof is left to individual publishers.

Mr. Balfour: No, not entirely, because as I said I do read some newspapers but I do not read them all every day, but neither does anyone else. We read them often enough and we look at them often enough to know whether the newspaper is doing its job.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have occasion to comment to your individual publishers on this point of professional standards?

Mr. Balfour: Sometimes I make suggestions that have they considered doing thus and so.

Mr. Fortier: What I am trying to get at is: Is this an advantage or disadvantage of group ownership that there be available, you know, a sort of central clearinghouse.

Mr. Balfour: There is a central clearinghouse and I think this is an advantage, and as I said earlier there is an advantage that these publishers all know their part of the organization and they do meet regularly and they fight among themselves and with us about their newspapers. They report and discuss before the whole board. They discuss the news service. They discuss selling of advertising. They discuss problems they may have with circulation. They tell us their plans. We are very familiar with, but not keeping a finger on, the individual.

The Chairman: That is the central clearinghouse to which you are referring?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

The Chairman: How often are those meetings?

Mr. Balfour: Quarterly.

Mr. Fortier: There have been many references—I do not recall they are in your brief from memory—to decency and good taste, you know, which are some of the principal factors involved in writing editorial opinion, or even in publishing news.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In the eventuality in one of your Southam newspapers, there was an editorial which at head office you generally felt was of distinct bad taste, would you do anything about it?

Mr. Balfour: If I thought something was in bad taste, I would probably ask the publisher "why"? Or say "I thought it was in bad taste, why"?

Mr. Fortier: Has this ever happened?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Mr. Fortier: Do you issue any guidelines with respect to such things as news treatment from Toronto to your individual publishers?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Mr. Munro: No, none at all, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Typographical format, for example?

Mr. Balfour: We certainly discuss that but the final decision lies in the hands of the publishers.

Mr. Fisher: There are no directives from head office.

Mr. Fortier: On this point of professional standards and directives from head office, I would like to refer to two news reports which deal with the workings of this committee, as a matter of fact, and one of which was published in the Calgary Herald of September 13, 1969, under the following by-line:

"Media Research Reports Ready".

It is indicated underneath this that this is an article by Robert Cohen of the Herald's Ottawa bureau, copyright 1969.

Two days later on September 15, 1969, there was published in the Winnipeg Tribune the very same article with one word which had been changed only, and I see here that the clipping from the Tribune is entitled:

"Press, Radio, TV Inquiry starts here December 9", and then it is written "from Robert Hill in Ottawa, Tribune staff correspondent". Would you explain this?

Mr. Balfour: Both these publishers will be on the stand this afternoon. They will have to explain it. I cannot.

I would suspect this was a typographical error probably, with due respect to the Tribune, on the part of the Tribune because I think Bob Cohen was in Ottawa at that time and Bob Hill, I think, was in Quebec.

Therefore what happened was that somebody presumably in the composing room has dropped the wrong set of slugs in.

Mr. Fortier: Now, obviously if you had read your newspaper on a day-to-day basis, this is something which you would have picked up in Toronto.

Mr. Balfour: I might have.

The Chairman: Just to follow up on that point. It says Robert Cohen, the Herald's Ottawa bureau.

Even if Mr. Cohen's name would have appeared, would it have said "by Robert Cohen from the Herald's Ottawa bureau"? Would that have been the description which would have appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune?

Mr. Balfour: What did they say?

The Chairman: This is Robert Hill, whom they called the Tribune staff correspondent. What would they have called Mr. Cohen?

Mr. Balfour: They would have called him the Tribune staff correspondent, I would say.

Mr. Fortier: My question to you as the President of Southam Press now is: Do you consider this to be good newspaper practice?

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Fortier, this is an error and this happens in the best regulated newspapers. We all dislike them very much.

I have no doubt Mr. Williams and Mr. Swanson will go back having heard this and raise hell.

The Chairman: I think we are frank enough to say if the error had not happened on the coverage of this particular committee, we might not have noticed it.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I am not going to follow that up with other sentences; but on the matter of Southam News Services, I would like to ask a couple of questions, if I may.

Are you satisfied with the Canadian Press coverage of national and international events?

Mr. Balfour: I think Canadian Press coverage of national events is very thorough. Because it is shaded sometimes, the coverage is greyer than it might be if the individual correspondent were writing for an individual newspaper. He has got to write in such a way; the whole thing has to be very, very careful.

Does that answer your question?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: On international coverage as we said here, it is a matter of dollars and cents. It just is not feasible in my opinion for Canadian Press to afford correspondents everywhere in the world to cover news for Canadians. It is filtered in as best they can do within their budget.

In New York, London, Washington, Paris and so on, the news, which is collected by Reuters, A.P. and Agence France Presse filtered through the C.P. bureaus in those cities for the Canadian market, but ideally this news should be written by Canadian because the Canadian angle is sometimes missed because an American or a Frenchman or an Englishman is not as familiar with the Canadian problem.

Mr. Fortier: Is this one of the reasons why Southam News Services exists?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: To complement the Canadian Press in correcting this or supplementing which is the word?

Mr. Munro: I think supplement.

Mr. Fortier: Within the Southam News Services, would it be possible for head offices in Toronto to kill a story emanating, let us say from Ottawa under Mr. Charles Lynch by-line?

Mr. Balfour: It has never happened and I think, as far as I am concerned, it would impossible because the judgment of whether a story goes in or not is the judgment of the publisher and the editor of the paper concerned. We do not become involved in that.

The Chairman: May I, just on that point, say I think Mr. Lynch the day he was here representing himself as a member of the Press Gallery made that clear that nothing like this had ever happened.

I think Mr. Fortier's question was: Could it happen?

Mr. Balfour: No, it could not happen.

I think perhaps I should ask Mr. Munro to answer that question. He is the Chairman of the Publishers Committee of the board of Southam Press, delegated to that committee, having authority to run the News Services. I am from Southam News Services; articles in

Mr. Fortier: How does this work? How do these articles come to be published emanating both by columnists, let us say.

Mr. Munro: I would be pleased to tell the committee this. The News Services have been going for quite a few years. It really started way back in the thirties when Senator Bishop of the Upper House was a member of the News Services and did a remarkably fine job.

It has now developed to where we have 14 men, some of our most highly qualified writers working for S.N.S. That is the way we describe it. There are eight here in Ottawa, there are six other bureaus, and you have the files of the bureaus in the material.

It is run by Charles Lynch as the director of the News Services and Patrick O'Callaghan as the executive editor. He has been there for about ten months.

Now, that is the management, the two of them. Each day writers are assigned to probably the most important and interesting stories or what looks like the most interesting in their particular areas.

These fellows, of course, have to be self-starters; although they get some direction from Ottawa, such as a suggestion that perhaps this Wilson speech should be covered, or some situation in Bonn should be looked at, but each day the writers develop one at least or maybe two stories and they are put on a priority good communications system that we do not have. At night we file over the Canadian Press wire, a setup that Gil Purcell arranged for us before he retired. This is very good. We get a good file at night.

And then in the morning we have a very high speed communications system on a Telex right across the country.

Mr. Fortier: Before these stories are communicated...

Mr. Munro: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Are we to understand it is S.N.S.'s exclusive responsibility to decide whether or not they will be circulated?

Mr. Munro: This is done particularly here in Ottawa by Mr. Lynch and Mr. O'Callaghan.

Mr. Fortier: And they are the sole judges as to whether or not a particular story will be put on the wire.

Mr. Munro: As Chairman of the committee, I have nothing whatsoever to do with that decision. That is a functional, operational decision made right in the bureau and then, of course, when the stories reach the paper, as I said in my brief, the copy is not sacrosanct. I have killed some of Lynch's columns on occasions. I thought he was getting in the libel area. I should explain that.

Mr. Fortier: Did you phone him before killing it?

Mr. Munro: No. I just killed it, but the editor is on the receiving end.

All 11 editors have the freedom, of course, like I have with the Canadian Press, or any other, New York Times editors, to select what you consider the most interesting and significant stories of the day. That is the way it works. I think I have answered your question.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. Did you run Charles Lynch's column on Mr. Malone last week?

Mr. Munro: Oh, with relish, yes. I was with Charles in the days he was talking about.

The Chairman: Do you sell these services to other non-Southam papers?

Mr. Munro: We have investigated this and we have not had much success with it because the cost of these services is very high. If we could recover some of it, it would be very helpful, Senator Davey, but we have not had any takers.

Charles Lynch's column ran, I think, in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix occasionally and in the London Free Press, but the cost of these News Services is getting quite high.

Ten years ago it was about $80,000 a year and now it is crowding $450,000.

The Chairman: I think that the South Star arrangement—perhaps we will return to that. I did not want to ask you about that specifically, but did not Mr. Lynch's column appear for a while in the Toronto Star at the beginning of that arrangement?

Mr. Munro: When Ralph Allen was editor, I think they were...

The Chairman: There were some Lynch columns in the Star.

Mr. Munro: For a period, yes.

The Chairman: May I turn to some of the senators, please, Mr. Fortier, because it is getting late. There are many of the senators who want to ask some questions. I believe Senator Everett is next.

Senator Everett: Mr. Balfour, I wonder if you could tell me of the newspapers which you control which are unionized?

Mr. Balfour: I think they all do in varying degrees, Senator Everett. Some completely, some not as completely. I do not think there is any newspaper which has not at least one union in it—except the North Bay Nugget. There is no union in the North Bay Nugget.

We have a list here if you would like to be more specific.

Senator Everett: No. I would like to take one paper that has all the unions and understand what unions it has and what those unions do.

Mr. Balfour: The Ottawa Citizen, I think, is the most unionized. It has the Guild. It has just been certified by the International Typographical Union although it is still negotiating a contract. It has the stereotypers and the pressmen and mailers.

Senator Everett: The Guild would deal with the editorials.

Mr. Balfour: The Guild, as it was described the other day, is an industrial union and it deals with most of the white collar people in the Citizen. I think the advertising department is not involved.

Senator Everett: The other unions again are...

Mr. Balfour: The International Typographical Union, the Guild, the Stereo and Electro-typer.

Mr. Fisher: There is no pressmen union.

Mr. Balfour: ...and the Mailers Union.

Senator Everett: I am sorry, I did not hear that.

Mr. Balfour: IMU, International Mailers Union.

Senator Everett: This is a very general question but I would be interested to know. Can you tell me some of the practices that these unions indulge in that add to the cost of operating a newspaper? I am thinking especially of excess manning and featherbidding.

Mr. Balfour: Mr. Malone raised these questions the other day and I think they apply to Pacific Press perhaps to some degree.

We have the International Typographical Union in other competitive cities so it does apply there.

Generally speaking our relations with union in our newspapers—and when I say “newspapers” I am not including the print operation—are very good. We have had excellent co-operation in the introduction of mechanization in automation in Hamilton, Winnipeg, Calgary and Edmonton where at the present time, we are in the process of either—have been or are in the process of changing the production processes.

There are, of course, arguments with unions at negotiating time. They want more jobs and we say you can run the press with fewer people. This is part of the normal bargaining process.

Senator Everett: Are there any of the practices which add substantially to the cost of operating a newspaper?

Mr. Balfour: They certainly add to it but I would not say that in our newspapers generally we have these specific problems to which Mr. Malone referred the other day; but I think the individual publishers are in a better position to answer that than I am.

They know what they are, either manning or other problems they have in their plants.

Senator Everett: Then, we will leave it until the individual publishers appear.

In the brief you make a statement, item 18 on page 7, and you say:

"Because this company accepts as a desirable goal an increase in the number of viewpoints being expressed within a community, it established a number of years ago a policy that it would not own or manage more than one mass communications outlet within any single community. As a result of this policy, the company sold, in 1960 the controlling interest in two radio stations, in Calgary and Edmonton. Since that time the company has expanded its total interest in broadcasting but only as an investor—not an operator."

Just dealing with these two stations, as I understand it you still retain 40 per cent of the equity of Calgary and Edmonton.

Mr. Fisher: The answer to that, Senator Everett, is "yes", although I would like to refer you to a statement which appears in the report of the directors. This is in the Annual Report, on page 10 of the Annual Report, which is in the back of the brief, and it reads:

"Some years ago the company established a policy whereby it would not manage or control broadcasting properties in cities where it publishes daily newspapers. In 1960 controlling interests in radio stations in Calgary and Edmonton were sold to Selkirk..."

Text paragraph:

"Since that time Southam's interest in the electronic media has been that of an investor only. The company has not for some years been responsible for the management or operation of any broadcasting property."

Senator Everett: Right.

Mr. Balfour:

"We have now adopted a policy of consolidating, where possible our broadcasting investments. A specific objective is to eliminate those situations in which both this company and Selkirk holds interests in the same properties. Agreement in principle has been reached with Selkirk to this end. Any changes in ownership which result will require the approval of the Canadian Radio Television Commission."

We have negotiated the sale of 40 per cent of Calgary and 40 per cent of Edmonton radio to Selkirk and these will be before the CRTC in due course.

Senator Everett: Let us follow that through then. I understand your company holds 35 per cent interest in CHCH-TV.

Mr. Fisher: That has also been negotiated and that is going before the CRTC in February.

Senator Everett: When you sell that interest, along with the other shareholders, to Selkirk you will hold 30 per cent of the voting shares, I think, and 30 per cent of the equity shares.

Mr. Balfour: Approximately.

Senator Everett: According to our calculations when you sell your 35 per cent of CHCH to Selkirk, you will own 42 per cent of the equity shares of Selkirk?

It would seem to me when you sell 40 per cent of Calgary and 40 per cent of Edmonton, you will be the majority equity shareholder in Selkirk.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Everett: That will bring you...

Mr. Balfour: I am sorry. That would be the case if Selkirk was not using any of its equity of non-voting shares for other purposes, but Selkirk is using treasury shares for other purposes which will result in an increase in the number of treasury shares outstanding, which will reduce our interest in the company.

Senator Everett: Have you any idea to what roughly it will reduce that interest?

Mr. Balfour: If the CRTC approves the sale of Niagara to Selkirk from its present shareholders and the shares of all the other companies in which we now have an interest, and if it approves the other deals which Selkirk has made, one involving CKOY radio in Ottawa and Ottawa Cablevision...

Senator Everett: Do you intend to sell that to Selkirk as well?

Mr. Balfour: We have an interest in CKOY which is being sold to Selkirk.

If the CRTC approves all these arrangements then, depending upon the sequence with which they approve them, and depending on how many shares Selkirk uses for other purposes, we think we are going to end up with about 30 per cent.

Senator Everett: About 30 per cent. What would your high be when you have sold all your interests? Have you calculated that.

Let us assume that there is no issue of treasury shares.

Mr. Balfour: The issue of treasury shares has already been completed. Two hundred and seventy thousand were sold to the public last week.

Senator Everett: Bringing your interest in Selkirk now to what?

Mr. Balfour: I do not know. It could be calculated, but I do not have the figure in my head right now.

Senator Everett: The point I am trying to make is that I realize, or at least I assume—in fact I know—you have been scrupulously careful not to control Selkirk in terms of voting stock.

Mr. Balfour: We have told the CRTC and I have said publicly that we seek neither the control of the shares nor the majority of its equity.

Senator Everett: That was the point I was concerned about. If you get to the point where you own more than 50 per cent of the equity, in a company such as yours that gives wide latitude of freedom to its publishers and editors and subsidiary companies, that would in your terms constitute a broad control.

Even 30 per cent of a company that is holding as wide interests in broadcasting as Selkirk, still in your terms is a form of control.

Mr. Balfour: I do not think so.

Senator Everett: You are very relaxed about your control.

Mr. Balfour: I do not think so, Senator Everett, because Selkirk has a most peculiar share structure. It has got A and B shares. There are only 2,000 B which are issued to a Board of Directors of ten.

Senator Everett: We are aware of that.

Mr. Balfour: And of this we have three on that board, but the others have nothing to do with us. They are quite capable of exercising their own opinions and their own decisions.

Senator Everett: That is often the Southam method, is it not?

Mr. Balfour: I beg your pardon?

Senator Everett: That is often the Southam method. You can put yourself in the operation of a newspaper, for example, of allowing publisher a very wide latitude and, as I see, you are very relaxed about it.

Mr. Balfour: I do not think the analogy the same in this other company, the majority of the directors of which are not Southam directors.

Mr. Fisher: It is an interesting business hypothesis, senator, that the more relaxed the minority shareholder is the more control has over the company. I think this is a very interesting thing.

Senator Everett: I thought it was rather interesting too.

Senator Prowse: That is why he is relaxed.

Senator Everett: Nevertheless...

Mr. Balfour: Perhaps it could be said that the B shares...

Senator Everett: I just wonder if you were not begging the question by having such enormous equity interest?

Mr. Balfour: Because we are keeping about 30 per cent, I do not think we are begging the question. We were 30 per cent when Selkirk was formed and we have just kept it at about that level and as recently last week or the week before last, we had called offering us a large block of shares and said "No".

Senator Everett: And these treasury shares will be issued to the general public, will they?

Mr. Balfour: I do not know the details of that.

Mr. Fisher: They are going to the general public, senator, in the sense that they are going—as far as I know—to any existing shareholders of Selkirk.

It is not a public issue in the full Securities Exchange definition of the term in that they are being offered to a limited group of institutions which presumably have them in quite large lumps.

I have been told they were sold successfully very quickly. I do not know who bought them.

Senator Everett: Are you contemplating a secondary offering or is it just the dilution?

truth of the issue of more treasury shares which you held?

Mr. Balfour: That particular transaction was a dilution of our interest because of the increased number of treasury shares issued.

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: We are not contemplating a secondary offer, no.

Senator Everett: It is your policy to maintain a 30 per cent equity interest, but no more.

Mr. Balfour: About that.

Mr. Fisher: I do not think we would continue at 30 per cent exactly.

Mr. Balfour: But that is where it has been for a number of years.

Senator Everett: Well, we are looking into definite future now and you are talking 30 per cent?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Everett: As an objective now?

Mr. Balfour: That is bringing it down to 30 per cent, yes.

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: Perhaps we could put it on record. The B shares which are really all voting shares that the directors own are transferred only with the approval of the CTC.

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Munro, in your brief you say "I am convinced that it might be advisable to establish regional councils." You are talking about press councils.

"I would not be unhappy about a Western Press Council. It could wear a hair shirt for us all and we would take our lumps if and when we deserved them. There is a lingering question of how practical it would be. Would the public be any better protected and would they get better newspapers?"

Now do you see this Western Regional Press Council being formed, under what agency?

Mr. Munro: You are familiar with the structure of the British Press Council?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Munro: There are representatives of the public. There is probably a lay chairman, representative of the newspaper business. There is no representative from the government. Probably if it is going to work at all, it has to be absolutely free of Government participation and it is financed by the newspapers.

Senator Everett: Will the constitution be developed by the newspapers?

Mr. Munro: Along the lines of the British Press Council. They have been in business for quite a few years now. Their structure seems to work. Whether the net result is effective is open to argument, but the problem about the Western Press Council—it is a very hypothetical suggestion of mine.

Frank Watson and I have talked about it. Fred Malone and F.P. are so opposed to it, you could not get their participation probably. You could not very well have a Press Council that does not serve the public in all aspects.

Senator Everett: What we are interested in is your view at this stage more than its practicality.

I noticed Mr. Williams in his brief said:

"Despite this conviction about the integrity of newspapers as a whole, I would favour the establishment of a Press Council along the lines in Britain. It would be reassuring to the public to have an assessment of an independent party."

Would you go that far?

Mr. Munro: I have still got some doubts. I do not quite agree with Mr. Williams to that degree, no.

As I say, I am not convinced of this yet. I think the people in our business have to do an awful lot more talking about it. They only started to talk about this thing within the past year or year and a half to any degree.

Senator Everett: Mr. Balfour, you say in item 46:

"On balance, it would seem that the establishment of a court of appeal in the form of a Press Council modelled on the British example would enhance, rather than harm, the reputation of a responsible newspaper and its editors. We would oppose one established by government because it would become a creature of government."

Do you then agree with Mr. Williams' opinion?

Mr. Balfour: Generally I think that a press council would serve a useful purpose. I think a court of appeal would take the heat off newspapers. I think in rare circumstances it might have to deal with a complaint and issue censure.

Generally speaking, I think it would justify the position taken by the individual newspapers. I also think it has a second major value and that is in the defence of the freedom of the press against the Government at all levels.

Within the last week the British Press Council has been attacking vigorously some legislative proposals in the British House of Commons because in its judgment these will infringe on the rights of the press.

I think it is very much easier for the public to accept an independent judgment of a press council which is not preaching in favour of special interest than it is for a government to accept the screams from newspapers who may be preaching to protect themselves.

Senator Everett: How would you overcome the difficulty of which Mr. Malone speaks in establishing a press council? That is, Mr. Malone's opposition in this particular instance.

Mr. Balfour: I have no answer to that. We have talked about it in Ontario. There would have to be a large enough number of newspapers ready to support it to make it work, and if it worked then I think the others who aren't willing to participate now might feel later that they should join.

I think public pressure might make them change their minds.

Senator Everett: So it could be started in this way.

Mr. Balfour: I think that is the only way. My personal hope is that the one they have been working on in Quebec will be established and then it will show that it performs a useful purpose and it will show how this can be done, the mechanics of it, and then we can perhaps learn from them.

Senator Everett: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Sparrow: In your brief at item number 58 you refer to the Associated Press Managing Editors Content Committee and its Sections A, B, C and D, you briefly outline their findings of the criticism given to the press in the United States.

Perhaps I should read it into the record.

"A. Editorial prejudice shown by placement of stories, size of headline, unbalanced story content and length of stories, particularly in coverage of political events.

B. Half told stories resulting from poor standards of reportorial research into the background of news stories.

C. Too succinct, imprecise, misleading or inaccurate headlines.

D. Over-attention to sensational news of violence and insufficient attention to serious news of community-wide consequence."

Now, you did not elaborate in that particular section as to whether you agree that this is in fact true in Canada, and would you have any comments on that?

Do the reading public in Canada generally feel that this is the case?

Mr. Munro: Senator Sparrow, I refer to that in my brief—as a matter of fact, I use some quotes from that report, and I said does apply in some degree in Canada.

If we get criticism like this on a daily paper, we try to reduce them and limit them as much as possible, but we get them.

This is a daily struggle on any newsroom operations to avoid and limit this sort of thing. Really they focus right on some of the major problems.

Senator Sparrow: So if a survey were conducted in Canada, you would assume similar findings would be reached?

Mr. Munro: Rather similar comments would be made. I would think probably when you take our 100-odd papers and compare them with 100 similar ones in the States, I think probably you would get a better reaction about public reaction from the Canadian side. Some of the American papers are really pretty bad and we have very few bad ones.

Senator Sparrow: You are quoted, Mr. Munro, as saying:

"Charges of a credibility gap between newspapers and the public are painful."

disconcerting, says Ross Munro, publisher of the Edmonton Journal.

Mr. Munro told the annual Newspaper in the Classroom seminar in Edmonton: "The most biting lash that ever falls across my back is when some thoughtless soul makes the sweeping generalization, 'You can't believe what you read in the papers...'"

Mr. Munro added that coping with such statements gets a person into tangled arguments for 'we all realize there are plenty of statements we don't believe that are printed every day in newspapers, in magazines, or heard and seen on the air.'

"He said that he did not believe in, put much trust in, or have faith in many statements made by politicians."

Isn't that a rather sweeping generalization out which you are critical in the paragraph and that statement you expect the public to believe this?

Mr. Munro: This is one of the lashes that comes on his back. I was using that as an example because public life and political life is controversial. People make statements here every day in the House of Commons and the Senate that I do not necessarily have to believe in but we report them. That was the point I was making.

The reader sitting out there—we print material, speeches, and all kinds of different things. We do not expect him to believe it all because he has his own opinions to form. All we can offer is maybe a presentation of what people are saying and lay out the options as they become available to us, but the cold presentation of what you believe in the paper, it is wide open.

That is the point I was making to the teachers. You will excuse me if you think I was attacking politicians totally—not at all.

Senator Sparrow: You still agree with that statement that you made, that you do not put much trust or much faith in the statements of politicians?

Mr. Munro: No. I think that is not exactly in the context of the total speech, if you do not mind me saying that.

Senator Prowse: You have been misquoted.

Mr. Munro: I did not say that.

Senator Sparrow: In item 55 you say:

"We do claim that our function is best performed by people who have no political, business, or other special interests..."

Do you have in your group what you call Liberal and Conservative newspapers, or at least newspapers in some instances who take editorial stands?

Mr. Balfour: Yes, indeed.

Senator Sparrow: How do you relate that to your statement?

Mr. Balfour: I think we are talking here about the ownership of newspapers.

Mr. Fisher: I think perhaps we are talking...

Mr. Balfour: You have asked the question, senator, whether we have Liberal or Conservative newspapers. I guess you will have to ask the publishers and editorial staffs of those newspapers as to whether they consider themselves Liberal or Conservative.

I think perhaps most of them would answer by saying they are all independent personally, but from time to time subscribe to and support given candidates for political seats, or parties.

Senator Sparrow: If a newspaper is considered through its background a Liberal newspaper, do you try and maintain that tradition as such so that the editor or publisher who would come in would be—if it was a Liberal paper—of Liberal thinking or Liberal background?

Mr. Balfour: Are you asking: Do we ask him his politics before we appoint him?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. Balfour: No.

Mr. Fisher: Nor do we seek any pledge from a publisher as to what politics he is going to pursue, and of course they change them.

Senator Sparrow: Have you any examples of a newspaper changing from being traditionally Liberal to Conservative?

Mr. Munro: The Journal is a good example. We are right in Tory country almost. It was pretty solid Tory. In the last election we came out, after a lot of thinking, because it was an interesting decision, and supported Mr. Trudeau and the Liberal party.

They had supported another Liberal some time in the past, but generally it has been Tory for many, many years, and when I was at the...

The Chairman: Excuse me. Did that decision cost you some readers?

Mr. Munro: No, it did not, not that I am aware of.

The Chairman: The point being that John Bassett when he was here said his 1963 switch cost him 10,000 readers and the Globe and Mail also switched in 1963 and said it did not cost them any readers so I was curious to see what had happened in Edmonton.

Mr. Munro: No, it was not noticeable or discernible at the time.

The Chairman: What about in Winnipeg?

Mr. Munro: In Winnipeg, it has been traditionally—Ron Williams will be here this afternoon and if you do not mind, I would rather make no comment about this.

The Chairman: I wanted to ask Senator Sparrow how many more questions he has?

Senator Sparrow: Just a couple of short ones.

The Chairman: Are there any other senators that would like to ask questions?

Senator Beaubien: I have one, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Prowse: I want to ask one question. I would like to ask it of Mr. Munro, because he is here now.

The Chairman: It does not apply to this afternoon?

Senator Prowse: No. It applies to a particular situation in the Edmonton Journal which I think would be of interest.

The Chairman: It being five minutes past one, I am wondering and I am going to suggest that we adjourn now until 2.30 p.m., subject to the committee's feelings, and at 2.30 p.m. we perhaps take half an hour, from 2.30 to 3 o'clock and then rather arbitrarily at 3 o'clock we will turn to the discussion of the newspapers.

Would that meet everyone's approval because in a sense if we try to finish now we will be through the lunch hour.

I would suggest we come back at 2.30 p.m. and have Senator Beaubien, Senator Sparrow and then Senator Prowse ask their questions and then at 3 o'clock we will turn to the papers.

The Committee adjourned at 1.05 p.m.

(Upon resuming at 2.30 p.m.)

...Continuation of Southam Press Limited.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call this session back in order, I would remind the senators that before we proceed to the questioning that I am most anxious to terminate the Southam Press Limited part of the presentation by 3 o'clock, although I am sure Mr. Balfour and his confreres will be here for the rest of the afternoon and available for questions. As far as the formal presentation is concerned, I would think that we might terminate in half an hour.

When we adjourned I think Senator Sparrow was asking some questions.

Senator Sparrow: I have just two short ones for explanation purposes. In number 53 of your brief you refer to pressure groups. How do you define a pressure group as it affects a newspaper?

Mr. Balfour: Senator Sparrow, I think the committee in its questionnaire to us referred to pressure groups. This is merely an answer to say there were no pressure groups exerting any pressure at the corporate level. The individual newspapers have to answer for themselves.

Senator Sparrow: You didn't really define it as such. The guidelines did not define it as such either.

Mr. Balfour: There are none of any kind—political, economic, or from our customers.

Senator Sparrow: All right. In the Guidelines for Briefs there is a question "Is there an establishment which controls the mass media in Canada or any one of the media?" Now "establishment" was not explained there and I believe in 48 you answer the question directly:

"In the generally accepted definition of the term there is no establishment that controls mass media in Canada or any one of the media."

What would your definition of the "establishment" be there?

Mr. Balfour: Of the power elite.

Senator Sparrow: Yes. Any further explanation other than that? What power elite?

Mr. Balfour: Have you any further definitions...

Mr. Munro: I suppose you are defining an establishment, and presumably there are many, as being a group of people that have similar background and come from the same sort of economic strata such as almost a family relationship...

Senator Sparrow: A family compact?

Mr. Munro: Your word, senator, not mine. We have found it easier to answer the question because you used the term and we didn't.

The Chairman: I would like to quote Desmond Morton in the Canadian Forum on this point. You have heard me make this quotation before. . . "It does not matter whether the North Bay Nugget belongs to Roy Thomson, Max Bell or the local drygoods merchant. They are all without a single exception in the same kind of hands. They all belong to the Canadian business community and they all do what that community wants."

Do you agree with that statement?

Mr. Balfour: I think, in that newspapers are business, that we all belong to the Canadian business community.

The Chairman: The CLC charged you fellows with a conspiracy of silence. Would you comment on that in regard to your activity?

Mr. Balfour: I would deny it emphatically. Our larger newspapers have labour columnists. I think the CLC mentioned in its brief the Vancouver Province columnist. I know the Hamilton Spectator has one. That perhaps you could pursue further if you wish, sir, with the individual publishers.

The Chairman: Thank you. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: You referred to Southam fellowships. How many fellowships per year are you referring to?

Mr. Balfour: Five, I think.

Mr. Munro: We don't stipulate a number but there have been five each year for the last seven years.

The Chairman: The other day I asked F. P. about the Globe and Mail about mastheads and so on and I gather the fact that your paper belongs to the Southam Company is on the masthead.

Mr. Munro: In every case, I believe.

The Chairman: How long has that been the practice?

Mr. Munro: For ten years, I believe.

The Chairman: It is an old established...

Mr. Munro: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett had some questions.

Senator Everett: Mr. Balfour, do you know whether Selkirk is buying Quebec Telemedia from Power Corp.?

Mr. Balfour: I know it is not.

Senator Everett: Is Mr. Beaubien buying it?

Mr. Balfour: I think you would have to ask him, sir.

Senator Everett: Yes. This issue of 275,000 shares which was privately placed, does that have anything to do with Quebec Telemedia?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Senator Everett: I notice in item 52 page 18 you make the statement:

"It may be observed generally that while the advertising ratio tends to increase directly with the volume of advertising, the absolute amount of reading matter tends to increase also. One need not labour the point that there is more reading matter in a newspaper which averages 70 pages with 60 per cent advertising than one which averages 16 pages with 40 per cent advertising."

Would that be a form of argument for one-newspaper-cities—that we might be better served in terms of news content?

Mr. Balfour: I have never thought of it as an argument. It doesn't appeal to me as an argument.

Senator Everett: It would seem to me that in a one-newspaper-city the news hole could be larger.

Mr. Balfour: I think that would not be the case, sir.

Senator Everett: Taking this...

Mr. Balfour: You have two newspapers and therefore you get the news content of two newspapers in relation...

Senator Everett: There would be a lot of duplication in them.

Mr. Balfour: There might be, but not necessarily so.

Senator Everett: What you are saying is a paper that averages 70 pages with 60 per cent advertising contains more than the one that averages 16 pages with 40 per cent advertising?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Everett: So that would lead one to believe the one newspaper town would more likely be able to carry the pages of advertising.

Mr. Balfour: Let's look at Winnipeg. I think the percentage in the Free Press is something over 60 per cent and the percentage in the Tribune is somewhere between 50 to 55 per cent. In the aggregate I think you are getting more than you would with a great big Free Press. Instead of having Eaton's in two newspapers you would have the same amount of Eaton's, or perhaps a little bit more, in one newspaper. In the aggregate you would not get as much reading matter.

Senator Everett: I have two other points. One is to congratulate Southams on item 56, Training and Education. I don't think I need to ask questions on that. There is one small question on item 58 where you say that there is criticism by the public that headlines were too succinct. I would think that is what a headline should be.

Mr. Balfour: Yes. I am only quoting from somebody else here. Headlines should be succinct; I agree.

Senator Everett: That is all, thank you.

Senator Prowse: Was that a series of headings taken from a questionnaire?

Mr. Balfour: I took it from a report.

Senator Prowse: An American report that had a whole flock of things?

Mr. Balfour: These were some of them, yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Fisher, what happened to the weekly paper you bought when you bought the Gazette? Is it still functioning?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

The Chairman: Where is it?

Mr. Fisher: The lakeshore.

The Chairman: Is it a paid publication?

Mr. Fisher: Do you mean do the subscribers pay for it, yes.

The Chairman: Is it not just a community neighbourhood shopping news?

Mr. Fisher: No.

The Chairman: It serves that community?

Mr. Fisher: Yes, I believe so.

The Chairman: Would you analogize that position there with the position of the Star and Telegram in Toronto with community weeklies they own in the environs of Toronto?

Mr. Fisher: I think the motives that led the previous owners of the Gazette to make the investment were essentially the same motive as the Star and Telegram.

The Chairman: And presumably the motives for you sustaining its operation?

Mr. Balfour: We are not sustaining the operation. It is self-sustaining.

Mr. Fisher: We found no argument for shutting it down.

The Chairman: What is the circulation?

Mr. Fisher: Seven thousand odd.

The Chairman: Where is it printed?

Mr. Fisher: At the Gazette.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse, do you have any questions?

Senator Prowse: Yes. I would like to ask Mr. Balfour a question first.

In the matter of the independence of the publishers, how are the publishers appointed to the papers?

Mr. Balfour: I am glad you asked that.

Senator Prowse: I thought you might like to ask that.

Mr. Balfour: The publishers are appointed by the board of directors of Southam Press, firstly on the recommendation of those of the head office in consultation with an executive committee.

Senator Prowse: Of the board of directors?

Mr. Balfour: Of the board of directors. And the appointment is confirmed by the board.

Senator Prowse: And then are they given a contract or do they hold appointment at the pleasure of the directors?

Mr. Balfour: I don't think anyone has a contract—at the pleasure.

Senator Prowse: So that they are in the position where the board of directors might at any time decide to dispense with their services?

Mr. Balfour: This is true.

Senator Prowse: There have been occasions where you have, I believe. I think the Citizen some years ago...

Mr. Balfour: No, sir. I think the publisher of the Citizen may have discharged an editor of the Citizen. I can think of two instances where publishers have been removed from office, and in both cases it was because of behaviour and not because of anything to do with their performance, their editorial performance or anything like that.

Senator Prowse: But the power would be in the board of directors at any time to replace any publisher?

Mr. Balfour: The power would be there in the board of directors. The board of directors is 17 people composed of employed and non-employed directors; five of the publishers are on that board and if there was any arbitrary move to dismiss Ross Munro I think there would be five votes right off the bat to defend him.

Senator Prowse: The point I am getting at is effective control of the conduct of the group, or the individual papers in the group, that is in the hands of men who are themselves responsible for the direction of individual sections of the group. Is this correct?

Mr. Balfour: Not at all, sir. There are 17 on the board and if I might refresh my memory for head office, five publishers, senior executive of the printing company, senior executive of the business publications company, roughly seven non-employed directors.

Senator Prowse: There are seven non-employed?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Prowse: As against five who are employed?

Mr. Balfour: No, sir. Nine employed directors at the moment. We try to maintain a balance between inside and outside directors. At the moment it is slightly down and probably by the next appointment it will come back in again.

Senator Prowse: When you say "we" who do you mean?

Mr. Balfour: The board.

Senator Prowse: So this is really a group of newspapers that are run where the weight of authority is in the hands of the publishers of those individual units. Would that be correct?

Mr. Balfour: Publishers and their associates, because this includes Gordon Fisher as a director, and I am a director, and neither of us are publishers.

Senator Prowse: No. What I am getting at is this: there was a suggestion made by one group that appeared before us that it might be a useful thing to maintain independence of the press if the decision as to whether publishers could be hired and fired and senior people could be hired and fired would be determined by the editorial staff themselves. If you get down too low it gets to be a form of internal politics and leaves everybody confused and perhaps a little worried. I was wondering if in your organization, from what you had said, that out of your 19 votes on the board of directors nine are in the hands of men who are themselves publishers of newspapers, then it would appear to me there are nine votes there as against seven devoted clearly to the business side of it, and they therefore carry the weight?

Mr. Balfour: Not exactly, sir, because there are only five actual publishers and there are four of us who are in the corporate office.

Senator Prowse: I see. And then there are seven others, people who have purely a business interest?

Mr. Balfour: Two other employed directors; one who is the senior officer of the printing subsidiary and one of whom is the senior officer of the business publications subsidiary.

Senator Prowse: One more question, you see your publishers once every three months; did you tell us?

Mr. Balfour: We meet as a board with them once every three months. I see them oftener than that because I am roaming around the country.

Senator Prowse: They are continually being visited by people from the head office?

Mr. Balfour: Yes. They are coming down to the east and they come in and spend a couple of hours or half a day with us.

Senator Prowse: How often do you get your financial report?

Mr. Balfour: Every month.

Senator Prowse: And somebody at head office does look over those?

Mr. Balfour: I do.

Senator Prowse: That is your concern. Now, in the matter of concentration, I notice that in the Province of Alberta 77.7 per cent of the people who buy newspapers in the Province of Alberta, daily newspapers in the Province of Alberta, buy a Southam paper.

Mr. Balfour: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: That is a pretty high degree of concentration.

Mr. Balfour: Yes, sir. It is fortuitous in a way and it is historic. The Calgary Herald was purchased in 1908 when Calgary was a very small town and when the Herald was a very small paper. The same thing in Edmonton in 1912. In each case there was and in one case there still is competition. If our papers have grown I think it is because they were good.

Senator Prowse: Now we get to the point of the variety of voice and you don't have a head office policy, or do you, in this regard, in order to try and maintain a variety of voices?

Mr. Balfour: Sir, I think there is a variety of voices in Alberta. I am sure you know that the Herald and the Journal do not necessarily agree.

Senator Prowse: And do not necessarily circulate in the same area either?

Mr. Balfour: No; but you mentioned the whole province and said we had 77 per cent of the province.

Senator Prowse: Of course in Edmonton you have 100 per cent.

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Senator Prowse: So I was giving you the benefit of the addition.

Mr. Balfour: Thank you very much.

Senator Prowse: Now having set that background I would like to move to Mr. Munro because I think the Journal has been concerned with this question.

The Chairman: I don't want to transgress on the time of the other publishers or on the time of Mr. Balfour and the Southam presentation. On the other hand, I think that Senator Prowse has been very fair in waiting to ask that question.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Munro, what steps what experiments have you made; what steps did you take and what is being done and what is your opinion as to the state of the other voices being provided to the newspaper reading public in the City of Edmonton and its environs taking in everything from north of Carstairs in the Province.

Mr. Munro: Mr. Chairman, there is a very definite policy and effort made in this area to provide opportunities for people who dissent or disagree, or have opinions that vary with ours, or with the Government, or anybody else. To have these opinions aired in the newspaper one of the more interesting experiments was taken a few years ago by my predecessor the late Basil Dean and he introduced the "Journal for Dissent." This is a full page generally opposite the editorial page and it ran three times a week, and they invited articles from various people in the community; they paid for them. It was quite a success and it caused a lot of interest, and I think was a very fine move because it did give relief to people who felt their views were not being properly heard.

Like a lot of features these things waned and this one did. The articles became less pointed, some of them were just trivia and shrunken to twice a week, and once a week, and just about the time I got to the Journal nearly two years ago it was just in its last days.

It is sometimes hard to sustain something like this in a relatively small city. This is not a big Canadian city, not like Toronto where the Star can do quite an interesting experiment in the off-ed page inviting people rite in. With two million population they have lots of people who will contribute.

I cannot really explain the demise of this special feature in any other way than it just tapers out. Now what we do is pretty orthodox, but it seems to work. We devote a lot of space to letters to the editor, not just on the editorial page, but if you are looking at the Journal you will see the editorial page is not the total amount and sometimes there are two or three columns in the paper. We have lots of letters to the editor on any subject.

I think I mentioned earlier that censorship of these letters is not very severe. We have to watch to protect ourselves against libel and obscenity, and things like this, and just straight kookiness, but we have an off-ed page of a full eight columns. It started last September and it is opposite the editorial page. We are getting more and more articles of that page. Where a person writes a long letter we will turn it into an article and we can play it better and use some art and good words and things like that. That is what we are doing now. Of course, if there is a lot of protest and dissent opinion it can be made into a news story. For instance, if a Cabinet minister racks us over—we don't get along too well with the Social Credit government. They feel they are being beleaguered by the press of Alberta and I think it is unjustified, we are questioning and inquiring. If a Cabinet minister makes a strong attack on us, this will probably wind up as a news story on the first page.

Now everything can be improved, but I am reasonably well satisfied the Journal is giving good exposure to dissent in this area.

Senator Prowse: Now I imagine you follow a format that we have had explained to us before that you have editorial meetings, I think every morning, with your editorial board?

Mr. Munro: Editorial page...

Senator Prowse: Editorial page people, the fellows that write the opinion stories.

Mr. Munro: Yes, we meet every morning.

Senator Prowse: You discuss things back and forth and you come to a consensus, or do somebody say "This is what you are going to write today."?

Mr. Munro: When you get four or five people it is very hard to get a consensus.

Some people will opt out. In general terms the majority opinion will prevail. Sometimes the editor will intervene and say "I think you are all wrong. I think we should go down this route."

I don't get there every day, but I get there quite regularly. It is a great way to keep in touch with what is going on in the community because these fellows are all over the place and sometimes I direct a line that I think we should be taking, but it is not very arbitrary. I haven't been very arbitrary here or in any other papers. You don't have to be.

Senator Prowse: Let us suppose this situation where you have one of these meetings and you are going to be in favour of a ring road, to take an illustration. One of these fellows says "I am opposed to it. I am not going to write that." Now what happens? Does he get to write the ring road?

Mr. Munro: I think it is general on our papers we don't compel an editorial writer to write an editorial that he has no conviction about.

Senator Prowse: The Globe and Mail said that their men were professionals and it was very, very seldom they reached a point where a fellow did not say "All right. If this is what you want I will write it." You don't follow that policy?

Mr. Munro: It would not arise very often. If it did I would not instruct the man to write it, no. That is a curious approach. Our people are professional too, but I would think it offensive to a professional person to tell him to do something he doesn't believe in.

Senator Prowse: I wanted to hear the other side of the question. Then do you ever ask a fellow who dissents strongly, and presumably represents a certain element of public opinion, then to write his own opinion—not as an editorial for the paper, but his own expression of opinion for the off-ed page? Have you ever done that?

Mr. Munro: Yes, I have done it. I can't think of it, not recently, but I have done it. It is a good technique. I can think of one classic example when I was at the Province during the Suez episode. The paper took a stand in favour of British policy, which was gunboat diplomacy. There was a writer on the staff, very well known in the country, and he was outraged at this. We ran a piece on the off-ed page and I don't think we ever received more letters in the history of the Province. We were deluged. He took the Egyptian—anti-British line. It stirred the whole town up. That is one example.

Senator Prowse: Would there be a useful purpose where you have a one-newspaper town, which is becoming an increasing problem to freedom of the press, actually could there be devised a process whereby a newspaper—where there is one paper in a community and where they could afford to do it, which most of the larger papers could, to set up two editorial pages—an on-page and an off-page? In other words, the fors and agins and argue with themselves. In other words, present the two opposing opinions on opposite sides of the page so the people could read both points of view. Is too much of a dream to work?

Mr. Munro: I think it might be a dream. It looks like it might be an interesting solution to this kind of problem, but I don't think it would be too practical. Nobody would know what the paper stood for to start with. I think we have to give certain leadership in a community.

Senator Prowse: When you talk about what the paper stands for, I was reading on page 4, of the Journal brief:

"At times the Journal's voice is deliberately muted because it would be an abuse of our editorial power to be strident in some local situations where there are sharp clashes of opinion."

Now is it not possible that you contribute to public apathy and leave the impression that the subject cannot really be that important by remaining muted when you might create a more useful dialogue by saying "We cannot agree on this but here are what two of our men think." Or, "Here are two points of view."

Mr. Munro: Yes; introduce two points of view, yes.

Senator Prowse: Rather than be muted?

Mr. Munro: Well, that was a reference to the situation that existed very, very seldom. I don't think we very often back away from something. Sometimes in a community there is an inflammatory situation and probably it is more prudent and in the public interest not to intrude at that point. You might do it at a later time. Sometimes you delay your comment, and I think that is fair enough. Like this reference to the Eaton's story. I think the Globe and Mail said: "Sure, we are going to do it but we are going to find out what it all about." We can't all chase ambulances the way we used to. I hope those days are over.

Senator Prowse: Well if you had another paper in town and they were chasing ambulances you would too?

Mr. Munro: I am not so sure. I think would keep going the same way we are and try and improve the solid news content of the paper, particularly improve the news we are carrying.

Senator Prowse: If you had two papers wouldn't you or the news editor be reading the first edition of the other paper to see that everything that was in it was in yours?

Mr. Munro: Yes, we would give another paper a real run.

Senator Prowse: And if they chased ambulances you would too? Would you say that one newspaper has made for more responsible journalism?

Mr. Munro: I find it quite a burden, as mentioned earlier. In a sense you can argue that the excesses of competition are sometimes quite severe. I don't think they are great as in the past. I am thinking of Toronto 20 years ago. That was a pretty wild fight all the way news was played then was astonishing at times.

Senator Prowse: Have you any way as publisher of knowing in a one-newspaper town whether the fellows are doing a job covering the news?

Mr. Munro: Yes. You catch the devil from the public if you don't cover the community and when we fall down we hear about it. We really hear about it.

Senator Prowse: How do you hear?

Mr. Munro: I get it generally on the phone. I have an open line and anybody can reach me and they can reach me at home. I list a number which is a dangerous thing to do.

Senator Prowse: Thank you very much, Mr. Munro.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Balfour, I was very interested in your answers, as well as Mr. Fisher to Senator Everett's questions on broadcast and your interest in Selkirk. In view of your declaration of principle in the brief which as read in fact into the record by Senator Everett this morning, and in view of what I would have to term your very substantial interest in Selkirk, I must ask you this question: Why did you—and when I say “you” I mean you as a corporate entity dealing mainly with publishing of newspapers—why did you invest in broadcasting companies?

Mr. Balfour: I think the answer to that, sir, is that we are involved in communications and this is one of the facets of communications. We have deliberately limited ourselves to the field of communications but therefore are ranging over the field and not confining ourselves to one aspect of that field or one facet of that field.

Mr. Fortier: In one facet, the written press, you own and control; in another press, the electronic press, you just invest?

Mr. Balfour: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Fortier: Indeed you consider it such an important investment, as indeed it is, that you have had since 1967 a vice president who is in charge of broadcasting. Is that not so? Mr. Michael Harrison?

Mr. Balfour: Yes. This was probably, in retrospect, probably the wrong title.

Mr. Fortier: What does he do now in retrospect?

Mr. Balfour: He keeps his eye on what is going on in the broadcasting field, but he mainly now is looking into the new areas of communication which may develop.

Mr. Fortier: The facsimile press and cable television, this sort of thing?

Mr. Balfour: Data—whatever you call it—all that sort of thing.

Mr. Fortier: Would he in any way in view of his title—and if his title is misleading please say so—would he have particular responsibility for how Selkirk, for example, is running?

Mr. Balfour: No; not any more than Gordon Fisher here, who is also a director.

Mr. Fortier: So his main responsibility is to keep an eye on Southam's investment in Selkirk?

Mr. Balfour: No.

Mr. Fisher: May I clarify the answer a little bit? I think we have felt in meeting our responsibility to our shareholders that we have to keep our minds open to the possibility that the technology of communications may change. That is not a particularly brilliant observation because it very obviously is changing. One of the reasons we are interested in broadcasting as an investment is because of the obvious possibility (in our brief we don't foresee it in the next ten years) the very obvious possibility that the backroom boys may come up with some new method of laying down the type of news that is our business in the homes of people who are subscribers. We would certainly want to reserve the right, and we would argue very strongly that as newspaper publishers we should be extended the right, I think, of making sure that if there is a more efficient way of selling our product to our customers we want to protect that possibility.

Mr. Fortier: If that day arrived, and as you say in your opinion it is not within the next ten years, but if it did arrive have you considered whether you would be seeking a station on a cable network or would you use a common carrier?

Mr. Fisher: Well, it is hard now to define a hypothetical case that might exist 15 to 20 years from now. I think we would be prepared to argue that a cable broadcaster, who is some future cable broadcaster and who has the future technology of laying down our product, should extend to us the rights that he would extend to anybody else to use his common carrier facilities.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to say that with that thought in mind you are protecting your investment in Selkirk to hedge against that possibility?

Mr. Fisher: Yes; that is one of the thoughts. “Hedge” is the right word, I think.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if we could apply our mind to the Southstar Publishers Limited in which you own 50 per cent equity interest with the Toronto Star. I would ask you, Mr. Balfour if you could tell us how Southstar is run? Who has the deciding voice?

Mr. Balfour: Southstar is run as a corporation. Ed Mannion is the President and Chief Executive Officer. The Toronto Star has a 50 per cent interest as we have. In this particular case there is provision, should there be a major disagreement between the shareholders, for dissolution of the company.

Mr. Fortier: There is?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Does anyone have a preponderant voice at the moment?

Mr. Balfour: No. I should clarify that. We have increased the board of directors to nine. Actually the president of the company, who is an employee of the company, theoretically holds the balance of power.

Mr. Fortier: Are there any parallels to be drawn between this situation and the Pacific Press situation in Vancouver?

Mr. Balfour: I don't think so. I think the situation is entirely different. We are publishing a supplement there, not two different supplements, but one supplement which is appearing in our own newspapers and in the Toronto Star, and a number of other newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: I would go one step further. There is Magna Media Limited?

Mr. Balfour: That is advertising sales.

Mr. Fortier: Advertising sales only.

The Chairman: How about production? Is there not some joint production arrangement?

Mr. Balfour: We have a contract with Montreal Standard. We have nothing to do with their company.

The Chairman: But the Montreal Star will print both the Weekend and Canadian and the sales force of Weekend and Canadian will be common.

Mr. Balfour: That is correct.

The Chairman: Would it be unfair then to say there is no longer any competition in the weekend rotogravure field in Canada?

Mr. Balfour: I think it would not be true. There is certainly competition on the editorial end and the terms under which this company operates permit us to spend our budget, our editorial budget, and Montreal Standard to spend its editorial budget. I am trying to remember what the safety valve is. I think I am correct in saying that we each prepare a budget and the larger budget is the one which is accepted.

The Chairman: I am not sure I understand you.

Mr. Balfour: Well, Montreal Standard—the Weekend magazine—says it is going to cost a million dollars for the editorial product in 1970, and the canadian says it is going to spend $1,200,000 in 1970. Weekend may spend up to $1,200,000.

The Chairman: Why not merge them completely?

Mr. Balfour: Because we want to have two voices.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Balfour: Because we are in different papers. We are not appearing...

The Chairman: Not in the same community. You are in different papers?

Mr. Balfour: Yes.

The Chairman: I was going to say to Senators that we will be having the weekend papers coming before our committee in course of things and I don't want to spin discussion out endlessly but for my understanding, Mr. Mannion is in complete control of Southstar?

Mr. Balfour: Chief Executive Officer of Southstar.

The Chairman: Well, I have other questions for another time.

Mr. Fortier: Does Southstar actively sell new newspapers in competition with Montreal Standard?

Mr. Balfour: It certainly has and presumably will go after ones which are not carrying either.

Mr. Fortier: And you were doing that in competition with the Montreal Standard.

The Chairman: What was the philosophy behind the Magna Media development? What was the reason for it?

Mr. Balfour: Would you like to answer that one?

Mr. Fisher: To clarify the point, there were two aspects to the arrangement. One was Magna Media, the joint selling of advertising. I think the rationale for that was both magazines came to the conclusion, which I have no doubt was the correct one, that they were really competing with the other because they were not selling the same audiences, they were competing with other media for advertising, and the most effective way to sell the virtues of weekend rotogravure supplements to those advertisers was to get together and make a stronger pitch.

Now there is no suggestion here of a combined sell, and the advertiser could buy one or the other or both. So much for the advertising selling. That is Magna Media.

The rationale for the printing contract for Canadian magazine going to the Montreal Standard Publishing Company was simple. They were the cheapest printers for that publication and we were interested, Southstar was interested in buying at the lowest price. They had the printing plant with the capacity to do it and it just made good sense.

The Chairman: In the realm of advertising through Magna Media you don't offer packages?

Mr. Balfour: There are no package prices. Am I right on that?

Mr. Fisher: I haven't seen any rate card on Weekend magazine and Canadian magazine. The advertiser has the choice of whether he wants one or the other or both.

Mr. Fortier: In all three instances dealing with the same salesmen?

Mr. Fisher: Yes.

The Chairman: There is no discount for buying both as against buying only one?

Mr. Fisher: I don't know the answer. It would be good sense to discount because they are both printed in the same plant.

The Chairman: We will talk about that later. Are there any other questions the senators have?

Mr. Fortier: I have one more question.

In view of the representations made before the committee by the Canadian Labour Congress last week, do the Southam News Services have a labour reporter?

The Chairman: I think we dealt with that.

Mr. Balfour: No, sir. The Southam News Service does not but the various Southam newspapers do.

The Chairman: I think we touched on that this morning.

We will now turn to a discussion of the papers, and we hope that you will stay as long as there may be other questions for you and the other gentlemen.

Mr. Balfour: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, for the balance of the afternoon we are going to deal with the three separate publications, the Calgary Herald, the Vancouver Province and the Hamilton Spectator. I must confess I wondered over the noonhour, and I spoke to some of the Southam people when we came back, I wondered if we should not hear the three papers at once, but I think in fairness to the papers it would be better to hear them individually. I am going to suggest that we spend perhaps less time with each paper and then perhaps towards the end of the afternoon we will have all three papers here and if there are any questions we will question the three papers.

I am not suggesting even for a moment, Mr. Swanson, that we are going to limit your time. I think we will perhaps before the hour is up bring in the Province and the Spectator.

On my immediate right is Mr. Frank Swanson, the publisher of the Calgary Herald and Vice President of Southam Press Limited. On his right is Mr. Richard Sanburn, Editor-in-Chief.

As you know, we are calling on you at this point for an oral statement. The written brief has already been circulated to the senators and there will be questions to you on the written brief and anything you might say now.

Mr. Frank Swanson, Publisher, Calgary Herald, and Vice President, Southam Press Limited: Senator Davey and honourable senators. You will, as Senator Davey noted, have received copies of the Calgary Herald brief and I shall be more than happy to try to answer any questions that may arise from it. Mr. Sanburn will be available to try to answer any questions which may apply to matters of news coverage and editorial matters in general.

The newspapers of this nation, and indeed of the whole free world, have entered a time of tremendous change. With very few exceptions, in very few cities, the newspapers that approach their work with devotion and intellectual honesty, are growing in public acceptance. The era of so-called "love nest" reporting has been dead for 25 years now. The myth that sensational headlines sell newspapers has long since passed away.

The heart of the matter is that trying to find the truth and trying to tell it honestly becomes more arduous, more expensive, and sometimes more dangerous than ever before. Yet, I want to emphasize this: that on practically no single day does a sensational story, even honestly reported, sell another single copy of a newspaper. Newspapers build their circulation only as they build their reputations. Newspapers grow, in this era of tremendous change, only as their sense of responsibility and service to the public grows.

I have repeated the idea of growth twice just now. I think it is important, not because I am equating size with excellence, but because I have seen sheer excellence die for lack of nourishment.

Today, top-flight newspaper work costs money—quite a lot of money. The Calgary Herald and its sister newspapers, have spent and continue to spend scores of thousands of dollars a year just to maintain news bureaux in places like Ottawa, London, Washington, Paris, Quebec City, New York and Toronto. We continue to buy and add new news services to the point where my newspaper now has probably more news services and contributing syndicates than any paper of comparable size in this country. I personally believe this is essential to a better informed and more knowledgeable community. I suppose it was not necessary for us to buy the further supplementary news services we now have. We could most certainly fill our columns with material supplied solely by the Canadian Press National News Service and our own staff, and I am not sure that many readers would even notice the difference. I notice the difference, however, and I am proud to say that we are in the forefront of buying news services or information wherever they present themselves within the limits of our financial resources. I believe this is a responsibility of the press to the society we serve.

I think there is another responsibility too, having to do with the fundamental need to find the truth and to record it. One hundred years ago, many newspapers in this country, such as then existed, were the creatures of political interests of one kind or another. They were, in short, the hand maidens of various political parties. This was clearly true of the press of France prior to 1939. But I do not know of a single daily newspaper today in Canada which accepts bounties or financial handouts of any kind from any political machine.

Now why should this be so? It is simply because the growth of advertising is a source of revenue for newspapers which made possible for them to be independent without recourse to subsidies which limit their freedom of expression.

Of my own personal knowledge, the one important newspaper in the English-speaking world in recent times which has in any way been directly tied to a political party was the London Daily Herald in England, and that no longer in business today. It was for practical purposes a financial commercial failure and was kept going, so long as it lasted, by the profits of other non-political publications emanating from the same publishing house.

The fact is that any organ of news or opinion has open to it only three sources of income. The first is the price that the public is prepared to pay to read it, the second is the price that advertisers are prepared to pay to advertise in it, and the third is the extent to which groups are prepared to subsidize it. Almost universally, the daily press of this continent, if for no other reason than it historically did not work very well.

A daily newspaper today runs as a commercial enterprise which must make a profit if it is to survive and to succeed. It must, therefore, draw its revenue from the first two sources I mentioned. It cannot in the long run do this if its conduct is fundamentally dishonest or unreasonably quixotic. It must conduct itself in such a way as to satisfy the average and reasonable man so familiar to every common law. In Canadian terms, it must make a broad appeal. It must appeal to the average citizen—whatever he may be. Since the average citizen is a composite of dozens or hundreds of groups, all with different interests, different desires, we must try to satisfy them all both severally and collectively, and above all must try to do this without being dull.

It differs from both radio and television in that its primary stock-in-trade is news, information and comment, with a little entertainment thrown in; while in the case of both radio and television, their primary stock-in-trade is entertainment with a little bit of news, information and comment added on.

I would like to emphasize the point made in the Calgary Herald's brief that there is no such thing as a "Southam policy". Full editorial autonomy is vested in the publishers, myself, and the staff. Each decision concerning an editorial viewpoint is made in the offices of the Calgary Herald and there have been many occasions—I have referred to some in my brief—when the Calgary Herald has been at editorial odds with other Southam newspapers. Practically any controversial issue of the day will find the Calgary Herald on the opposite side of the editorial fence from other newspapers in the same group.

You will have heard many definitions of the expression "freedom of the press". This is really no more or no less than the existing doctrine of freedom of speech, freedom of the individual to be informed broadly and deeply of what is going on in his community and the world, and freedom to know as fully as possible about what aspects of society affect him, his family, his way of life or his future. It is different from the freedom of the individual in an open, democratic society.

I do not think, in passing, that there is really any serious threat to freedom of the press in this country today, although this freedom must be jealously guarded at all times so there is no danger of its disappearing in Canada as it has in so many parts of the world.

You have heard many opinions expressed as to the desirability or feasibility of some form of press council or councils, and you heard some this morning. In the opinion of myself and of the newspaper I publish, no responsible newspaper would have anything to fear from such a body. Because of the size and diversity of the country, however, undoubtedly there would be problems in creating one body broadly enough based to deal with all Canadian newspapers. It would seem to me, therefore, that the solution might lie in the formation of regional or local press councils.

Most evidence seems to indicate that the Press Council now in being in the United Kingdom has been and continues to be, most effective. The editor of that distinguished publication, The Times of London, Mr. William Rees-Mogg, says that it is doing very good work. He also says there is no doubt it has markedly helped to raise the standard of journalism in Britain. He adds that he has not personally agreed with all its decisions, but they are taken most seriously in Fleet Street. He goes on to say that the reputation of the British press stands even higher today than it used to, and the Press Council has been a helpful factor in bringing this about. I see no reason why such a body or bodies in this country could not perform a similarly useful service, but I do believe that such a body or bodies should be brought into being by the industry itself, containing representatives of the industry and the public, rather than having such an institution enforced upon the industry by the Government.

In summary, I should like to remind you that newspapers, including the Calgary Herald, are run by people for people. And just because we become journalists does not mean automatically that we are endowed with super-human wisdom, although a few of us in this business do act as though we are the advance guard for the second coming of the Messiah, if not the real thing. We do not claim we are perfect, but we do believe we are only reasonably imperfect.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Perhaps before we turn to the questioning and while we are reflecting on your final statement. I have a note from Mr. Balfour and he says:

"It has been drawn to my attention that I made an error of fact in reply to a question by Mr. Fortier about Southstar. May I correct the record?"

Of course.

Mr. Balfour: I replied to Mr. Fortier that Mr. Mannion held the balance of power in Southstar. I am informed this is not so. There is still provision for dissolution if there should be disagreement between shareholders. Mr. Mannion has complete operating power, but not the balance of power.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Now, Mr. Swanson, turning to the Calgary Herald, I think the first questions this afternoon are from Senator McElman.

Senator McElman: Mr. Swanson, in both your prepared brief and in your comments just now you have established that no responsible newspaper would have anything to fear from such a body, that is a Press Council, with the proviso being it is regional in character; that it not be Government-originated; that it be constituted from elements of the press and public.

And yet we have had testimony that there are those who would clearly stay out of such a council. Why would they stay out? Do you have any opinion on that?

Mr. Swanson: I don't know the reason but I would suggest it to you, sir, that if such a body did come into being on a regional basis, say a Prairie Press Council, I feel that the publishers of the newspapers that might have chosen initially to stay out might in a very short time decide it was to their advantage and to the advantage of their newspapers to join the organization. Indeed I would suggest that public opinion might take this course of action to them.

I think a start would have to be made by the newspapers or individuals who believe it is a good idea.

Senator McElman: You believe it would be to the advantage of all in the long term?

Mr. Swanson: Yes, sir.

Senator McElman: Have you given any thought or taken any concrete steps towards this end?

Mr. Swanson: Mr. Munro, the publisher of the Edmonton Journal, and myself have talked about this matter at some length on a number of occasions. As you have heard this morning, there are three Southam newspapers in the Province of Alberta and one F.P. newspaper in the City of Calgary. There are other smaller daily newspapers. If it appears that the three Southam newspapers started an Alberta Press Council, for the sake of argument, it would be a Southam Press Council and I don't think it would be a good or acceptable idea.

I think if we were able to interest the papers in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba we could have a regional council of some nature, and I think other parts would fall into place in due course.

Senator McElman: In light of the public discussion of this matter in recent weeks, in addition to testimony given before this committee, do you think it would be advisable that you and others, not necessarily of the Southam group, get on with a discussion of this?

Mr. Swanson: I think, sir, that it might at this juncture be a little premature. As you may have heard this morning, and as you probably knew beforehand, there is a move on the way to start such a body in the Province of Quebec. I think it would be advisable to see the progress of the negotiations to set up a similar body there. I have no doubt it will be followed in other parts of the country. As to when or how we might get on with this I don't know. I think the public should discuss it and I think they read discussion from the committee. I think all these things would be helpful in forming a climate of opinion in which such a body might start.

Senator McElman: The reason I pose this of course, there has been an expression of concern that the Government as such should not get involved in this area, and I was wondering if the discussion and testimony which has been so explicit in this regard, has served any purpose in spurring along the industry itself in this direction? The reason I ask is I haven't seen any concrete result of it other than in Quebec and that emanated from something other than discussions that took place here.

Mr. Swanson: I am not aware of any positive moves being taken place at this point, but I think a lot of Canadians are waiting to see the results of the discussion of this committee. As you might recall, if I might refresh your memory, when the Press Council in the United Kingdom was set up there were two or three runs taken at it by publishing organizations and they were abortive attempts, and finally a viable Press Council did come into being. This did take a number of years to come about however.

Senator McElman: Does the Herald regularly use news and columns supplied to it by the Southam News Services?

Mr. Swanson: Yes, sir, practically entirely.

Senator McElman: Would the percentage be as high or higher than what is used from the Canadian Press in relative terms?

Mr. Swanson: Well, we use more Canadian Press news because there is much more of it.

Senator McElman: I mean would you use, let us say, 78 per cent of Southam and 73 per cent of C.P.?

Mr. Swanson: Perhaps Mr. Sanburn could answer that.

Mr. Richard Sanburn, Editor-in-Chief, Calgary Herald: We have never actually made such an assessment but an off-the-cuff guess is if you took the percentage of the news services copy supplied to us and the percentage we used of that against the volume of Canadian Press copy supplied to us and percentage we use of that, I think the percentage would be higher in the case of S.N.S. of the actual volume supplied.

Senator McElman: This is a question we have asked of many witnesses and obviously you think the C.P. is a good service. How do you think it could be improved?

Mr. Swanson: I am sure any service could be improved. We are happy with the Canadian Press News Service. They furnish a very fine report, particularly from Ottawa. Perhaps Mr. Sanburn would like to comment his views on the Canadian Press.

Mr. Sanburn: Again it is a long, long time ago for the C.P. staff and myself. No doubt the C.P. is an excellent news service. As somebody remarked this morning, it has to supply a service to satisfy such a wide variety that it has to be extremely careful the way it writes the news. For many years it was considered to be dull, but that has improved considerably in recent years. The C.P. is capable of some pretty bright writing on occasion. I suppose it could be improved. It would have to have far more people abroad. Now it depends to a great extent, as I said this morning, on the Associated Press and Reuters and Agence France Presse for the news in many places where it doesn't have its own correspondent. I think it is desirable to have as many Canadians abroad writing Canadian news as possible. I am sure the Canadian Press would be delighted to have another 15 or 20 or 50 people abroad if they could afford to do it and this would be of great benefit. On the whole it is a very good news service.

Senator McElman: Looking at the whole of the information that you receive through news services with relation to French Canada, particularly la belle province Quebec, do you feel you are getting satisfactory service on the problems of Quebec so you can relate that to your readers in the west?

Mr. Sanburn: I would think so. We have our own bureau in Quebec City, as I am sure you are aware, and the Canadian Press itself does a good job down there and we carry a great volume of its news. We also carry every week on the editorial page a column of opinion from the French language newspapers in Quebec which also illuminates the previous news report. We carry a great deal of information and interpretation from Quebec from both sources.

Senator McElman: As newspaper people you obviously know what are the burning questions of discussion amongst your readers, amongst the population in your area of the country, and I think it is fairly obvious there are some misunderstandings in the west, or perhaps a lack of knowledge rather than a lack of understanding—one leads to the other. Are there questions in the minds of your readers or people in the west that are not being resolved and you are not getting the answers through your news service or otherwise to help them resolve those questions.

Mr. Sanburn: We are quite a long way from Quebec and I have no doubt that the volume of news and the interest of, say, the individual citizen on the whole in the Province of Quebec diminishes with distance. For instance, I think the people of Ontario might be more keenly aware of the various aspects and the finer points of the problems involving Quebec than they are further west one goes. I don't think that the people whom we are serving have any reason to think that they are not adequately informed. I would not say voluminously informed, but adequately informed, and there is nothing that has arisen that involves problems in Quebec, that I am aware of, that has not been dealt with in the Calgary Herald.

Senator McElman: Let me put it another way: if there are matters affecting the Province of Quebec that you feel that your readers don't understand as well as they might, and you in fact don't understand as well as you might, have you on occasion referred these to your own news services or the Canadian Press to do some study in depth in Quebec and provide you with answers or information?

Mr. Sanburn: Not terribly often. We have done that. We started an enormous project one time, but it became so enormous that we just couldn't do it. We wanted comparative studies of the various textbooks in English and in French in regard to Canadian history and problems, and so forth, but it developed into much, much too great a project for the resources we had to put to it. It could be done I know, but I am afraid it didn't get too far. We asked for that.

Senator McElman: This would be a background thing. I am thinking more of questions of misunderstanding that may arise, or do you have no misunderstandings?

Mr. Sanburn: Far be it from me to say I understand everything about Quebec. I would never say such a thing. I think I am probably like a great many westerners who quite frankly think they are perfectly well aware, some of them think they are much too acutely aware. They think that much too much attention is paid to Quebec. This is a western feeling and I think anyone who knows the west would appreciate it. That doesn't mean to say that we are neglecting the problem of Quebec; we are not.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier has a supplementary question.

Senator McElman: I have just another question.

Approximately what percentage of the feed from the two news services from Quebec would you be publishing?

Mr. Sanburn: Pardon?

Senator McElman: Of the total feed you get from your own news service and the C.P. with respect to Quebec province, what ratio would you be publishing of it?

Mr. Sanburn: I don't really know Senator. I don't see the entire string, but I know we publish a great deal.

Mr. Swanson: I would say probably 80 to 90 per cent of the material we receive that is date lined anywhere in Quebec—that is the C.P. material and our own bureau material. This is invariably used. I would say the overwhelming bulk of what we do receive we do use.

Senator McElman: Is there any difference in the frequency of coverage as between "in-depth" story relating to general problems and the coverage that would be given to, say, an explosion in a mail box?

Mr. Sanburn: Well, sir, an in-depth story by the nature of it would probably go on the opposite editorial page. If a bomb blew up in a mail box it might land on page 1 because it is of a more emergent nature. An in-depth study might be asked for days ago and photographs would have to be made ready for it, a layout has to be prepared, and because of the nature and size of this layout, or amount of copy involved, it most normally would not appear on the front page. It might start on the front page and turn to a page inside.

Senator McElman: What I am really getting at is if you had two stories parallel in size and one of them dealt with general interest matters in relation to the Province of Quebec and the other dealt with something a bit more sensational?

Mr. Swanson: I would say, sir, the aspect of sensationalism would not affect the news judgment. It would be the aspect of immediacy, if this happened this morning or last night it would be treated as any other news story. I don't think any sensational factor would have a bearing on the treatment of the story. This is not how we view stories or judge the importance.

Mr. Fortier: The question Senator McElman asked was the question I was going to ask but I will try it in different words. The view has been expressed, indeed as recently as last Sunday in Montreal by Claude Ryan of Le Devoir, that out of Quebec too much coverage is given to the negative aspects of the rising nationalism in the province and not enough coverage to the positive aspects. I wonder if you would care to comment on that particular thought?

I know I have travelled from Montreal to Winnipeg or Toronto or Calgary and picked up Le Devoir at the Montreal airport, and read stories on page 8, or 9, or 10, and then arriving at my destination picked up the local paper and I have seen that same story on the first page.

This is the sort of thing that I believe would be of interest to the committee. How do you treat positive news as opposed to negative news?

Mr. Swanson: I would say, sir, that positive news naturally has a much greater appeal to the man on the news desk. The negative story, if by negative story you mean an interpretive story giving some background or a situational kind of presentation, this would tend to possibly go to the editorial page, or the opposite editorial page and be more thoughtful and more studious kind of reporting. Things that come off the wire are written in the speed of time and they are treated with some degree of urgency. They tend, I suppose, to go on to the front page. I am perfectly sure, as Mr. Sanburn has said, that we in western Canada are quite a distance removed from events in Quebec and you tend to look at these things by the nature of things at the opposite end of the telescope.

Mr. Fortier: For example, last week in Quebec City there was a press conference

The Minister of Natural Resources in Quebec, the honourable Mr. Allard, and the President of Falconbridge had a conference and the President announced that the Falconbridge intended to invest upwards of $100 million in northern Quebec during the next ten years. This was given much prominence in Quebec newspapers. Did you carry that story out west in Calgary?

Mr. Sanburn: I must honestly say, sir, I don't know. I am quite sure we would, but I personally didn't see it. This is a big story, a most important story.

Mr. Swanson: I would be sure from the way you describe it this would be an automatic story we would carry.

The Chairman: It might be interesting if you would let us know.

Senator Hays: There is another example. In the City of Calgary, for instance, one of its largest industries is the processing of beef and the sale of beef, and Montreal uses more beef out of Calgary than the City of Calgary uses, as I understand, but I have never seen that published in one of our papers.

Mr. Swanson: It is a good idea, Senator. We will look into it.

Senator Hays: I think this is the kind of thing. One end of Canada does need the other end of Canada.

The Chairman: I was intrigued on page 2 of your brief by the reference to the two weeks, the North Hill News and the South Side Mirror. I was interested to see the South Side Mirror, is this correct, this has 11,000 higher circulation than the Albertan?

Mr. Swanson: This is a newspaper which is distributed free.

The Chairman: It still has a big circulation.

Mr. Swanson: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: They give away 47,000 newspapers?

Mr. Swanson: I understand it is possible to buy one, but I don't believe many people do.

Senator Hays: Is it owned by F.P.?

Mr. Swanson: Yes.

Senator Hays: How about the other one, the North Hill News?

Mr. Swanson: It is owned by an independent company, a man called Roy Farron. They also publish the Rocky View News and Market Examiner, and a few other papers for municipal districts.

The Chairman: These are shopping guides full of advertising?

Mr. Swanson: They are full of advertising.

The Chairman: Would you consider the South Side Mirror as competitive with your newspaper for local advertising?

Mr. Swanson: It is certainly a factor. The Albertan sells advertising and I think they make an arrangement whereby an advertisement can appear in this publication as well.

The Chairman: You can buy an advertisement...

Mr. Swanson: I have heard this said.

The Chairman: You don't know whether it is true?

Mr. Swanson: I would not know.

The Chairman: Of course you would not know. It might be interesting for us to find out.

Senator Prowse: The Calgary Herald does not advertise in these?

Mr. Swanson: No.

The Chairman: Mr. Sanburn, I think you would agree with me that Bobby Orr is a magnificent hockey player.

Mr. Sanburn: Well, I am not a hockey fan, senator, but I understand this is right.

The Chairman: You carry his column?

Mr. Sanburn: Yes, sir, we do.

The Chairman: It must be quite a chore to write that column. The team plays 75 games. When do you suppose he writes it?

Mr. Sanburn: We receive it from the Toronto Star Syndicate.

The Chairman: Do you think he does write it?

Mr. Sanburn: I would not know, sir.

The Chairman: Do you think it is possible he doesn't write it?

Mr. Sanburn: Well, he is a very busy man.

Senator Hays: Jean Beliveau writes it for him!

The Chairman: You don't know whether he writes it or not?

Mr. Sanburn: No, sir, I don't.

The Chairman: Do you think it would be of any interest to your readers to know whether he writes it or not? A column appeared in the Toronto Star, which I know was carried in your paper, and it was a very strident column which occasioned a great deal of controversy around Toronto, a column on Punch Imlach. I even heard it suggested it was actionable but I don't think it was. There was discussion about whether or not Bobby Orr in fact writes this column.

Mr. Sanburn: I think you will have to ask the Toronto Star.

The Chairman: Would you accept something you didn't know whether or not he wrote? What would you think if we found out he doesn't write the column?

Mr. Sanburn: I would be most dismayed. We buy it in good faith, it is given to us as his column and I believe he must, therefore, have some say about it whether he puts the words together or simply tells the ideas to someone, I don't know; but he gives advice as to how young hockey players...

The Chairman: He hasn't for weeks and that is exactly what he does not do. It is more a comment about what is happening in the National Hockey League. You think we should ask the Toronto Star whether or not Bobby Orr writes the column. I think it is written by somebody not working for the Star, but another Toronto newspaper.

Mr. Sanburn: I should say, Senator, the columns that cause the most controversy in Calgary are those written by Miss Ann Landers and Jim Coleman.

The Chairman: That is the question I wanted to ask you. Are you perplexed about the amount of feature material which is carried in your newspaper which is imported directly from the United States? Does this trouble you at all?

Mr. Sanburn: No, sir. Each column or each feature item, they are picked on their merits, and if we don't want them we would not take it.

The Chairman: You don't think it is regrettable that most of the syndicated stuff that comes in—astrology columns and health columns, lovelorn columns are from the United States? This doesn't trouble you?

Mr. Sanburn: No, sir. There are very few available from Canadian sources.

The Chairman: I wanted to ask you that. There are no Canadian counterparts available?

Mr. Sanburn: Personally I would prefer more of this material available certainly from Canada, or even British if possible. We have had over the years a policy of trying to buy from them. There have been two or three Canadian comic strips and we bought them as a matter of principle, but they all died.

The Chairman: Why? Were they not good enough?

Mr. Sanburn: Well, somebody got drunk and quit drawing, and with another one the creator died, and the other just petered out.

The Chairman: Is there a Canadian advice to the lovelorn column syndicated and available?

Mr. Sanburn: I think there is one of minor nature which originates in Ontario. It has been offered to us.

The Chairman: Is there a Canadian astrology column available?

Mr. Sanburn: Not that I ever heard.

The Chairman: I rather agree with you it is regrettable there are not more.

Mr. Sanburn: I would be delighted to see more.

The Chairman: I have one other question on the brief. I would like to ask you about page 13, section 43. You were talking about the letters to the editor column and you said that:

"Frequently the whole opposite editorial page, known as page 5, normally devoted to background articles is given over entirely to letters in order to keep pace with the heavy flow."

How many letters do you get?

Mr. Sanburn: It varies. I would say we get probably an average of from 10 to 30 a day.

The Chairman: Twenty a day would be an average?

Mr. Sanburn: I would think so.

The Chairman: Around a hundred a week, Mr. Sanburn? What percentage are published?

Mr. Sanburn: I would say about 95 per cent.

The Chairman: And those that are not are belous or slander...

Mr. Sanburn: Yes.

Senator McElman: I am told there are quite a number of stories carried in the Herald from overseas with date lines of London, England, and so on, and they carry the by-line Joe Doakes, Herald staff. Are they in all instances Herald staff?

Mr. Swanson: The only time this is used, is on reports from in fact our own staff reporters who are reporters on the Southam News Services. The practices vary how you credit these people. If a reporter of Parliament Hill in the Southam News Service wrote a story we would say "The Herald's Ottawa bureau", and whatever the name is. We regard them as our bureau. We don't keep a staff in down here from the newspaper but we pay a share of the maintenance in the Southam News Service in Ottawa or in London and regard them as our people. It is the matter of choice. Some papers do say "Southam News Service" and some say whatever is the staff reporter. We say "The Herald's Ottawa bureau". It is simply a matter of choice because we have a proprietary interest in the staff and organization.

Senator McElman: Is it not more than the matter of choice, Mr. Swanson? You carry on your masthead that you are a member of the Southam group?

Mr. Swanson: Yes sir.

Senator McElman: Daily.

Mr. Swanson: Daily.

Senator McElman: Would it not follow along that you would credit the by-line to one of the S.N.S. services?

Mr. Swanson: I don't think it would follow along, sir. I think in a competitive field you tend to take whatever advantage you can for competitive reasons out of this situation. I know it is the practice in some other cities to use the New York Times service on a story or say special to whatever newspaper it is. I suppose it is special to that newspaper, but it is still the New York Times story and by the terms of the agreement between the subscribing newspaper and the New York Times they are supposed to say it is the New York Times but not all newspapers do this and the Times doesn't seem to make any fuss about this.

Senator McElman: There is no conscious effort to indicate to your readers that the Herald has people all over the world?

Mr. Swanson: No. We frequently advertise with promotional ads with pictures that we belong to this organization and show pictures and say that they are Southam News Service personnel and the by-line does say from the Herald's Ottawa bureau after the man's name.

Senator McElman: You carry in your classified section, I suspect daily, "All ads restricted to proper classification. The Herald will appreciate having its attention drawn to any advertisement not conforming to the highest standard of honesty."

I have here three editorial type columns that appear regularly, I believe, in the Herald. One is headed "Palliser Square" by Rod Sykes. Is that actually an editorial or is it an advertisement?

Mr. Swanson: No sir, it is a paid advertisement.

Senator McElman: I see no indication in it that it is a paid advertisement.

Mr. Swanson: Well, I think in Calgary there is no doubt about this. Mr. Sykes is now the Mayor of the City of Calgary and there is a successor that does that. This particular advertisement to which you refer appears in our own local reproduced magazine section which appears each Friday. The bulk of the material in the section is editorial matter. There are advertisements scattered throughout, many trade advertisements. This one is boxed with a black box. We feel that is adequate. There are one or two other advertisements of a similar nature, one by a local car dealer.

Senator McElman: You don't think it would be better for the reader that this actually be shown to be an advertisement?

Mr. Swanson: It never occurred to me and I doubt if it occurred to anyone else's mind in Calgary that it was not.

Senator McElman: There is another Bill Pattimore's Plugs and Points. This has to do with automobiles. At the bottom of it is shown the name is Pattimore, the company is Metro, the product is Ford—Metro Ford. It is much more clear that we are dealing with an advertisement here.

Mr. Swanson: That advertisement appeared originally and I think the Palliser Square was modelled after that, and this is how it came about. Palliser Square is a commercial development. The Husky Tower is a fully commercial development and it seems to me there should be no doubt that this is a commercial promotion.

Senator McElman: There is a further one Import Report. Clearly it is an advertisement or at least I would regard it as being clear. Are these in fact written by these people, or are they written by staffers?

Mr. Swanson: In the case of Palliser Square it is written by Sykes, or whoever his successor is. I understand he writes it. I understand the Desson man writes that one. That was written from his office. I am not sure whether the other one is not written by an advertising agency. It comes in this manner.

Senator McElman: Any part of this written by your staffers?

Mr. Swanson: No, sir.

Senator McElman: None?

Mr. Swanson: None.

Senator McElman: At page 22 of your brief you give questions and the percentage of respondents to a public opinion poll you conducted. You give two elements of it but I suggest there is one element in order for us to be able to give it full weight, there is one element missing. Surely everybody didn't respond? Were there no respondents who had no opinion?

Mr. Swanson: I assume probably people did not respond, Senator. We caused this survey to be taken and we said "Will you survey a number of people and find out what the people think of the Calgary Herald?" These were the results they gave to us. Whether they had to go to a larger sample because they were refused answers I couldn't say. They did interview the number of people we requested them to talk to.

Senator McElman: When you are waiting results in a study you cannot do it on the information provided here. You have to know whether 40 per cent responded or whether 90 per cent responded before it has much bearing. Could you perhaps get this information from your agency and provide it to us? I mete out this part of it?

Mr. Swanson: Yes.

Mr. Sanburn: I compiled this particular part of the report, Senator McElman, and the only alteration I made in the summary which appeared in this thing, was, for the sake of saving steps, I lumped together more or less the favourable and more or less the unfavourable. I am sure if there had been any section that so many did not respond I would have included it. Offhand I cannot remember whether there was anything along this nature. We will certainly find out.

Senator McElman: I enjoy reading reports and I would like to have it if it is available.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, have you a question? We will then have Senator Hays and then following Senator Hays, gentlemen, we will adjourn for a moment or two and then we will get to the Vancouver Province.

Mr. Fortier: As I read your brief on page article 29, the last sentence:

"Newspapers grow only as they build their reputation for honesty and fair dealing."

I am going to ask you this question and don't expect you want to give away trade secrets: Why your success story as compared with the Albertan?

Mr. Swanson: Mr. Fortier, I think the Calgary Herald, over the years has been noted as an outspoken newspaper. It has been honest, hardhitting newspaper and I am not comparing us in any detrimental way with the Albertan whatsoever. I am afraid I cannot speak for the Albertan. One of the reasons I suppose for our success, apart from any self-righteous feelings on my part, is the fact that the evening newspaper and by tradition a history in Canada the evening paper has seems to be firmly established. In most cities where you will find morning newspapers and evening newspapers, the evening paper will be the largest and certainly the wealthiest papers. Toronto is an example, and I suppose Montreal is, and Vancouver seems to be. Calgary is certainly this way. The evening paper is the paper people tend to read and both in our advertising promotion over 85 per cent of the people in the City of Calgary read the Herald.

Mr. Fortier: Are you doing certain things differently than things done by the Albertan?

Mr. Swanson: I like to think, Mr. Fortier, that we are doing something right. I am not quite sure what the formula is.

Mr. Fortier: All right. won't press you on that point further. Your treatment of the local Calgary news, how many people on your staff do you have who are assigned to the Calgary scene?

Mr. Sanburn: The establishment... pardon the expression... allows for 19 local reporters. At the moment we are one short of that number of people actually assigned to the local news.

Mr. Fortier: Is this considered to be sufficient as far as the reading public is concerned?

Mr. Swanson: It seems to me we increased this number by two a month or so ago. It was a bit too much for 17 and now we are in the process of adding two more. I would not be at all surprised if we are going to have to add still more.

Mr. Fortier: Was this in answer to a particular need which was expressed to you by your readers or...

Mr. Swanson: The impetus came through the city desk and the managing editor. They pointed out the reporters were working far too hard and too long hours and they wanted to take some of the pressure off these people.

Mr. Fortier: As you know, this committee has had a number of studies made of newspapers in Canada and in one instance our researchers have studied the contents of 30 newspapers selected at random in Canada over a period of three months. This was in 1919. The Calgary Herald on a percentage basis ranked lowest in news content and the lowest in proportion of staff written news compared with news from wire and other sources. This would seem to suggest that the Herald may not be doing an adequate job of covering the local scene. In view of the results communicated to us, I think it would be only fair to ask you to comment on it.

Mr. Swanson: I might mention, Mr. Fortier, that 19 are reporters. We have another group of specialists, writers and columnists. That is the agricultural editor who writes an agricultural column daily; the mining specialists; we have a petroleum writer and a petroleum editor who are specialists. We don't count those people in here. They are over and above the 19. The entire news staff, I think, is mentioned in the brief.

Mr. Sanburn: Between 75 and 80.

Mr. Swanson: Most usually around 80 people. It seems to me an adequate staff for a newspaper the size of the Herald and I am certain we give all the local coverage that the situation appears to warrant.

Mr. Fortier: So you have no further comment on the ration brought to our attention that would seem to indicate that internationally and other provinces are being covered more in any given day, given more coverage?

Mr. Swanson: I can't accept that. We would be getting lots of static about it if that were true.

The Chairman: Of the 30 papers we surveyed the Herald contained the lowest staff written material on a percentage basis.

Mr. Swanson: You were speaking on a percentage basis?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Swanson: I would suggest to you, Senator Davey, if this matter were actually measured by column inches there would be a great deal more.

The Chairman: I think you would agree that if we compared the Woodstock Sentinel Review and the Toronto Star we would have to work on a percentage basis, or indeed comparing your paper with the Sentinel Review. On a percentage basis that was not the case.

Mr. Sanburn: If you run a very large paper as we have been doing and you have 12, 14 to 16 pages it is quite impossible for the local staff to produce that much extra copy so we have normally on hand a much more readily available supply of news from our various services—the Canadian Press, The New York Times, and so on.

Now in the bigger papers I would not be surprised that the general content of the non-staff news would rise.

The Chairman: I don't think that was necessarily the conclusion that we drew. The problem you speak of is a problem faced by all papers in Canada.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? My recollection is that that study was based on the number of items and specifically stated that they had not measured the length of space in each article; they had not compared the column inches with the columns of individual stories. That worried me at the time and my recollection might be wrong. I think it is something that should be brought out. Maybe somebody could tell me.

Mr. Fortier: Stories in absolute terms.

Senator Prowse: In other words a one inch front story carried about the same credit as an eight column headline.

The Chairman: I am sorry to disagree with the Senator. I think the measurement terms was standard for all people in the country.

Senator Prowse: Well, if your ruler is an elastic one it is not a hell of a lot of use to you, you know.

The Chairman: Well, I guess the Senator and I have a difference of opinion.

Senator Prowse: I thought it was a funny way of measuring things at the time, and I still think so.

Mr. Fortier: As I recall it it was in absolute terms and I think you have expressed your comment that you feel this could not be.

Mr. Sanburn: I find this very difficult to believe. It is very difficult.

Mr. Fortier: In order that our record be complete, another piece of information which was communicated to the committee by the researchers—and this one dealt particularly with the Herald, not a comparative study—they examine all issues of the Herald during the month of May, 1969, and found that the Herald carried 21 stories and photographs about the Calgary Chamber of Commerce and really my question is: Does any other community group in Calgary get the same kind of treatment? What is peculiar about the Calgary Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. Swanson: There is nothing especially peculiar about them from the standpoint of the Herald. I am not personally involved with them except I happen to be a member of the organization. I resigned as a member of the Council as I felt it might be inadvisable for a publisher of a newspaper to have anything directly to do with the Chamber of Commerce.

There is nothing sinister about this at all. I must have had a very active month. They are a very active organization. They have aviation committees, agricultural committees—they are always up to something. I presume this was regarded as news by the news editors. If anyone else has the same thing we would cover them too.

Mr. Fortier: You were here this morning when Mr. Balfour was asked about the comment on the two articles, one which appeared in your newspaper by Robert Cohen and another two days later in the Winnipeg Tribune. Would you care to use this opportunity to tell us your views on this particular matter?

Mr. Swanson: My recollection is Mr. Cohen wrote the article as he said he did.

The Chairman: That is your paper...

Mr. Swanson: I am almost certain Mr. Hill as in Quebec City at this time so he couldn't have written the article. It happens in the composing room when a batch of copy is composed into a page this way that the by-line of the main slug of the man is set and the compositor simply reaches out for the first one and sets it in the page. He may have reached for the wrong one this time. This has been known to happen before, and I presume will continue to happen.

Mr. Sanburn: This first names are exactly the same and I was asking Charles Lynch at the lunch time about this and he foresees the same thing coming up. Now on the news service we have one man named Nick Hill and one Bob Hill. I would not be surprised if one day the same thing shows up.

Mr. Fortier: Is Robert Cohen a member of the S.N.S.?

Mr. Swanson: Yes, he is. Later moved to the Winnipeg Tribune.

The Chairman: I think we will adjourn for about two or three minutes. I don't want to have a long adjournment. I will then ask to hear from the Vancouver Province.

Senator Hays: Mr. Chairman, I have one question.

The Chairman: I am sorry, Senator.

Senator Hays: In your newspaper I suppose you have a code of ethics because I think it is a pretty responsible newspaper, at least I read it all the time and I am brainwashed if it

ot. I am wondering about advertising and what your feeling is about drugs and tobacco and that sort of thing as a newspaper?

Mr. Swanson: We do indeed, Senator Hays, have a code of advertising ethics. Many occasions arise where the advertising manager comes to me with some advertising copy and says "What do you think about this?" I say "I can't think we will print it." This occasional applies to motion picture advertisements, some pretty lurid ones which we say we will not run and we ask the theatre or exhibitor to substitute another one or not put it in at all. We carry liquor and tobacco advertising in most newspapers in the country. A publisher retains the right to refuse any advertisement on the grounds of taste or decency and it is interesting that we on many occasions are called upon to exercise this judgment and refuse permission to an advertiser to put a particular amount of copy in a paper.

Senator Hays: The reason I asked this question, and it is a question which is common to a lot of newspapers, on January 8 you published in colour right across from your Teen Dateline an advertisement for a new cigarette called slim size cigarette. In the light of all the findings on tobacco and cancer, I am wondering what your thinking would be in taking such an advertisement and putting it in such a place? There were a few coloured advertisements that particular day.

Mr. Swanson: Senator Hays, the thing that dates position of coloured advertising is the availability of your press equipment on that particular day. It has to do with size and the number of pages and how many other coloured advertisements might be scheduled to run that day. It is possibly questionable whether a Teen Dateline column should have appeared very closely beside it. It was not planned this way.

Senator Hays: This was not at the advertiser's request?

Mr. Swanson: No. They are placed where it is possible to accommodate them.

Mr. Sanburn: The editor of the family press would not know the ad was there. The bottom part of it would be marked advertisement and he has left to him the rest of the page to make up. He would have no idea that the Teen column would be in proximity to the ad.

Senator Hays: A pretty nice set of pins above it too! I was wondering if there was any relationship.

The Chairman: Which was it that caught your attention first?

Mr. Sanburn: Senator Hays, you will remember the day many years ago—I am sure you were in Calgary then—when we ran a coloured ad for the gas company opposite a story about the gas chamber concentration camps in Germany. The gas company was not very happy.

Senator McElman: Can an advertiser actually purchase location in a newspaper at a premium rate?

Mr. Swanson: Yes, sir, he can.

Senator McElman: At a premium rate?

Mr. Swanson: For instance, in this advertisement you had there a few minutes ago appearing in our magazine supplement there is a premium rate charged because they want to get in that particular location.

Senator Hays: Then is the advertising rate the same in the Journal as in the Calgary Herald?

Mr. Swanson: No sir, it is not.

Senator Hays: Is it higher in the Edmonton Journal?

Mr. Swanson: Yes, it is.

The Chairman: We will now adjourn for two or three minutes and then meet with the Province.

— A short recess.

— Upon resuming at 4.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I would like to call the session back in order. The next brief we are going to receive is from the Vancouver Province. Sitting on my immediate right is the publisher of the Vancouver Province, Mr. Fred Auger; and on his right Mr. Patrick (Paddy) Sherman, the editor of the Vancouver Province.

I think Mr. Auger I can dispense with my usual preamble and you can proceed.

Mr. Fred Auger, Publisher, Vancouver Province: We concluded our written brief by expressing an invitation to you and your committee, Mr. Chairman, to come to Vancouver, visit the people who produce our daily newspaper. It would be even more appropriate if you could talk with the people in our community who read our newspaper every day.

It is estimated that there are an average of three readers for each copy of the daily newspaper sold. So, there are 360,000 people who read 120,000 copies of the Province daily. Why do they do it? They are not compelled to buy it against their wishes. They have other choices. We can only assume that they buy it and read it because they want it, and they want it because it performs a service and fulfils a need in their lives. These are the people who hear testimony to the acceptance of our product. These people are our press council, and they don't hesitate to let us know when they disagree with us.

But I am confident that the vast majority of these people will confirm that the Vancouver newspapers today are of a higher quality, better written, better edited, better printed, more comprehensive in their news coverage than ever before and by "ever before" I particularly mean before the establishment of Pacific Press Limited.

Our brief outlined the background of circumstances which led to the formation of Pacific Press Limited, but it does not devote adequate emphasis to the fact that, had it not been for the formation of Pacific Press Limited, undoubtedly the community today would be served by only one daily newspaper. And I make no apology for the quality of newspaper service which, under the existing two-paper publishing arrangement, we at the Province are giving to the advertisers and readers of the Vancouver Province.

I would challenge any suggestion that the joint publishing arrangement such as we have at Pacific Press is detrimental to the existence of a free, unhampered press. Rather, I submit that a struggling independent newspaper in today's economy and without the support of any affiliations is much more likely to be suborned or find itself subject to pressures on its integrity for economic reasons.

If your committee, in its wisdom, will make a searching examination of our Pacific Press publishing arrangement I am sure you will see that it is not an object of suspicion but, rather as a model which might be adopted in other situations where the survival of a second newspaper is at stake.

As we do from time to time, we analysed the Province news content during the months of September and October last year. It shows that one month does not an average make when it comes to assessing balance. In October, for example, 14 per cent of our general news content came from overseas. That could give you one idea of our news balance. But in September the comparable figure was 25 per cent overseas news, which gives a quite different picture.

I don't want to put too much emphasis on the column inch percentage measurement of news content as it is only one way of measuring and certainly not by any means the only valid way of evaluating what is in the newspaper. A one column two inch story might be infinitely of greater importance than an eight column 16 inch story, as Mr. Fortier's moment ago pointed out.

In September 52 per cent of the general news in the Province originated outside B.C.'s borders and in October the figure was 45 per cent. Bearing in mind our duty on the local metropolitan and provincial scene those figures refute any suggestion of colloquialism.

The September and October breakdown shows that, of the total news content, 40 per cent was general news; 18 per cent was sports; 10 per cent was business and finance; 12 per cent was women and family matters; and 20 per cent was related to culture and entertainment, ranging from drama and music to television listings.

Despite suggestions that newspapers devote too much with the U.S., in September and October only 11 per cent of the general news in our paper related to the U.S. Less than 1 per cent of our business coverage dealt with U.S. matters, and only 7 per cent related to U.S. entertainment. The biggest single area of U.S. news is in the sports pages, for obvious reasons, where the proportion was about one-fourth.

At times it is suggested that some newspapers rely too much on routine wire-service stories. That is certainly untrue about the Province. In October, our own staff and the staff of Southam News Services wrote 58 per cent of our general news and 71 per cent of our financial news. September's figures were 59 per cent and 72 per cent.

The committee has asked whether newspaper men are paid enough to attract people with adequate educational and other backgrounds. Right now we are negotiating with our unions and have offered to raise the minimum um wage for a senior reporter to $208 weekly by next October. That is $10,800 a year. Most of our morning paper editorial employees receive extra pay for night work, raising their minimum to $11,370. That is for 37½ hour week, with overtime for extra hours work.

In British Columbia members of the Legislative Assembly are paid $8,000 a year. Vancouver School Board recently concluded a new contract giving high school teachers with pre-year bachelor degrees in education, salaries ranging from $7,350 to $12,200, the latter figure reached only after 13 years of teaching. Our reporters become fully qualified for top sale after five years.

I think you must agree these comparisons show we are paying our people well. Nevertheless, we lose staff members to public relations firms that offer more and who, along with the newspapers, are constantly facing the challenge of higher salaries offered by the federal Government for the special talent of journalists.

Like most newspapers today we have many full-time specialists. Our observer on matters of education is a former high school teacher. We have a man on investment analysis who is qualified to hold a licence as investment counsel and our business editor is a School of Business Administration graduate. Labour, politics and civic affairs are covered by specialists in these fields, and so on. Many of our editorials on economic matters are written by a M.A. in economics. Our marine editor is a ex-Navy officer who has sailed his own vessel across the Pacific Ocean. Recently we covered the Colombo Conference in Victoria by a reporter who has had five years of Southeast Asia journalism in his background. We do our best to bring the broadcast experience and authenticity to all areas of our news coverage.

In this increasingly complicated and bureaucratic age, we run one department with full-time employees who help readers solve personal problems and cut through bureaucratic red tape. In the last three months of 1969 that department dealt with 8,7 problems submitted by readers. The bulk of them were resolved, despite the fact that advertisers who objected to the publicizing of their shortcomings cancelled many thousands of dollars worth of advertising in the Province.

Now I am not claiming that we are more nearly perfect than any other service institution that is constantly in the public eye. From time to time it is suggested that even the Senate itself is not living up to its great potential! But we are thoroughly aware of the need to change and adopt our methods and contents.

There is one element in the matter of service to newspaper readers which I think your committee might give some thought—I refer to the great carrier-boy organization which is responsible for the daily delivery of newspapers throughout Canada.

There are approximately 69,000 newsboys in Canada, quite an army! We have 2,100 of them selling the Province.

These boys help to support themselves by earning an average of $8.25 a week, $35 a month, or about $425 per annum. On a national basis this represents a total earnings for carriers and news vendors of more than $29 million a year.

Recruiting and training this little army of rising young Canadians is no small task for the circulation departments of the daily papers. Approximately one-half of the men in Canada were newspaper carriers at some time in the course of their youth, and I am sure all of them would say the benefit of having had this business experience is part of their education.

Mr. Chairman, in an interview last year you were quoted as saying, "The press serves us well but it could serve us much better". Your statement is so true as to be almost a cliché because we never are satisfied with the levels we have reached. Improving today on yesterday's performance is the story of newspaper publishing.

On the completion of your deliberations we hope you will be able to pass on to us some useful ideas on how we may improve our service. We are always open to suggestions.

One of your committee recently referred to the press of Canada under certain situations as having "raw, naked, unadulterated power". Frankly, I think this description amusing. In all the realm of the press of Canada the strongest, raw, unadulterated power I know of is the power of the labour leader, even the leader of the small union representing perhaps as little as 5 per cent of your employees, who has the power to shut down a newspaper and force it out of business.

Then there is the latent, raw, unadulterated power in the hands of the Government which, by the imposition of censorship, taxation, unrealistic combine legislation, restriction of operations or control of ownership has the power to create a set of conditions under which a newspaper could not publish with any degree of freedom.

Lastly, let us not underrate the intelligence of the Canadian public and the wide variety of information available to them, however isolated they may be geographically. They would be quick to rise on raw, unadulterated power at any attempt which might be considered brainwashing.

Senator McElman: Perhaps one gets brainwashed on occasion by such terms as "the pen is mightier than the sword." You have heard some of the questions and answers of the previous witnesses. With reference to the Canadian Press Service, the wire service, and your own Southam News Service that provides material from the Province of Quebec, do you carry a large percentage of what you receive on the wire?

Mr. Auger: Senator, I am going to ask my editor to answer that.

Mr. Patrick (Paddy) Sherman, Editor, Vancouver Province: We do use the bulk of what comes to us, most of it.

Senator McElman: Would you say in the area of 90 per cent as suggested by the previous witness?

Mr. Sherman: I would be pulling figures out of the air, senator. I would probably say 70 to 80 per cent.

Senator McElman: Do you feel this is serving the purpose of explaining to British Columbians the problems involved or do you put feed-backs to the service asking for further information?

Mr. Sherman: From time to time we will ask for information on specific subjects, but I think we have done a fair job of dealing with the basic issues that have arisen in Quebec from time to time.

Senator McElman: Firstly, do you feel the Canadian Press is providing adequate service in providing information to the nation on material out of B.C.? For instance, what you provide to the C.P. wire, is a good percentage of that being used?

Mr. Sherman: Judging from what I read in the papers down here the flow from west to east is very much smaller than the flow from east to west.

Senator McElman: Would you have an idea why that would be the case?

Mr. Sherman: I really couldn't say unless it is that there is not as much demand down here for news from the far frontier out there.

The Chairman: You mean there is not demand in the east for news of what is happening on the coast?

Mr. Sherman: That is what I would suggest, sir.

The Chairman: And in using news from Quebec, are you responding to a demand from readers?

Mr. Sherman: What we think is the demand.

Senator McElman: I just recently watched telecast, I believe from the CBC, and one of the principals was Jacques Pariseau the well known economist in the Province of Quebec, am not out to spread his word at all but one of his contentions is that there is developing in Canada sort of an adversary situation between the English language press and the French language press, particularly that of Quebec; and he used to illustrate that the supposed flight of capital from the Province of Quebec the Toronto papers seemed dwell on this.

A specific example, I believe, he said, was on August 3rd, 1967, in the Globe and Mail and that they had taken, as an example, buy-in by the Provincial Bank into the shareholding of Caisse Populaire, or something of that nature, and that this was the proof of how the capital was leaving and they had in fact shore up the operation within the province.

In truth, the situation was the Bank Canadienne Nationale had been trying for some three years to acquire that element of stock.

What I am getting at is he says there is consciously or sub-consciously—he suggests consciously—a war of words developing.

Do you feel there is any indication of this in the press of British Columbia in relation to the rest of Canada, or more particularly with respect to the Province of Quebec?

Mr. Sherman: Speaking for my paper, sir, I would say that is rubbish.

Senator McElman: I thought it was myself it I was interested in getting your viewpoint.

Mr. Auger: We haven't seen any signs of flight of capital out of Quebec to British Columbia, much as we would welcome it.

Senator McElman: You mean you would welcome the capital?

Mr. Auger: Yes, exactly. The contrary was the case when the Province of British Columbia loaned $50 million to the Province of Quebec.

Senator Prowse: Forty-nine million, I thought... the other million was interest.

Mr. Sherman: One point you were talking about, the flight of capital... we did buy—I am a bit hazy on the time—something up to two years ago, a freelance article that one of the Toronto papers syndicated talking about the flight of capital. I think it was a very widely read article. Some of the people on the Financial Times took strong issue with this and wrote a story which they felt corrected the picture and we put that one in too. We accepted the first one on good faith, and when the second one pointed out errors in the first, we published that too.

Senator McElman: I am sure we would agree that any such situation developing would not be good for the country. I look at it from the Maritimes and the central part of the country, but looking at it from your distaste and your knowledge of the press and the central part of the nation do you see any signs of this?

Mr. Auger: No, I don't see any sign of what you describe as a war of words between the French press and the English press. My own experience is there is a great deal of co-operation and mutual understanding in respect between the English and French language workers within the context of the Publishers Association and within the context of the Canadian Press Association.

Senator McElman: You referred to the Pacific Press arrangement and I take it you recommend this in other situations.

Mr. Auger: I recommend it in our situation.

Senator McElman: Let me put it this way... he...

Mr. Auger: I went so far as to say that I think it was a blessing rather than a curse to the press in Vancouver and under similar circumstances therefore I would have to say—giving it the same blessing—I think that it should have the same acceptance.

Senator Prowse: In the same circumstances.

Mr. Sherman: If the alternative is the death of one of two newspapers.

Senator McElman: A good many witnesses have suggested it is good for the nation, as well as the local area, of course, that there be different voices in a community. For those who are concerned that perhaps the chains are acquiring too many newspapers this would appear to be one of the ways in which a community where there are two, a morning and evening, that they could survive and not be forced into a situation of selling perhaps. We know that in your experience your particular experience, you favour it for your situation. Have there been any disadvantages of such an arrangement that you would point out to us and therefore to the people who might be interested in this area?

Mr. Auger: No, I certainly would not. From the readers' standpoint, from the advertisers' standpoint and from the owners' standpoint I think it has been a highly satisfactory arrangement in any respect. I cannot think of any shortcomings or any reasons why it has not been good.

The Chairman: If that is not the case, why would you not recommend the same technique in other cities?

Mr. Auger: I will recommend it in other cities which may have the same set of circumstances which existed in Vancouver before we did it.

The Chairman: Would it be an improvement in Vancouver if the two newspapers were completely independently owned?

Mr. Auger: I don't think they could be more independent than they are now from the standpoint of serving the reader or the advertiser.

The Chairman: Well then, I come back to the question that Senator McElman asked: Why would you not recommend the technique in other cities directly thought out?

Mr. Auger: I am sorry you misunderstood. I would recommend it in the same set of circumstances.

The Chairman: What set of circumstances would you not recommend it in?

Mr. Auger: Where there are already two or three thriving newspapers.

The Chairman: Only in that situation?

Mr. Auger: Or other circumstances where there was only one newspaper. That was not what we were up against. That was not the position out there.

Senator Prowse: I have a supplementary question. My understanding is that when you first went into the arrangement there was a great deal of consternation on the part of the public?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Prowse: How long did it take you before the public became reassured that the papers would continue to be completely independent?

Mr. Auger: I would say four or five years.

Senator Prowse: What form did this consternation take as far as you were concerned? You were there at the time?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Prowse: What form did the consternation of the public take?

Mr. Auger: We used to hear "It doesn't matter, there is only one voice. They are both printed under one roof. Both working for the same boss..." and so on. We don't hear that any more, that has disappeared.

Senator Prowse: You had to go to the public and prove that was not true; is that so?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Prowse: So it must have been somewhat of a disadvantage for a time. Would you say it was a good thing you had to go out and prove your independence?

Mr. Auger: I do think it was a good thing. We did what we strove to do and I think we have fairly reasonably succeeded in doing that.

Senator McElman: In fact you proved it to the Restrictive Practices Commission, did you not?

Mr. Auger: I think the only thing we proved to them, as far as I know, was that the community was better for two newspapers than one. They didn't get into the quality the papers to the best of my knowledge. It remained for us to demonstrate to the community it was better to have two newspapers than one.

Senator McElman: That was a competitive situation?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator McElman: So you were proving the same principle to both the public and the commission in effect?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Everett: Tell me, if the two newspapers had been reasonably balanced in circulation do you think they could have survived under these circumstances as even newspapers?

Mr. Auger: I think they may have, but there were other advantages, mind you, in making the merger that we did. Both newspapers were living in antiquated plants all were faced with tremendous capital expenditure in order to renew these things and it was a question of building two plants or one, and the parties involved saw the wisdom of building one plant and sharing it between two papers.

Senator McElman: The Times lasted something less than a year?

Mr. Auger: Thirteen months, I think.

Senator McElman: Do you know what was the principal basis for its demise? Couldn't it face the competition of such an agency arrangement?

The Chairman: Couldn't face competition period, regardless of whether it was the agency.

Senator McElman: Did the agency arrangement make you more competitive to the?

Mr. Auger: No. The reason they didn't survive—there were many, a whole list—the first reason they didn't survive is they didn't get into the department store advertising. In this way and age a newspaper cannot survive in a competitive community without the support of the retail advertiser.

Senator Everett: Why not?

Mr. Auger: The retail readership has a high value.

Senator Everett: It pays the newspapers to pay for department store advertising to have it in the paper?

Mr. Auger: I know of an advertising manager who said "If I had to give it away, I would in order to carry it." You don't run a department store, do you?

Senator Everett: No. I wish I did under these circumstances.

Mr. Sherman: That man was an American.

The Chairman: Why would you say that?

Mr. Auger: He recognized the readership. It would run it at a loss in order to have it in the paper to get the readers. You should ask your wife that question, really.

The Chairman: Woodward's ads sell more papers than Lynch's column.

Senator Hays: Has this happened in Canada in the last six weeks where advertising has been given?

Mr. Auger: No.

Senator Hays: Not to your knowledge?

Mr. Auger: No. I am making a blanket answer.

Senator Everett: Has it ever happened to your knowledge?

Mr. Auger: I am sure that advertising has been sold to department stores at a loss in order to hold it.

Senator Everett: Have you sold it at a loss?

Mr. Auger: I don't think that is a fair question.

The Chairman: I think the answer was given this morning. I think I asked that question of Southam Press Limited and the answer was "No, it hasn't."

Mr. Auger: It hasn't been sold at a loss?

The Chairman: Could I proceed on this department store thing? Are you more interested in the revenue or the readership of these ads?

Mr. Auger: Well, I don't know. I would not like to say.

The Chairman: I was going to put it in the terms of the Vancouver Times. Senator McElman asked you why the Times failed and you gave us one reason, the failure to attract department store advertising. In terms of the Times which did it miss most the readership or revenue?

Mr. Auger: Well, which came first the chicken or the egg?

The Chairman: Both, in other words?

Mr. Auger: Sure. It is like food—you enjoy the nourishment and you also enjoy the flavour.

The Chairman: Would you agree if the department stores of Canada agreed, as indeed they might, to spend all their money in advertising...

Mr. Auger: Combined to agree?

The Chairman: If first Eaton's agreed, and then Simpsons, and then Woodwards and they all moved their advertising to television, the newspaper industry would survive wouldn't it?

Mr. Auger: We would have to do a considerable amount of adjustment. Now I don't put too much emphasis on this desirability of department store advertising. Also high on the list of desirable things is you cannot run a newspaper in a competitive situation without classified advertising. A lot of readers will buy paper A instead of paper B because there is more classified advertising. That is important too.

The Chairman: Go on.

Mr. Auger: Features, news coverage—as I said there is a whole list of reasons but I put department store advertising at the top.

The Chairman: I think the whole relevancy was relating to the Times. We will go back to Senator McElman.

Senator Everett: I have a supplementary question.

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: What lineages are involved annually, Mr. Auger, in department store advertising?

Mr. Auger: Oh, department store advertising would run a million, a million and a half, two million lines of advertising in a year.

Senator Everett: Two million would be the high?

Mr. Auger: That would be pretty high. We have department stores running over that in a year.

Senator Everett: What would be the average rate charged by the Province to a department store?

Mr. Auger: About the same as you are paying. You know that figure.

Senator Everett: Yes. Twenty-five cents a line?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Everett: Do you think that is the rate department stores are paying?

Mr. Auger: Just about, yes.

Senator Everett: It is odd, because your retail rate is 21 cents a line at half a million lines.

Mr. Auger: I haven't got the actual figures here.

Senator Everett: You made a statement.

Mr. Auger: It is within that range, yes.

Senator Everett: I wonder if that statement is correct.

Mr. Auger: I said about the same as you are paying. Maybe you are a little higher.

Senator Everett: The rate of 25 cents a line?

Mr. Auger: You are paying 25 cents a line.

Senator Everett: That is what you tell me today.

Mr. Auger: I think department stores are down to 21 cents.

Senator Everett: Any lower than 21 cents?

Mr. Auger: Not to my knowledge.

Senator Everett: Would you like to inquire further for more information?

Mr. Auger: Well, I should point out that our department store rates are a matter of a certain amount of negotiation with the department stores and how much space they use daily six days a week, and how many days a week they are in the paper, and so on, so that the quantity of lineage is not the only factor.

Senator Everett: There would be a frequency?

Mr. Auger: There are frequency factors involved.

The Chairman: Are you still on department stores? I was going to ask about some of the nationally advertising department stores. Let us take Eaton's, would they buy their advertising in Toronto in Southam papers?

Mr. Auger: No, locally each place.

The Chairman: No package arrangement made?

Mr. Auger: No. They don't buy advertising the way we don't buy newsprint.

Senator Everett: I would like the average rate paid by department stores in Vancouver.

Mr. Auger: I think you have actually got in your research somewhere. I believe you were asked for that when your people came.

Senator Everett: That was in the confidential research we did have it.

Mr. Auger: Let's keep it that way.

The Chairman: I think at this point should say I would accept an answer from the witness of not choosing to answer that publicly. Is that your basic position?

Mr. Auger: Yes. Your committee has the information and I don't care to put it on the record.

Senator Everett: I should point out we do have the information in the form in which asked the question.

The Chairman: Would it meet with your approval if Mr. Auger agrees to send the information? I think it is his understanding we have the information and you say you haven't and therefore could you send it, Mr. Auger?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: In the case of the newspaper such as the Times, giving the importance which you attach to the retail advertising at which we are aware of, is it a fantasy on the part to say that a publisher of a new newspaper could offer to his department stores in the locality, the community where he is going to publish, free advertisements say for a six months period to get launched?

Mr. Auger: No. I am sure he would find takers too. It is not fantastic at all but it is awfully expensive.

Mr. Fortier: Would the cost outweigh the advantages in increasing circulation or getting circulation started?

Mr. Auger: I think so.

Mr. Fortier: You said in particular in Vancouver this was one of the main reasons why the Times was not able to survive because it could not attract retail advertising.

Mr. Auger: That is what they claimed was the principal reason they couldn't carry on. They were inadequately financed, of course. They didn't have enough working capital. They raised about $3 million in public subscriptions but did not invest any of it in fixed assets. They rented a building, they rented presses, they rented office furniture, they leased even typewriters and so on. The capital they had went out for operating expenses of newsprint and wages and when that was gone they were finished.

Mr. Fortier: Are you suggesting if anyone wishes to launch a newspaper in a community at before doing so he should assure himself it has minimum number of advertising contracts?

Mr. Auger: Well, it would be difficult to get the advertising contracts but yes, he should have assurance he would get a lot of local advertising or confident he is going to get it because he won't live without it.

Mr. Fortier: It is like the chicken and the egg. The advertisers for their part will not agree to advertise unless they know what the market is going to be.

Mr. Auger: Yes. You will recall there was the newspaper launched in New York that was going to survive without advertising and they found the readers would not buy it. PM, it was called.

Senator Prowse: That was quite a while ago?

Mr. Auger: It was 1948, or something. They had a lot of backing but the public didn't buy it because it didn't have advertising in it.

Mr. Fortier: We had the case of Le Nouveau Journal in Montreal a few years ago. This had very extensive financial backing but one of the reasons—no advertising.

Mr. Auger: Yes.

The Chairman: May I ask a question on advertising? I am sure you think newspaper advertising is a fairly effective form of advertising?

Mr. Auger: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: How does the Southam Company sell national advertising? What is the sales organization?

Mr. Auger: The Southam Company has the national advertising sales office in Toronto with a staff of people calling on the users of this class of advertising and a similar office in Montreal, and these people travel over Ontario and Quebec selling the virtues of advertising in Southam newspapers across the country. This office does not service the Vancouver Province or the Vancouver Sun or the Pacific Press. We have salesmen in Toronto selling on behalf of the Vancouver papers and similarly a man in Montreal.

The Chairman: If I am an advertising agency in Toronto and want to place an insertion in all the Southam papers, I must call the Southam Company and the Pacific Press representative? I cannot say to Southam "Put me in the Province too"?

Mr. Auger: I think you can. Just one more phone call and he would be there awfully fast.

The Chairman: I will return to the question you were talking to Mr. Fortier about. How much national advertising is carried in the Province that is not carried in the Sun in an average in a week?

Mr. Auger: In the year 98,000 lines last year.

The Chairman: That is the answer we wanted, thank you. There was an appendix to the Southam brief this morning on The Effects of Common Ownership on Media Content and Influence, George H. Litwin, Harvard Business School. I am sure you are familiar with that.

Mr. Auger: Yes.

The Chairman: It starts off:

"The mass media have less influence on thought and behaviour than is popularly believed..."

Do you think your advertising representative would agree with that? Do you think that is an effective sales tool, that statement?

Mr. Auger: I don't think that statement was made in connection with maybe creating a buying impulse or communicating information about bargain basement sales. I have seen a small newspaper ad tear down a merchant's store.

The Chairman: So have I.

Mr. Auger: I don't think that is what is intended there. I read that and I think what it said—I mentioned a moment ago—I think the public tends—some people tend to over-estimate this power of the press. I think it is the power of the information the press conveys that is confused with the powers of the press itself.

The Chairman: Including advertising.

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator McElman: On the matter of the power of the press you place great emphasis on it in the latter part of the remarks. Just to keep it in balance, you are the second or perhaps the third publisher that I have had to correct in getting it back into its context. The reference was to "potential power". Emphasis was placed on the potential and some publishers have published that the emphasis was placed upon the potential.

Mr. Auger: May I say, sir, that I don't think the potentiality is there.

Senator McElman: You don't think that the pen is mightier than the sword?

Mr. Auger: Well, the sword is not very mighty now.

Senator Prowse: It is a little old-fashioned. May I ask a question?

The Chairman: I think that Senator McElman is still proceeding.

Senator McElman: It is the fact at least that many of the leading journalists, television executives and performers, have come to the central part of the nation, particularly to the Toronto area, and to such a degree I understand they are referred to in terms such as the Vancouver Mafia in the Toronto area. Does this indicate any special or exceptional training that is going on in the Province of British Columbia that might be of interest to the rest of the nation? Is it exceptional or different?

Mr. Sherman: I don't think we do anything differently. I think we do it as well as anywhere else. I think there is always an attraction to working for the biggest of its kind and this is where the biggest papers happen to be.

Senator McElman: You don't see anything particularly significant in the training field itself?

Mr. Sherman: No, I don't.

Mr. Auger: I remember someone telling me one time that all the great bankers came out of the Maritime provinces. I think the C.P. is run by executives west of the Great Lakes. I don't think anybody in the head office was born east of Fort William.

Senator McElman: The way they treat the Maritimes I believe it.

Mr. Sherman: It would be interesting to see how many people we have on the staff who come from central Canada. There is a great flow in both directions.

The Chairman: May I ask one question? On page 9 in your brief you make reference to the statement I made that if the groups asserted there is editorial freedom within the member newspapers, it would be up to them to demonstrate the fact. You go on in the next four pages and you mention the Carter Report, postal rate increases, Arctic sovereignty, bilingualism, NATO, the Rhodesia problem and medicare. In each of these you demonstrate that member papers of the Southam family have had different views. What was the last issue on which the Southam papers all editorialized with like voices?

Mr. Auger: Probably on sin, or something like that.

The Chairman: That is it—motherhood and sin.

Mr. Sherman: It is so unusual I am sure you would all be aware of it. I think probably there were a number of reversals of fortune in the last general election. I think, if my memory is correct, that one way or the other everybody but one said Mr. Trudeau would be better than the alternative.

The Chairman: One didn't?

Mr. Auger: North Bay.

The Chairman: That is interesting. That is in effect in answer to the question.

Mr. Auger: As one after another fell away they were astonished.

The Chairman: I could ask a question at this point, but I am not going to.

Senator Prowse: The thing that I have been intrigued with is you say the Times fell because it didn't get department store advertising. Now what I am interested in is this: what degree of penetration, what percentage of penetration of the homes in Vancouver does the Province have and does the Sun have, and what is the total penetration of those two newspapers or was it at the time the Times thought of getting into the business?

Mr. Auger: It is about the same as then, around 92 per cent of homes as nearly as we can tell.

Senator Prowse: Which would be just about 10 per cent of the homes which would be in the market for a paper?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Really what happened then was the department store advertisers with another paper coming into that market would mean they would be buying ads which would be duplicating ads they were already paying for.

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And anybody that wanted to start a paper in an area where there already was one or more papers that were achieving pretty high percentage penetration of the market would have to fight that kind of resistance because it would merely add to the expenses of the store.

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Prowse: You would not have to fight to keep out a competitor, the advertisers would keep him out.

Mr. Auger: We were meticulous in doing nothing to prevent the fellow from succeeding; albeit we did not give him any hope but we were meticulous in doing nothing that could be said to frustrate this fellow's effort. Let us get this understood on the question of launching a newspaper—never in the last 30 or 35 or maybe 40 years has anybody launched a daily newspaper in North America successfully in a metropolitan community. There have been many efforts.

Senator Prowse: Probably for that reason...

Mr. Auger: Many efforts where they had much more capital and backing and knowledge and everything than that poor paper had.

Senator Prowse: What I am interested in is this is one of the factors that makes it most certainly improbable and almost impossible for any of the cities in Canada which now have one newspaper, where that newspaper has a reasonable degree of penetration and a reasonable degree of acceptance, of getting two newspapers in any foreseeable future under the conditions as they exist today.

Mr. Sherman: If there is a degree of penetration, as you say, and in the order of what we are talking about, any new product that comes in must be demonstrably superior to anything that is there before the people will start to buy it. The Vancouver Times was not demonstrably superior and the people did not buy it and therefore did not advertise in it.

Senator Everett: What circulation did it achieve?

Mr. Sherman: Around the 30,000 mark.

Senator Everett: What is yours?

Mr. Sherman: We were around about 120,000.

Senator Prowse: What was it, a different type of format?

Mr. Auger: We have nearly three or four hundred thousand. The two papers are nearly 300,000. They had to take readers away from one of them.

Senator Prowse: Did they use any give away process to get that circulation up to that? How did they get it up to 30,000 then?

They were able to get it to around that circulation without any real gimmickery.

Mr. Auger: I do not know how much was paid. They never had an audited circulation.

Senator McElman: Do you believe the format was a real factor in any reduction or lack of acceptance by readers of Vancouver?

Mr. Sherman: As an editorial man I would say one problem was the type of equipment they had.

Mr. Auger: It was very slow compared with ours. Their presses were very slow compared to ours.

I remember one celebrated occasion when the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada were coming out to Vancouver for a ceremony. They were arriving in Vancouver around mid-day. Now, the story the Times ran was written at 10 o'clock the night before. It took them that long to get their papers printed. And there is not a chance to put in any discussion for the reader that we were putting in.

You are missing all sorts of things that the other papers have.

Senator McElman: Aside from the equipment and the slowness of it, in the format itself there was no real exceptions, I take it, of the different presentation?

Mr. Auger: Well, the format itself was strikingly different.

Senator McElman: It was a full broad sheet?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator McElman: Oh, I see. I am sorry. I understood it differently.

Mr. Fortier: The Georgia Straight, the so-called underground paper, came into existence some three or four years ago and it attained at its peak a circulation, we are told, of some 60,000 readers.

Do you feel, gentlemen, that the circulation which The Georgia Straight attained is an indication that you were not rendering to your Vancouver reading public all the services which you could have been expected to render?

Mr. Auger: Well, if you call pornography a service, I think the answer is "yes".

Mr. Fortier: Is that your statement, that the whole of the Georgia Straight is filled with pornography?

Mr. Auger: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Sherman: There is a certain varying interest that would attract particular people to look and see and to read the thing.

Senator McElman: You do not mean there are 60,000 pornographic fans in Vancouver?

Mr. Auger: I do not think there are 60,000 fans of any kind in Vancouver.

Mr. Fortier: I think I interrupted you there, Mr. Auger. You were starting to talk about pornography. Were you going to continue?

Mr. Auger: No.

Mr. Fortier: I was just getting excited.

Mr. Auger: You know how the tickets are selling for "Hair" and "Oh, Calcutta".

Mr. Fortier: You do not feel that the rise of The Georgia Straight or, I should say, the happening of The Georgia Straight is indicative of the fact that the Province and Sun were not doing everything that they were supposed to do or they could have been expected to do as a reading public in the Vancouver community?

Mr. Auger: No, nothing about it, seriously.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to comment?

Mr. Sherman: I started to read it fairly regularly just to make sure that they were not doing things that we should be doing and I gave up reading it. I found nothing of any great significance in it.

Senator Prowse: That you were prepared to do.

Mr. Sherman: That we were prepared to do.

Mr. Fortier: What does give rise to a new paper, such as The Georgia Straight, in your opinion in a city like Vancouver?

I realize I could ask that question of publishers of newspapers in some five or six other cities in Canada. I think we would be interested in having your views. They are coming before this committee in March.

Mr. Sherman: Yes. I really do not know. I think one reason it stayed alive as long as it has done was police action that amounted more or less persecution at times and with the prevailing attitudes among many young people towards the police and law enforcement and the establishment, anything that tries to cater to their taste and then seems to be persecuted, arouses a fair amount of sympathy and lot of support.

Mr. Fortier: That argument would be valid after the fact of publication. My question is: Why did The Georgia Straight one day come into being before any persecution could be alleged? Why does it come into being in Canada in a city like Vancouver?

Mr. Sherman: I think you would have ask a sociologist, sir. I cannot answer that. It has happened in many American cities and obviously somebody thought that it worked there, we will try it here.

Mr. Fortier: As a publisher and editor in charge of a newspaper in a city in North America where it has happened, do you have any views?

Mr. Auger: I think it is a very common motivation for people to want to have a medium or a means, create a means of communication, whether there is a soapbox or a radio set, or a radio station, or a newspaper.

Newspapers of that character and size are bringing up every day. Somebody is motivated to start one.

Mr. Fortier: There were many lawsuits involving The Georgia Straight over the year.

Did the Province carry all references to all such lawsuits?

Mr. Auger: I don't remember any lawsuits but there were a couple of prosecutions for pornography, for publishing pornographic material. We did report the essentials of the court case in those cases.

I should also say we published editorials criticizing the city authorities for declining to grant them a business licence.

Mr. Fortier: That was on the distribution prohibition?

Mr. Auger: Yes. We thought that was wrong and we criticized that.

The Chairman: May I ask you: Your brief concludes on a very philosophical note and I think a very worth while note. I think you suggest trying to strive for several virtues, as I recall, one of which was an acceleration of the well-defined trend away from the trivial and routine.

would like to read a quotation which is from the October 1969 Fortune magazine. I am sure you are familiar with the report.

Mr. Auger: In the New York Times?

The Chairman: No. This was in Fortune and the title of which is "What is wrong with the news? It is not new enough?"

The subheading is: "Journalistic patterns developed for slower moving times are not now adequate to keep society in touch".

The quote I would like to ask about is this:

"Journalism has been almost silent about its own performance and its own problems. The pretense that it is an innocent witness, a mere fly on an historic wall becomes less and less plausible as the role of the milieu expands."

I sense, Mr. Auger, from the contents of the last several pages of your brief that you would agree with that statement. Is that correct?

Mr. Sherman: I certainly would. I think the whole pattern is changing and it has to change. This is the point we are trying to make.

The Chairman: So you do agree with that statement?

Mr. Sherman: In a general sense.

The Chairman: You say that the press is showing, not as in the past, a tendency of confessing mistakes and correcting their problem. Do you think that is also the case?

Mr. Sherman: We certainly do. I see this in a number of other papers.

Mr. Auger: I think there has been more self-examination in the realm of press in the last couple of years than I can recall before.

Senator Everett: Mr. Auger, do you have anything to do with the physical operation of Pacific Press?

Mr. Auger: Well, I am a director.

Senator Everett: In management terms, I mean, as the publisher of the Province?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Everett: Would you be as concerned with it as you would be if the mechanical side of your newspaper was run by your own operation?

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Everett: How do you share responsibility on that with the publisher of the Sun?

Mr. Auger: We have a general manager who is responsible for the operation of the physical aspects of the paper and he is in constant consultation with the publisher of the two papers in terms of providing the best service possible to the papers and we share with him the problems that he faces in doing the job.

Also, all our labour negotiations are on a joint basis by Pacific Press with all of the employees. We have eight unions, by the way, and labour negotiation comes under the direction of the general manager of Pacific Press, but it is handled by a separate labour negotiation department.

Senator Everett: Is the general manager in this regard then responsible to the two publishers?

Mr. Auger: No, he is not. He is responsible to the Board of Directors of Pacific Press, but he realizes his role is in service to the two newspapers.

Senator Everett: You were talking earlier today of labour practices which add to the costs of operating newspapers.

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Everett: Do you know of any such practices in Pacific Press?

Mr. Auger: Oh yes. We have them. We are limited to the extent to which we can adopt or bring in advancing technological and typesetting and newspaper handling and so on because of the union requirements on the number of men that are required to do a certain job. This is featherbedding or "make work for everybody", whatever you like to describe it.

The job can be done with less hands and some of the things we are literally forbidden to do at all because the union will not accept the idea.

Senator Everett: Can you give us some examples of what you are forbidden to do?

Mr. Auger: Tele-typesetting for the communication of news from Toronto or the Canadian Press, for example, comes over in a fashion that can be set right in type in our shop without having to be translated or manually set by a man after it arrives there.

We are forbidden to do that to the full extent that we could or what is available to us.

Senator Everett: This is not a case of providing jobs for those who are already there. This is a case of actually being prevented from bringing in a more efficient system. Is that correct?

Mr. Auger: They are using a more efficient system; efficient in terms of reduced manpower or greater speed, yes.

Senator Everett: In certain cases there is a certain freedom of formula. A company will bring in a new system which will cause people to lose their functions.

Mr. Auger: Yes.

Senator Everett: Those people will be employed in another function. They are guaranteed their job until they retire or leave the country.

Mr. Auger: We have had unions in...

Senator Everett: You are not talking about that, though. You are talking about...

Mr. Auger: We have had unions accept that in some circumstances where we are offering retraining at no reduction in pay that would put a man into the kind of work in another department, and some of it has worked out quite satisfactory.

In other cases, in the adoption of this new technology, we have promised that there would be no reduction in pay—no reduction in work for them, I should say.

Senator Everett: There are two further cases, I gather, from what you say. One in which you cannot enjoy any reduction in labour content by bringing in new technology and another in which your agreement states that you are not permitted to bring in new technology.

Mr. Auger: That is right.

Senator Everett: Regardless.

Mr. Auger: They are one and the same. The agreement prevents you from bringing in...

Senator Everett: Why are they one and the same?

Mr. Auger: I am sorry. You described one and the reason is that the agreement will not permit that to be brought in, that tele-typesetting.

Senator Everett: That would mean that number of unions would go out and strike you brought that in?

Mr. Auger: Well, just one and the whole bunch are out. There would be only one union affected, but that closes the whole place.

Senator Everett: I can see another situation in which you could bring in technology but you could not lay anybody off. You could realize a saving.

Mr. Auger: Yes, we have done that. We have done that in some cases and that has been acceptable. The unions have accepted that. We would not lay anybody off. We would only let natural attrition reduce the manpower. We did that. The Southam Company has done that throughout many of its plants but the other case I described is where it is flatly the union will not agree to handle.

Senator Everett: In your judgment has that other case substantially increased Pacific Press's costs?

Mr. Auger: It has increased cost. It is only one factor in keeping our cost up, yes.

Senator Everett: Would it be a fairly substantial factor?

Mr. Auger: Well, not as substantial as a rise in the price of newsprint or anything like that as substantial as a 17 per cent pay scale increase, or something. No, but the wages of our men today may be $50,000 a year. Fifty thousand dollars is substantial in there by itself.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

The Chairman: I am anxious to turn to the Hamilton Spectator. I think Mr. Fortier has more question for the Province.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. There is some flow of news from east to west. I have been reading recently of a slowdown at Pacific Press.

Could you tell us, Mr. Auger, what the nature of the labour problem is that there is in Vancouver now?

Mr. Auger: We started negotiating with our unions, five of our eight unions, for a contract that expired on October 31. We did not reach an acceptable agreement with those unions by October 31, so we carried on. After about a month of continual negotiations—and I might say we had something like 16 negotiating meetings—negotiating with this particular contract.

After a month of continuing to endeavour to come to an agreement, we were told directly by the union they were going to "either we better come to terms or else, and the other else" was a slowdown.

A paper that normally gets out at five o'clock in the morning did not get out until nine o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Fortier: There were some days where the newspaper has not been published, I believe.

Mr. Auger: There was one day where I believe part of the Sun did not get distributed—part of the Sun's total circulation did not get distributed. We did not miss a day but we certainly suffered many, many hours of delay.

Mr. Fortier: This "working to rule", I suppose, or "slowdown", is it still on at the moment?

Mr. Auger: No, it has stopped. This was in the first two weeks in December and we complained to the president of one of the international unions. We had to go to Washington, D.C. to settle the thing.

Mr. Fortier: You complained to Washington, D.C. about a slowdown in Vancouver?

Mr. Auger: Yes. The orders came back from Washington to that particular union to cut it out and it stopped.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know with whom you dealt? Do you recall with whom you dealt in Washington?

Mr. Auger: A man named like Fabricio.

Mr. Fortier: What was his position in the union?

Mr. Auger: President of the International Pressmen's Union.

Mr. Fortier: And since these instructions from Washington, you did not suffer any slowdown.

Mr. Auger: I must assume they were instructions. We must assume there were instructions.

Mr. Fortier: You knew where to go.

Mr. Auger: Well, we tried everything and that seemed to work.

Mr. Fortier: It worked effectively in the sense you have not had to suffer any...

Mr. Auger: As far as the press room slowdown is concerned it apparently worked. We had a slowdown in other areas but about mid-December they declared a moratorium on negotiations and suspended any further harassment or sabotage and we have been very good so far.

Mr. Fortier: So I guess you would have to say the unions do have "potential raw and unadulterated power."

Mr. Auger: Don't you ever doubt it.

Mr. Fortier: Pardon?

Mr. Auger: We have, I will tell you, eight unions. One of them consists of only four or five people and that union can fail to come to terms and can put a picket in front of our door and we are closed down.

Mr. Fortier: You alluded to this factor that...

Mr. Auger: Twelve hundred people are out of work and the whole community is without its newspaper. That is power.

Mr. Fortier: Unless the word comes from Washington.

Senator McElman: Did you in fact publish in your newspaper about having to go to Washington for a solution of the problem?

Mr. Auger: No. I didn't think...

Senator McElman: Why not?

Mr. Sherman: This was something that was being handled by the General Manager of Pacific Press. All the major news that happened during the slowdown were reported in the normal way by our labour reporter.

For whatever reason he thought best, the General Manager did not wish to announce this to the outside world. Presumably it was a matter of tactics, as far as he was concerned.

Senator McElman: Surely this would be hard news to the Canadian people.

Mr. Sherman: It is one thing to say that we have complained. It is another thing to say that this has worked. We do not know that there ever was a reply so we would be dealing in speculation, sir.

Senator McElman: Excuse me, but your publisher was not speculating. He stated a fact.

Mr. Fortier: He said he must assume there was a reply showing cause and effect.

Senator McElman: I am sorry. He did not say "he assumed". He said he did.

Mr. Auger: No, I am sorry. Mr. Fortier said there was a reply and I qualified and I said "we had to assume there was a reply".

The Chairman: I think this is correct.

Senator McElman: I am sorry. I did not mean to misinterpret.

Senator Prowse: I have a question.

The Chairman: Well, at this point I am very anxious to turn to the next witness, but if you feel it is of sufficient importance to ask it, please ask it.

Senator Prowse: No. It is about the price of newsprint.

The Chairman: I think we have dealt with that.

Thank you, gentlemen. I am going to call on the representatives from the Hamilton Spectator.

Thank you both.

The Chairman: At this time on my immediate right is Mr. T. E. Nichols, Vice President and Publisher of the Hamilton Spectator. On his right is Mr. Gordon Bullock, the Managing Editor of the Hamilton Spectator.

I would begin, Mr. Nichols, by apologizing to you for the fact we are running somewhat behind and I am sorry. It is certainly not a question of the last being least or the least being last.

Mr. T. E. Nichols, Vice President and Publisher, The Hamilton Spectator: Frankly Senator Davey, I am delighted. I realize how people feel here. I have been sitting with everybody else since ten o'clock this morning and while you might find a lot wrong with the Hamilton Spectator, I suggest we could send someone from Hamilton to give you a few tips on air conditioning. I would be delighted to do it.

I have no written prelude to my brief. I don't know how many people have read it. I will admit it is not the most fascinating document I have ever read but it gives the vital statistics of our situation where we are the only paper published in the City of Hamilton. We are in an area where we have 14 daily newspapers within 40 miles of us. Not all of them can be considered as competitive and frankly I don't take any of them very seriously. The Toronto papers, by their own admission, are the best in Canada, but even at that although we never put booby traps on the Queen Elizabeth, I rely on the high intelligence of the people of Hamilton to see that our circulation grows.

I think one of the most intelligent things ever heard stated about newspapers is "the press has no press". It was said by a Dane.

I don't want to add to the Niagara of platitudes about whether the press is doing a good job or a fair job, or whether a monopoly is a good thing or a terrible thing. I think by this time you must find it a bore and I don't want to make it any worse by these extraneous generalities.

Our paper in Hamilton relies for success I think almost overwhelmingly, on the local news we give to the people. I think the local news is most important. We run on an average through the year about 24 solid pages of editorial material a day. That is about 190 columns, which is about the equivalent of the New York Times. My editor and I figure that local is about 60 per cent of it. If you had any young Canadian lovelorn writers we would be happy to consider them.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Nichols: We have some good local ones. One of our strictest policies, one I have tried to enforce in the Hamilton Spectator, is that our news should be divorced completely from the editorial page, that is the opinion. Both the editor in charge of the editorial page and the managing editor report directly to me and the columnist who writes under his own name is given a good deal of latitude, but in so far as news is reported for the people of Hamilton, I want them to tell the people of Hamilton just what went on in City Hall or the courts or public meetings, and please try and leave prejudices out of it.

Now one of what I call the monstrous platitudes about the press is largely our fault. We have built up the idea that freedom of the press is some beautiful Magna Charta that lets us do anything we like. Of course that is rubbish. As a matter of fact the press really has no rights in the sense you can call rights legal rights. I don't know of any, Mr. Fortier. We can be kicked out of Parliament or the City Hall or any courts. We simply have the rights of any citizen to listen to a matter of public importance and report on it. Actually the key to the freedom of the press—and I think this is important—historically is that we should have no special licence to publish. In other words, if somebody eventually comes into Hamilton and pushes me out—I am getting a little on in years—and runs 97 pages of advertising and one of pornography (and what a lovely deal that would be) he has the right to do it.

The Chairman: Do you think that would be in Hamilton?

Mr. Nichols: They could try. I am just giving you a tip.

Another thing that has been spoken about is dissent. A newspaper is itself an organ of dissent. It is full of dissent. Most people complain there is too much dissent in it, too much criticism. Somebody talking about Alberta cattle—we would love to run stories on that...

Senator Hays: I will give you the information.

Mr. Nichols: It will cost you something! I remember some years ago—this bears on this so-called constructive news and people throwing bombs in mailboxes—it was quite a hot summer day and this book—I forget what it was, something about the Canadian Arctic or a coloured album of Canadian toadstools or something bloody awful. A young girl got the job—the older guys knew better—and she started off her review on this ponderous book "This book must be read to be appreciated".

You laugh. You must remember that the younger generation has some very wise thoughts. There is no sense publishing things in a newspaper that you know darned well are not going to be read. It is too bad when, for instance, something appears in our paper about some minor thing like the blowing of a $2 million computer in Sir George Williams and we leave out some speech on the decline of morals in Vaudreuil by a member of the Liberal party. We would be quite happy to do it, but I don't think anybody would read it. We have to present papers that are going to be read otherwise there is no point.

Now of all the demonology about the press, the idea that the advertiser sometimes directs our news or influences us, or has some bearing over policies, that is without doubt the most idiotic. Can you imagine, for instance, the manager of the Royal Department Store in Burlington picking up the Spectator in the evening and saying to his wife "My dear, did you see what this idiot, this idiot Nichols has written..."

The Chairman: So far I can imagine!

Mr. Nichols: I am going to be kind to you.

"He says because of the magnificent job that is done by the Senate of Canada their salaries should be doubled and if at the age of 65 they survive their arduous job they should have a pension of $50,000 a year. I will take out my advertising for a month." Well, he does it and at the end of ten days when I meet the new manager of the Royal Department Store he may have an utterly different idea. He may have a brother in the Senate—we are all human!

Now, press council? I am all for it. God help the people who have to run it but I think probably it is a good idea.

Now have you got some things to ask me?

The Chairman: I am not sure! I think, Mr. Fortier, perhaps I could ask the first question.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I wish you would.

The Chairman: You would agree then that you have a local newspaper monopoly in terms of coverage of the Hamilton area?

Mr. Nichols: The only newspaper published in the City of Hamilton.

The Chairman: So you say in an ad here "The newspaper that gives you Hamilton's undivided attention". Is that the slogan you use?

Mr. Nichols: That is to sell advertising.

The Chairman: You use it to sell advertising?

Mr. Nichols : Oh, sure.

The Chairman: The reason I bring this up is this is a full page spread which ran in a recent copy of Marketing, November 1969. The reason I am quoting it is that it reminded me a great deal of trouble I got into with something similar to this and I will quote it:

"See the Hamiltonian. He lives and works in Hamilton. Hamilton is not like other metropolitan cities. It has the highest average weekly income. Spend Hamiltonians. Spend. If you had his money you would spend too. Wealth, wealth, wealth. He is part of a billion dollar market. If he sees something he wants he buys it. If you have something to show him use the Spectator. Read, read, read. Ninety per cent of Hamilton reads the Spectator. This is known as penetration. Aren't you glad you know about Hamilton? The Spectator."

The reason I bring this up is I got into a great deal of trouble with a similar approach.

Senator Prowse: Does it say what colour?

Mr. Nichols: I admit it is pretty awful.

The Chairman: Well, I agree with you.

Mr. Nichols: I am glad you do. You are very reasonable fellow.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Nichols, by all accounts you have a very successful and very respected newspaper in Hamilton.

Mr. Nichols: It is successful. I don't know how much it is respected, but I am very glad you made that remark.

Mr. Fortier: It is respectable?

Mr. Nichols: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And respected?

Mr. Nichols: I hope so.

Mr. Fortier: If you were publishing a new paper in Toronto how would you go about it? Would you publish the same sort of newspaper giving the local news content?

Mr. Nichols: Do you mean if I was competing—do you mean if I suddenly took over the Telegram or the Star, which is highly unlikely, would I run the same kind of paper I do in Hamilton? Yes, I would. I think probably would lead the field.

Mr. Fortier: You are not doing anything particular in Hamilton that you would not if you were publishing another newspaper in a community anywhere in Canada?

Mr. Nichols: No, I don't think so, Mr. Fortier. It is a highly hypothetical question. I don't want to say anything that is not flattering to my neighbours but I would be glad to see them disappear from our area. The Toronto papers really don't concentrate too much on local news. In many ways they are good papers, excellent columnists, and I think the Globe and Mail gives excellent Canadian coverage and I like things in both the Telegram and the Star, but the localness of the Hamilton Spectator is what I believe is the main purpose of a newspaper. I think it is the most important thing of all. It is a microcosm of life, of what goes on in the courts and councils and general marketplace. Its enforcement of law is immediately coherent to the average man. In effect the local news is the real thing he is most interested in. The further you get away the more abstract and complicated it becomes. So, quite frankly, I feel the duty of a newspaper like ourselves in the City of Hamilton is first of all to cover the city.

Mr. Fortier: Stress the local things?

Mr. Nichols: Exactly. It has worked. I will be frank—I am sure this is why we have been so successful. Now I don't think you mean that we have just done it because of that. That is my philosophy in publishing a newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: If you were aiming at a large market as in Montreal or in Toronto, are you saying that the accent on the local news would not be as pronounced?

Mr. Nichols: Well, I think, for instance, the Montreal Star is an example of a newspaper that gives a lot of local news. This is a little unfair. For instance, the Toronto Globe and Mail calls itself a national paper and in large part it is. I think it gives good coverage of Canada. The Telegram is a different type of paper and the Star is a different type of paper again. I would hate to say, although I read them every day, that the Toronto Star does not give the news of Toronto the way that Montreal Star does in Montreal. It doesn't cover Toronto the way we cover Hamilton.

Mr. Fortier: What I particularly retain from what you said is that given the City of Hamilton, relatively speaking a smaller city, your first concern is to inform your readers about what is going on in the locality?

Mr. Nichols: Yes, that is right. And more than that—the technique of writing. I have been in journalism for 40 years, except for five years in the navy in the war, and most of the years I have been a writer. I think even in our editorial writing when you are trying to develop some ideas you should give it the local tinge. I don't know whether I am putting it very well, but I am trying to stress that if the news becomes abstract people just won't read it. They have to have some real thing to tie to.

Mr. Fortier: You allude the editorial content. In so far as editorializing is concerned, would you also stress the local stories?

Mr. Nichols: Oh, yes, absolutely. They are the important things. We stress other things too but to wonder off into things about the British labour party—all of which are very important—to me is a waste of time. I don't think it is your first duty to the reader. We do editorialize locally very heavily. You can call this "a village pump paper" if you like and I would be very happy. I believe it is the duty to be people of Hamilton.

Mr. Fortier: With respect to news coverage and with respect to editorializing.

Mr. Nichols: Yes. Tremendous letters to the editor and if they spill over the editorial page we might run a whole page.

Mr. Fortier: I think this is the place to introduce, Mr. Nichols, the subject of a story which was published in the January issue of Maclean's magazine and which concerned something which occurred in the City of Hamilton. I think this is a natural place to do so... (in view)

Mr. Nichols: Yes; and I am glad you brought it up. I think this is the first time anything like this ever happened to me.

The Chairman: I would like to ask a question, but if you wish to say something before the question.

Mr. Nichols: If you don't mind I would. I would like to say something. I know it is terribly elementary and I don't need to stress that the privileges in this hearing are the same as in the House of Commons and anything said, implied, or any innuendoes can be published in newspapers and I have no recourse unless there is an inaccurate report of what I said. Is that correct?

The Chairman: That is absolutely correct.

Mr. Nichols: I would ask then—I have been very impressed by the fairness of these hearings—I would ask that you bear that in mind. I am not too worried about what the Toronto newspapers might do about it, but anything I say, you understand, will go into the public press. I don't like to start off this way. I haven't any qualm whatsoever if what you are going to ask me is what I expect. There is one other thing, if you don't mind. I knew nothing about the Maclean's article until I saw it. I knew nothing about it being brought up here until about five days ago. If what you are going to ask me is if we did not protest one of our men being excluded from a preliminary hearing—that is my baby.

Mr. Fortier: I will ask you the questions.

The Chairman: It might be useful at this point, if you would not object, Mr. Nichols, if in putting the question Mr. Fortier were to acquaint the other senators and others in the room with the facts.

Mr. Fortier: I shall be very brief. Let me please make my preliminary remarks in the form of questions to Mr. Nichols. The points which were raised in this article, published in the January issue of Maclean's are of tremendous importance to this committee.

Please understand me that I am not at all interested—and when I say “I” that is the Papal “I”—the committee is not at all interested in the facts which led to the arrest of certain people in the City of Hamilton. That is of no concern to the committee. Furthermore, the way the trial or preliminary inquiry which followed was conducted is of similarly no concern to the committee. I want to make this very, very clear. The only concern which the committee has, because of its terms of reference, is with respect to certain allegations in that article which has to do with a reporter's relationship, should I say, with his publisher. It is only within this context that I would like to ask you some questions today.

Mr. Nichols: Yes. Excuse me, Senator Davey, in view of what this is, I quite understand that you are not interested in the actual procedure of the trial or the integrity of the court, which was the main challenge in that. Would it perhaps be in order, would you permit me to very briefly say why I didn't protest this...

The Chairman: Let him put the question.

Mr. Nichols: It is all right. It is pretty important.

Mr. Fortier: If you wish to make a general statement after I phrase the question I am sure the chairman will deal with that. Firstly, I would ask you this—I have been careful to write them down—you have had a reporter on your staff by the name of Mr. Brooks; is that correct?

Mr. Nichols: That is right. He is still on the staff.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Stuart Brooks.

Mr. Nichols: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: How long has he been working with you?

Mr. Nichols: Four or five years.

Mr. Fortier: What was his assignment during December 1968 and the calendar year 1969? Did he have a particular assignment?

Mr. Nichols: Court reporter.

Mr. Fortier: With respect to this particular story which was filed, which was published in Maclean's and which I understand you read...

Mr. Nichols: Yes, I have read it.

Mr. Fortier: Dr. Mr. Brooks at any time submit any news story to you or to his editor with respect to those facts which led to the arrest of certain people in the City of Hamilton?

Mr. Nichols: Yes, he did.

Mr. Fortier: Were those stories published in the Hamilton Spectator?

Mr. Bullock: Could I jump in there?

Mr. Nichols: Would you excuse me a minute? This is divided into two distinct areas... what I did; that I did not protest the exclusion of our reporter from the preliminary hearing.

Mr. Fortier: This was not my question at the moment.

Mr. Nichols: But apart from that you could see the short notice that I was given about this. I have hardly had time to go through the massive evidence in the McMurrich file. I am surprised that when Senator Davey, as I understand it, asked Mr. Brooks for a report on January 2 that I was not given the same chance to give a report myself.

Mr. Fortier: I think Senator Davey could comment on that.

The Chairman: I received a telephone call here in Ottawa which was purported to be from Mr. Brooks. The call came here in Ottawa and marked from Mr. Brooks. I returned the telephone call. I had told Maclean's. I had not read the article. I did not know the name Brooks at all. From Toronto I returned the call to Mr. Brooks and he said that he had not placed the call to me and he said “I don't know who did, but anyway I am sure that is what it is about.” Then he proceeded to talk about the incident, pursuant to which I read the article in Maclean's. Then when we returned here after Christmas at a meeting of our committee, it was agreed that this would be a matter which you would expect to be questioned on, particularly given the public exposure of this entire matter in the January issue of Maclean's in an article. We felt this was something you would expect to be asked questions on and then we subsequently decided it might be useful to have Mr. Brooks on hand on this particular day in case there were questions we wanted ask him. It was at that point I felt I should inform you of that invitation, which I did.

Mr. Nichols: The only question I have is: Did you ask him for a report?

The Chairman: No.

Mr. Nichols: You didn't?

The Chairman: No. By "a report" what do you mean?

Mr. Nichols: Did you ask Mr. Brooks to give you a report of this case?

The Chairman: I am sorry.

Mr. Nichols: January 2.

The Chairman: Yes. I misunderstood the word "report". No. I said to Mr. Brooks, I informed Mr. Brooks that I was sorry I was not familiar with the thing; that I had not read the article in Maclean's; that I would make a point of reading the article in Maclean's and it would be useful to send a letter, which he did.

Mr. Nichols: Yes. The reason I had to bring this point up at this stage is this is what you want to know about news that did not appear. Mr. Brooks knows all about it. I haven't had time to read the massive pile of evidence in the McMurrich case. I hope you all are asking about this other. That is important.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Nichols: Will you give me the question? I have forgotten.

Mr. Fortier: My question was: Did Mr. Brooks submit any news story on—what do you call it?

Mr. Nichols: The McMurrich case.

Mr. Fortier: Did he submit any story to you as his editor-in-chief?

Mr. Bullock: Not to my knowledge directly. Indirectly it came to me, yes.

Mr. Fortier: At what time? At what point in time?

Mr. Bullock: Approximately, I am only guessing now, March 1969.

Mr. Fortier: And how many stories does he submit to the newspaper?

Mr. Bullock: On this particular—he submitted several stories.

Mr. Fortier: Were any of them published in the Hamilton Spectator?

Mr. Bullock: To the best of my knowledge some of them were.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have a breakdown of how many stories were submitted and how many published?

Mr. Bullock: No, I do not.

Mr. Fortier: You are saying that the Maclean's article—as you will recall, it is not the Maclean's article, it is the letter from Mr. Brooks of which you received a copy?

Mr. Bullock: No, I haven't received a copy.

Mr. Fortier: Did he not give you a copy, Mr. Nichols? Did you get a copy of Mr. Brooks' letter to Senator Davey?

Mr. Nichols: No. None of these things have taken place with my knowledge.

Mr. Fortier: My question stands on its own two feet. Did you refuse at any time to publish any news story?

Mr. Bullock: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And why?

Mr. Bullock: On the advice of the papers lawyer.

Mr. Fortier: These were stories...

Mr. Bullock: A story. To the best of my knowledge one story.

Mr. Fortier: So you did on one occasion refuse to publish a story from Mr. Brooks on the advice of your solicitors?

Mr. Bullock: Right.

Mr. Fortier: And to the best of your recollection this only happened on one occasion; is that correct?

Mr. Bullock: We have only refused to publish one story regarding the McMurrich murder trial on one occasion prior to the trial on the advice of our solicitor. That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Did you ever editorialize on Mr. Brooks being prevented from attending the trial?

Mr. Nichols: No, we didn't. I will make this story very brief. On December 28, 1968, I think it was, in a dramatic and very ugly shooting incident in the mountain area a policeman named McMurrich was shot and killed and another man also shot. Now I don't think the times are important. The Spectator had always up to that time taken a strong editorial stand opposing the publication of evidence at a preliminary trial on the grounds it could jeopardize a man's hearing before a higher court.

Now I think I am right, you can correct me if I am not, but at that time there was some ambiguity in the laws about a man being in a preliminary hearing and being refused the right to give the evidence, the story, to his paper. I think I am correct.

Mr. Fortier: I am listening.

Mr. Nichols: Anyway, we had always strongly opposed the publishing of evidence at a preliminary hearing. Now instinctively when I heard that our man was not being allowed in the court I telephoned John Robinette, who I consider one of the wisest advisers in the area of law that I know of in Canada. I said I was deeply concerned about it and in fact did he think that we might get a Supreme Court order forcing the lower provincial court to allow our man to go in. John Robinette said no, he didn't think it stood a chance.

In the meantime something had happened that makes decisions by a publisher very difficult. I think you will understand when I tell you very briefly the reason.

The case had aroused a great deal of emotion in Hamilton. We had right after started a public fund for the education of the children of the bereaved policeman McMurrich, partly because we have been and I am still utterly appalled at the indifference of the state to the fate, to what happens to the widow and the children of men who are killed in the line of duty. There are a lot of people who hate the police, a lot of people in Hamilton who hate the police. We did that and I thought that it had, in the light of what was going on, involved us emotionally in this case. More than that, we were being attacked bitterly over the radio by one of the defence counsel on the grounds that we were stirring up feeling against these men and being very over-good to the police.

Now I thought then and I know now that it was the counsel for the accused and not the Crown, that pressed for this in camera hearing.

Mr. Fortier: Well according to the Maclean article...

Mr. Nichols: I don't know what Maclean wrote and I am not interested. I believe that. In view of the fact that we had made a lot of noise about it and there are lots of voices in Hamilton I felt, and so did my editor E. Gold, who is very bitter about this and would like to appear before the committee, we believed that in light of our editorial stand on the evidence we should not press the case.

Now the trial went on before a higher court and the sentences of the men ranged from 14 to 11 and down. You know all about that. Even then though a good many people felt that we should have protested the leniency of the sentences. I felt in the light of our involvement it was not worth it and I was not sure that we were that lenient. These are things you have to decide.

I think of the primary duty of the press always in these cases so far as possible to protect the rights of the accused to a fair trial. I had a very uneasy feeling in the light of the emotional involvement to the McMurrich funeral and the attack on us, and Robinette's advice that it was just as well not to do anything about it. I did not. That was my stand. I would do it again. My conscience is absolutely clear.

Mr. Fortier: We are dealing on the one hand with the aspect of the publication of evidence at the preliminary inquiry. At that stage you have expressed your reserve even until the omnibus bill was passed in the fall of 1963 with respect to such publication in order not to prejudice the accused at a later date at the time of his trial. But are there not two issues? On the one hand the publication of evidence which transpires at the preliminary hearing. That is A. And B, there is the fact that the press was excluded from the preliminary hearing. I think these are two separate problems.

Mr. Nichols: Yes, they are.

Mr. Fortier: On the one hand you have expressed what your personal thoughts were and on the other hand I wonder if your reasoning was also valid for the actual exclusion of the press from the preliminary hearing. Did you feel that you could not in conscience comment editorially on that aspect of the case?

Mr. Nichols: You can comment on anything you like provided you are not in contempt.

overlooked saying something that you brought out. This very exclusion, this very banning of publication of evidence was in fact in the amendment to the Criminal Code which has passed recently. The Government did in fact amend the Criminal Code so that evidence at preliminary trial could not be published. The only time it can be published is if the accused was acquitted and a transcript of the evidence could be published for obvious reasons.

We had no status in this trial. We were just like members of the public and our position was there was absolutely no purpose to be achieved by making any kind of protest in the court itself.

Mr. Fortier: You said you had no status. As representative of your readers surely you did have status?

Mr. Bullock: This is the legal advice we received. You may take issue with it. It has happened since and again we were advised we had no status.

Mr. Fortier: Gentlemen, the legal advice you received I respect, and it is of no concern to me at the moment. I am asking you gentlemen the question as newspaper people, newspaper men. Did you feel that you could not have conscience comment editorially on the fact of the exclusion of your reporter from the preliminary hearing?

Mr. Nichols: I wish we could stick to that. That really is the key point. I was not going on about conscience. I said that in view of the emotional turmoil, in view of the fact that we were involved in it, in view of the fact that a great many people in Hamilton thought that we had jeopardized the right of the accused to a fair trial that I did not think we should add to the storm by attacking the court and the integrity of the court. Is that a logical answer?

Mr. Fortier: As a newspaper publisher?

Mr. Nichols: As a newspaper publisher, that was my decision. You don't need to talk about your conscience—I haven't any really left.

Mr. Fortier: Your conscience as a newspaper publisher?

Mr. Nichols: I have a conscience as a Canadian. This is the thing that has worried me and I don't like the way it is being done. I have no quarrel with Mr. Brooks. I trust him absolutely. I think he is an honest, honourable man. I think he did what he did because he felt it. You will understand in the light of the fact I knew nothing of the article before it was published, and I knew nothing about this until Senator Davey wrote me a letter last week, that I haven't had time to go through all that.

Mr. Fortier: As the only daily newspaper published in Hamilton, did you not feel, giving the previous answers which you have given, did you not feel that you had a special responsibility to alert your reading public on what was happening?

Mr. Nichols: Well, it was in the paper that he was excluded; wasn't it?

Mr. Bullock: Yes.

Mr. Nichols: That was all published. That is why I am sorry it is still hot in here but I want to press this very strongly that my editorial position was me—I did it.

Mr. Bullock: In the news columns, stories published ad nauseam on the fact the press had been barred.

Mr. Fortier: Did you, Mr. Nichols, ask Mr. Brooks at one time, or did Mr. Brooks at one time write you a letter to the editor, so to speak, which was published?

Mr. Nichols: Yes, it was published. I knew he was agitated about it. He is Yorkshire—I don't know whether he is Wesleyan—he is a man who takes these things seriously. He wrote a letter to the editor which was published. Apart from that I had no contact with him about this or anything else.

Mr. Fortier: Did you discipline Mr. Brooks because of the publication of the article in Maclean's magazine?

Mr. Nichols: No, he is still with us.

The Chairman: May I make a point clear. It is on the question: Did I receive a report from him? First of all, I didn't receive a report. I requested and received a letter. The reason I did not—I must confess I was perplexed what to do about that letter in terms of yourself. The reason I did nothing is he stated in the letter "I have nothing to hide. I have told my city editor I am writing you."

Mr. Nichols: Senator Davey, perhaps you misread the motive. I know something about the Canadian postal services...

The Chairman: The point is that I hope you will appreciate that if it appears we are trying to throw a curve at you we are not.

Mr. Nichols: The curve has been thrown. This is the type of thing the press is often blamed for. You can't drop acid into a cup; you can't ask a man if he has stopped stealing. This has hurt us and I am glad you brought it up. I want the Senate to know exactly what happened and why I did it. As far as the non-editorial protest—whether it makes any sense to you—there it is.

The Chairman: You took the position as a publisher?

Mr. Nichols: As a publisher. I think the decision not to publish something is a very serious one. I am quite aware of that.

Mr. Fortier: I think you should thank the committee for the opportunity of commenting.

Mr. Nichols: Commenting on what?

Mr. Fortier: As you did in answer.

Mr. Nichols: That I should thank the committee... I am overwhelmed with gratitude.

The Chairman: Let it be known that the request did not come from the Chair.

Mr. Fortier: Is Mr. Brooks still on the same assignment for the Hamilton Spectator?

Mr. Nichols: No.

Mr. Fortier: He is not assigned to the court run any more?

Mr. Nichols: No.

Mr. Fortier: When was he removed?

Mr. Nichols: About two weeks ago.

Mr. Fortier: Where does his responsibility lie now?

Mr. Nichols: General news assignments. Do you take any inferences from that? Are you implying any inference? Do you want me—or Gordon—to say why he was put on general assignment?

The Chairman: If you wish.

Mr. Nichols: Do you think it is advisable?

The Chairman: Excuse me, please. If the Chair may make some direction, Mr. Fortier is not a witness and I don't think you should put him in a position of asking him his view. If you want to amplify anything we will be delighted, but if you don't that is all right.

Mr. Nichols: I realize, although I have watched lawyers all my life I am not a strict legal procedurist.

Mr. Fortier: There is no strict legal procedure here. Please feel as the chairman said.

Mr. Nichols: I will drop it.

The Chairman: Do you have any further questions on this, Mr. Fortier, or other matters, before I turn to the other senators?

Mr. Fortier: Not for the time being, Mr. Chairman, no.

The Chairman: Is this a supplementary Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Yes. Mr. Nichols, did I understand you to say that when the court was ordered closed and the reporter excluded that you then telephoned Mr. Robinette and asked him first whether the court had the power to do that and his answer was it did and secondly, you asked him whether you could take action in court to have the court order to admit and his answer was you didn't stand a snowball's chance in hell...

Mr. Nichols: Not quite that.

Senator Prowse: Could you tell us the sequence?

Mr. Nichols: He told me in effect—this is hearsay and I don't want to say exactly—but my inference from what Mr. Robinette said was "You stand no chance whatever of getting into that court". He said "In my opinion you have no right and I don't think you would have a chance of getting a Supreme Court order to force a lower court".

Senator Prowse: That is what your lawyer told you?

Mr. Nichols: Yes. I could not get anywhere if I tried.

Senator Prowse: I am not sure that anybody can answer this, but perhaps somebody can if they happen to be called. Am I right in my understanding that the order for the exclusion came as a result of a request for the exclusion by the accused, the lawyer for the accused, which was concurred in and agreed to by the prosecution?

Mr. Nichols: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: Agreement of the lawyer in the court?

Mr. Nichols: That is my understanding. I have talked with the counsel for the accused and he confirmed that was the case in fact. They were very anxious, for reasons which eed not be brought up here, that it be held a camera. Later, for instance, they came to agreement to reduce the charge from capital murder to manslaughter. Under our laws you must identify the killer and prove premeditation.

Senator Prowse: Well, this gets into the technical end of it. I am dealing with this end of it.

The Chairman: Are there other questions on this or other matters that the senators have? Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Is it not a fact that the Crown initially suggested to the defence baristers that they do ask this? Did it not initiate in the Crown counsel? Is that not the case?

Mr. Bullock: I don't think it would be true to say they initiated it. They certainly concurred wholeheartedly with the suggestion.

Senator McElman: Why was Mr. Brooks transferred from court reporting to general news?

Mr. Bullock: Basically after this rather emotional period involving this case and the subsequent article in Maclean's magazine it was felt Mr. Brooks would be better off to take a break—certainly not necessarily a permanent one—away from the courts; for reasons which I don't particularly want to get into as it involves personalities. Really it would just do him good to get away from the scene he had become very personally involved in emotionally. It was not the first time that we had encountered this emotional involvement. Incidentally, it was on the very highest principles and I don't criticize him for this. After four years on the courts we felt that perhaps he should get away from it for a while and he would have a different viewpoint when he went back after covering, for instance, general news.

Senator McElman: Well, let the record be clear that there was no intent of discipline involved.

Mr. Bullock: As a matter of fact he got a good salary increase in January which is hardly the way to discipline anybody.

Senator McElman: I am saying for the record there was no intent of discipline in the transfer from one to another.

Mr. Bullock: No, not discipline.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions? If not does Mr. Fortier have one?

Mr. Fortier: This is on another point.

The Chairman: All right. It is late, Mr. Fortier, but all right.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Nichols, on page 12 of your brief you say under the heading "Staff Training" that you have already specialists in medicine, labour, business, conservation planning, and the rest; which impresses me no end. What are the qualifications of the specialists in these highly specialized areas?

Mr. Nichols: Well, they can be specialized in several different ways. For instance, our original medical man, who was succeeded by another, was a good example of it. He was interested in medicine and won a Southam scholarship and took a year in a Toronto hospital. Labour—because it is a labour town we pick about the best people we can find. Some of our labour reporters have gone right to the top. This does not mean necessarily that they are people who have been sent to universities, but they are adequate and intelligent people who understand things like town planning and conservation.

It is a good question, but that is about the only way I can answer it. We send them to seminars, we send them and pay for night classes at universities. We are working on this all the time.

Mr. Fortier: You try and educate the reporter who may come to you and say "I would like to do some work on labour"?

Mr. Nichols: Definitely, indeed we do. That is very important, because a man who likes it is usually very good at it. We are very happy with our staff.

Mr. Fortier: You have as an appendix to your brief, page 3A, what you call "Weekly Salary Ranges" and I feel compelled to ask you, after having looked at these figures, how you keep the good men, the good educated men that you have just alluded to, at these salaries?

Mr. Nichols: Actually at this moment I think I am quite correct that the base rate for what we call five-year reporters is the highest in Canada, higher than Toronto at this minute. Now when you get up into special writers, they are not in this thing, I don't think.

Mr. Fortier: We were astounded.

Mr. Nichols: I better get that one cleared up. Where is it?

Mr. Fortier: This is page 3A of the brief.

Mr. Nichols: Reporters from $185 to $223. That is the base rate, that is the minimum. That has nothing to do with specialists.

Mr. Fortier: I think you should tell us that.

The Chairman: I think he just has.

Mr. Nichols: Would you want our others? We work on the principle of a five-year reporter who has been with us five years, his minimum salary. I don't know anybody any higher.

Mr. Fortier: The highest salary paid a reporter at the Hamilton Spectator, as I see on page 3B, is $11,054.

Mr. Bullock: That would be for what you might call a senior reporter, not for the specialists.

Mr. Fortier: Where would you fit the specialists in this scale, sir? I am reading from your brief.

Mr. Nichols: I am sorry about it but you don't hold these people who can write unless you pay them.

Mr. Fortier: Some of our advisers were astounded when they saw these figures. That is why I am asking the question.

Mr. Bullock: If I may make a point, we have a specialist on the paper at the moment who we hired from another larger metropolitan city for more money than she was making in that city as a specialist.

Mr. Fortier: Are you saying this appendix here, pages 3A and 3B, dealing with salary scales, is not complete?

Mr. Bullock: Oh, no. These are scales, these are minimum.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry. I read here the word "high"—reporter with five years service or experience high $11,054.

Mr. Nichols: That is a senior reporter.

Mr. Fortier: This scale on this page I do not see any reference to what you call your specialists? Could you supply us with this supplementary information?

Mr. Nichols: Sure. We will give you whatever you like.

Mr. Fortier: It would be useful if you could. We were proceeding on the obviously wrong assumption that this was representative of all of your employees, which it is not.

Mr. Nichols: No.

Mr. Fortier: Will you please send in a detailed statement?

Mr. Nichols: Yes. You couldn't be righter. You couldn't hold them, that is all. We haven't lost anyone to another newspaper for two years, which I think is pretty good. No one editorial person to another newspaper in two years.

Mr. Fortier: I wondered how you were doing it.

Mr. Nichols: Well, Hamilton is such a nice town I suppose.

The Chairman: Mr. Nichols, I would like to thank you on behalf of the committee. I feel that your opening remarks were good for our perspective and I think the balance of your remarks were particularly frank and direct and we are grateful for that fact. All in all I think it has been a very useful day.

Perhaps to you, Mr. Balfour, I could express our appreciation to all the gentlemen who have been here today. I might say that from the committee's inception Southam Press Limited has been very co-operative and we have appreciated your co-operation.

I would point out to the honourable senators that the next session is a private one at 140 Wellington Street at 8.15 p.m. The next public session is at 2.30 tomorrow afternoon in this room, the Montreal Star. We are all meeting tomorrow night.

Senator Prowse: Could you stretch the 8.30?

The Chairman: Yes, 8.30 p.m.

The committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, January 28, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 2.30 p.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I might call the meeting to order. May I begin by making a very brief announcement? I would like to read a self-explanatory telegram from Mr. John Mooney of The Just Society Movement:

"We will be unable to attend on the 29th. Perhaps some future date might be arranged. John Mooney, Just Society Movement."

Perhaps I could then usefully outline the schedule for the balance of the week. Tonight at eight o'clock Senator Grosart, and at nine o'clock Earle J. Beattie, Professor of Journalism, University of Western Ontario.

Tomorrow morning at 10 a.m. the Canadian Society of Professional Journalists. At four o'clock tomorrow afternoon Mr. Donald Cameron, The Mysterious East.

Now the staff has attempted to move The Mysterious East presentation up to two-thirty to replace the Just Society who are now cancelled. However, The Mysterious East cannot be moved because of transportation schedules, and they have asked if we would mind meeting at four o'clock as arranged.

Tomorrow we will meet at ten o'clock and again at four o'clock. Tomorrow morning following the presentation of the Canadian Society of Professional Journalists we would like to meet in camera in this room for ten minutes, no longer than ten minutes, just before we break for lunch.

As you realize on Friday morning at 10 a.m. there is a brief from the Toronto Star.

This afternoon we are receiving the brief from The Montreal Star. Appearing on behalf of The Montreal Star on my immediate right is Mr. Derek Price, President. On my immediate left is Mr. Frank P. Walker, Editor-in-Chief, The Montreal Star. On Mr. Price's immediate left is Mr. David Ferguson, the President of Infocor Limited.

As you know, Mr. Price, the brief which you prepared was received three weeks in advance as we requested and has been circulated to the senators and presumably studied by them, and we now turn to you for an oral presentation which could take as much as fifteen minutes. You are free to explain or amplify the brief or say anything else that might be on your mind. Following that presentation there will be oral questioning by the senators who will be free to question you on the contents of your brief or the contents of other remarks you may wish to make.

Mr. Price, if you feel that any of the questions should be farmed out to Mr. Walker or Mr. Ferguson, please indicate.

Mr. Derek A. Price, President, The Montreal Star: Thank you, Senator Davey. I have a few comments that I would like to make before the question period. I would like first, perhaps to explain Infocor Limited, which is a company established by the owners of The Montreal Star to be responsible for the corporate planning and development of The Montreal Star.

Senator Davey, as you know, this is not our first meeting with the Committee. There was a visit by you to Montreal last summer at which time you met with some of our senior executives and toured our plant. Since then we have had several meetings with various meetings of the Committee as well as with your staff and your consultants.

The Montreal Star has taken the position of sympathetic support and encouragement of the work of this Committee. Although from time to time we have had difficulty answering certain of the technical questions regarding past operations, we have attempted to provide you with as much reliable information as we could develop.

We forwarded our written submission some weeks ago. As we say in that document, we admit that we have no clear answers about the important matters which you are studying. We can only tell you what we strive to do, but the final judges of what we do must be our readers.

In this submission we have not been able to comment upon certain of the specific questions listed in the guidelines provided by your Committee. We have not attempted to do so because in many cases we found them either too general or too specific; on the one side capable of a real answer only in a philosophic essay and on the other with a peremptory yes or no. Neither form achieves what form we assume you are seeking to achieve.

We can, however, give you a broad glimpse of the ideas and practices of The Montreal Star, an English-language newspaper published in Montreal with the bulk of its circulation on that island.

We have chosen to do so in the form of a brief essay, in the hope that those who choose to read it will be able to detect what animates the owners of this paper and their editors in their selection and presentation of the contents of the paper.

I could this afternoon, if you should wish it, read this essay to you; however, as you have stated, Mr. Chairman, you have had the brief for some time. I do think that this will probably not be a good use of the limited time which is available to us this afternoon.

We would, of course, welcome any questions which you might have regarding the submissions which we have made.

In this brief we set out what we wish to say to the Committee. We have attempted to describe the essence of our craft, its ideals and its limitations, and to indicate the pride which we have in our operation, while at the same time acknowledging with as much candour as possible the gap between our goals and our actual performance.

Realizing that we have not answered some of the specific questions of the Committee we prepared supplementary material which comments briefly upon each of the questions in order to provide you with at least some indication of our opinions and attitudes prior to our formal meeting this afternoon.

Again, I could read these partial answers, but I think you have already seen them.

As a sideline we have brought with us this afternoon copies of the front page of The Montreal Star which illustrate the manner in which we have handled certain news stories and events. We also have copies of our front pages of last week so that you can see how we have handled a not unusual week.

If you are interested in discussing this material or in the attitudes upon which these editorial decisions have been based, we are here this afternoon to answer these questions at least to the best of our ability.

In your letter of invitation of October 15 you indicated that you were particularly interested in the overall aspects of our corporate operations, including all our media interests. If I may, before proceeding with the questions, Mr. Chairman, I would like to briefly describe these interests to the Committee.

The Montreal Star was purchased in 1935 by Mr. J.W. McConnell and is now owned by a family trust, created for the descendants of Mr. McConnell. This family also owns the Montreal Standard Publishing Company which publishes Weekend Magazine, and operates a large rotogravure printing plant in suburban Montreal.

The Montreal Standard Publishing Company has a fifty per cent interest in Magna Media Ltd., a sales company established jointly with Southstar Publishers Limited, and a thirty per cent interest in Perspectives. The operation of The Montreal Standard Publishing Company is entirely separate from the operation of The Montreal Star and they, as you know, have prepared a submission to the Committee and will appear before it on March 3rd.

The owners of The Montreal Star also own Canadawide Feature Service Limited, which acts as a sales agent for The Montreal Star and certain other sources of editorial material and features.

At the present time we publish only a daily newspaper appearing six days a week, but for many years (ninety-nine to be exact; 1869-1968) we published The Family Herald, a national farm magazine. The Star also owns the Herald, a daily morning newspaper in Montreal which ceased publication in 1955.

Over the years we have had minor interests in other companies but none of these have been significant and, at the present time, we have no other interest in this industry other than those referred to.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that is really all wanted to say.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Price. Have the front pages in question been distributed to the senators? It might be useful, Mr. Speers, if we could see them. Thank you very much. I think, Mr. Price, that we will begin the questioning this afternoon with Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: Mr. Price, in your extremely articulate essay on page 3, item 6, you state in about the last sentence:

"We must seek and publish at least what we believe to be a version of it without fear and without favour; though here again there would always be some fear and indeed some favour."

I can understand the fear but I wonder if you would define the favour that is involved.

Mr. Price: I don't think necessarily there are favours involved. I think we are really saying at times this might happen unconsciously and not that I can recall.

Mr. Frank P. Walker, Editor-in-Chief, The Montreal Star: I think what was meant there and what was a fair conclusion from what was said is, you obviously have likes and dislikes. You have people that you like, things that you like, institutions that you like, and this is always reflected in some way, shape or form in what you do. It is not deliberate in some conspiratorial thing. It just is, and that is what we meant by that.

Mr. Price: If I could perhaps refer to question 8 in the questions we have, Senator Everett, I think we stated quite clearly that favour does not involve commercial considerations.

Senator Everett: I am sorry; I have difficulty hearing.

Mr. Price: We say in answer to question 8 that at no time did commercial considerations influence the contents of The Montreal Star.

Senator Everett: I think we appreciated that. It was just the fact the word "favour" was stated, and I think Mr. Walker has explained it.

Further down the page at item No. 7 you say:

"All viewpoints subject to the prejudices of those who direct them no matter how they may seek to submerge these prejudices in something close to objectivity."

It is plain through the essay that you try, as all newspapers appear to try, to achieve objectivity in their reporting.

You go on, and in item 9 say:

"On The Montreal Star this has meant, as we have stated in the past occasions, a shifting of emphasis from the so-called hard news to news qualified by interpretation..."

The issue of interpretive reporting is brought up in the Southam brief yesterday, and I would like to hear from you where does interpretive reporting stop and lack of objectivity begin?

Mr. Walker: I wish we knew. I would say that hard news in the traditional sense of it, as I was brought up to understand it, was often much more subject to misuse and mishandling than news qualified by interpretation where you explain the background, fill in details which are not present in the actual occasion or the speech or the event that you are covering. More and more the news requires that it be treated not as a simple "Who, when, what, or why" kind of performance but as a total picture.

I think the extreme case of what I am talking about would be the McCarthy performance in the States where hard news gave McCarthy a free run where interpretive news would have spiked him to the wall very quickly.

I think this would be the difference and the most obvious difference I can think of.

In most journalism, most newspapers, certainly ours, we try very hard to fill in the details to flesh out the story; create a rounded thing and not just either a skeleton or partial picture of the event. That is where interpretation comes in. That is where you can lose a lot of objectivity. Then you are calling in an extra quality of a man, an extra judgment. You have to watch the men you use; that is all.

Senator Everett: If that is so, then, in order to make the newspaper an articulate voice this would tend to suggest that the publisher and the editor exercise a far greater control over what the individual reporter writes than they may have in the past; is that correct?

Mr. Walker: No; I would say probably less control because the reporters are looser and their terms of reference are broader than they used to be. In point of fact, the control which used to be very direct in the old days is now much more fluid thing. I would think it has worked in exactly the opposite way.

Senator Everett: So the interpretation tends to be the reporter's own interpretation?

Mr. Walker: Yes, and should be.

Senator Everett: And should be?

Mr. Walker: Yes; he is there.

Senator Everett: Would it not be necessary for the owners and editors of the newspaper to be more watchful where there is interpretive reporting than they would have to be where there is objective reporting?

Mr. Walker: No. I would think it would depend then more on the kind of staff you have. You would go out to pick your staff on the new basis. It is a better-quality staff than it used to be. It is better-educated staff and the watching takes place at the hiring level; not later on in the production level.

The Chairman: I have two things I would like to add about that if I might. When Mr. Malone of FP was here he referred in his brief and spoke in his oral question—it is his phrase not mine—of “permissive reporting.” Is this what you are talking about? I must concede it was his words.

Mr. Walker: I really don't know what it means. We call it interpretive reporting by which a reporter is entitled to and allowed to and encouraged to go beyond the bare bones of his event. Now what “permissive” means in child-raising is one thing. I don't know whether it is the same in newspapers.

The Chairman: Arising out of Senator Everett's question, he referred to paragraph 7, the last two lines:

“All our viewpoints, subject to the prejudices of those who direct them, no matter how we may seek to submerge these prejudices, is something close to objectivity.”

You have a great deal to do with direction at The Montreal Star. What are your prejudices?

Mr. Walker: Oh, very broad on almost every issue, I think. After all, you don't stop being human because you become an editor. Part of the prejudice one has or should have as an editor-in-chief is the prejudice towards fairness, always getting as much into the paper as you can. My prejudices are not reflected in the news except in the sort of overall philosophy of the paper. I am interested in certain things and they do obviously get into the paper. I don't do the writing or the editing but it would be silly to say that one's views don't go through the paper. They do go through a paper.

The Chairman: I don't ask that question critically at all but it is not all the editors who have taken that position who have appeared before us.

Mr. Walker: Well, they may be more than human; I don't know.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Chairman, could I ask one supplementary question?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: You don't do the writing and you don't look at the copy but your view get into the paper. How?

Mr. Walker: Well, in the various editorial conferences: what we are going to do. Are we going to specialize in social projects? Are we going to work on the Canadian North? Are we going to do this or that? That is how the view gets in the paper, really.

Senator Prowse: Would I be correct assuming that what you are saying to us is your staff members under you, as a result of continual contact with you, get so you hope they understand what your thinking is and modify or mould their own thinking to some extent?

Mr. Walker: No, not their opinions at all.

Senator Prowse: Their attitude, perhaps?

Mr. Walker: No. The reverse works as well. They modify my attitude. But a great deal of our work in the paper in the last year has been on social problems, poverty problems. That would be my influence really, that I am interested in those areas. We work on them and so do a lot of our staff and editors.

Senator Prowse: You would be responsible for the general interest in the area and they would produce the detail?

Mr. Walker: They would do the work. I am just a thinker.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: In defining the actions of a good newspaper on page 5 you point out that The Montreal Star has undertaken many specific studies which it has published in separate pamphlet form. It has maintained bureaux in a wide range of world cities, where it doesn't have bureaux it has personal contact.

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Senator Everett: ...that its staff is allowed to travel extensively throughout Canada and abroad, and you leave the impression that these are some of the things that constitute a good community newspaper.

ad that The Montreal Star is just such a peer.

Now can the individual paper, if that is part of the definition of a good newspaper, do that? The Montreal Star does it but is this something that individual papers can do or is it rather a situation in which the individual newspapers for the most part do not have the resources to undertake and that this is an argument for chain or group ownership to give the individual newspapers an opportunity to partake in that sort of thing?

The Chairman: To whom are you putting the question?

Senator Everett: I will put it to either or both.

The Chairman: Mr. Price, perhaps I can turn to you.

Mr. Price: I can only talk for The Montreal Star on this but we can afford to do it and intend to do it and will continue to do it.

Senator Everett: I am accepting two facts. One, it is good management, good conscience; secondly, The Montreal Star is doing it but if that is part of the definition of a good newspaper what should other individual newspapers do? There are few of them that would have the resources to undertake that sort of endeavour. Does that mean that is a good argument for the chains owning individual newspapers so they could provide the services to the public?

Mr. Price: I cannot speak for other individual newspapers whether they could afford it; I don't know. As an independent newspaper we can continue to afford this and I think it is a necessity. I think Mr. Walker would agree. It is desirable in making a good newspaper.

As I say, the individual circumstances of each newspaper I couldn't really comment on.

The Chairman: Do you wish to add to it, Mr. Walker?

Mr. Walker: I think they could do more of it. There could be sharing arrangements. We have on occasion shared our copy with other papers and in turn have shared with us. I think if you really wanted to you probably could improve the batting average of most papers.

Senator Everett: Without putting them in a co position...

Mr. Walker: You would be limited but you could do more. I don't think there has ever been a question of not being able to do it if you work at it and tried.

Senator Everett: In your judgment do the chains do more for individual newspapers in this regard?

Mr. Walker: I can't speak for a chain. I have never worked for one of them; I have always liked to work for the independent paper. But I really don't know. I would hate to try.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier has a supplementary question.

Mr. Fortier: On that point, from the competitive point of view, do you feel that The Gazette has become a better paper since it joined the Southam Chain?

Mr. Walker: I couldn't answer that question.

The Chairman: Now, Mr. Walker, I am sure you read The Gazette every morning and I am sure you have an opinion. You mean you won't express it?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I won't.

The Chairman: Mr. Price, would you care to answer the question?

Mr. Price: Well, perhaps we became a better newspaper as a result of them joining the chain.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps Senator Fortier...

Mr. Fortier: Yes, Mr. Davey!

The Chairman: It was bound to happen sooner or later!

Mr. Fortier: That is what I hope.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: I would be interested in asking Mr. Walker this question: why does he prefer to work for an independent newspaper rather than one of the chains?

Mr. Walker: We did answer that in our supplementary material. I think that is about the best answer I can give.

Senator Smith: What you are saying is, this is a personal matter with you?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Senator Smith: It doesn't go any deeper than the material which we already have?

Mr. Walker: Yes. I really don't know about the chains—not having worked for them.

Senator Smith: I thought you might have a prejudice against chains for some reason or other that you had gathered from others employed on chains.

Mr. Walker: No.

Senator Smith: It would have been an interesting answer.

Mr. Walker: No.

Mr. Fortier: I think my question, Mr. Chairman, is justified by The Montreal Star's answer to question No. 2 where they say that...

The Chairman: May I say to the senators they have these answers in the black book; not in the brief.

Mr. Fortier: "Examples can perhaps be found where group ownership has led to improvements in newspapers". So it is on that basis I put the question. Your answer is: we have been forced to become a better newspaper or we in fact have become a better newspaper.

Mr. Price: I would like to think we were always in the process of becoming a newspaper even before the Southam chain.

The Chairman: Where are you quoting from?

Mr. Fortier: The bottom of page 2 in the question-and-answer document.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: I know we have gone over it earlier in your submission this afternoon but the Montreal Standard Publishing Company has what percentage of Weekend Limited, Perspectives Limited and Perspectives Dimanche?

Mr. Price: There is no Weekend Limited. Weekend is a publication published by The Montreal Standard Publishing Company and Montreal Standard owns, I would say, approximately 25 per cent of Perspectives Incorporated and the balance is owned by the French language newspapers and Perspective Dimanche is also a publication of Perspectives Incorporated.

Senator Everett: Of which you have...

Mr. Price: Twenty-five per cent.

Senator Everett: Roughly 25 per cent?

Mr. Price: I think it is about 23 per cent. I am sorry; I could supply that actual figure.

Senator Everett: What arrangement do you have on Weekend and Perspectives on the sharing of revenues?

Mr. Price: Senator Everett...

Senator Everett: If you don't want to answer the questions...

Mr. Price: It is not I don't want to answer them. We are appearing on March 7th and will be here at that time also and the whole question of the Montreal Standard Publishing Company will be covered at that time.

Senator Everett: I think that is fair. That is fine.

You will at that time deal with Media, naMedia and the printing arrangement of The Canadian?

Mr. Price: I would like to have the president of Montreal Standard at that time.

The Chairman: Mr. Price, I have had several notes and if you could speak louder they would be grateful.

Senator Everett: Through both your briefs Mr. Price, you deal with the issue that ownership of a newspaper or knowledge of the business or knowledge of the media business should not preclude those owners from moving into other fields that are similar where they would have expertise. I think we even accept the concept of cross-ownership in certain situations.

For example, on page 8 of your brief you say:

"We feel, furthermore, that the ownership of a paper should not preclude those safe owners from moving into other fields of information, that an arbitrary ruling based on a simplistic notion of monopoly, is not conducive to the greatest refinement of information. Those who show themselves responsible in the field should not be pushed aside in favour of those whose only qualification for ownership of the means of information is the availability to them of large sums of money. In a time of great technological change, one can be sure how information is being laid at the door of those who have their right to it. We ask this Committee to consider that old rules and old prejudices should not prevent what we believe to be the best equipped groups from using every means which are available."

Then in your supplement to the brief at question 4:

"The major problem which we face is the threat we may be prohibited from full participation as new systems of information evolve in our community and technology alters roles and the functions of the traditional media."

Further down at question 6:

"We do not know how these developments will specifically affect us except that our future plans must allow for increased investment to take advantage of technological innovation."

In that context I want to investigate it with you for a moment. What is Infocor?

Mr. Price: Could I ask Mr. Ferguson?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. David Ferguson (President, Infocor Ltd): Infocor in a technical sense is a parallel company to The Montreal Star, the same shareholders; it is a sister company.

Senator Everett: It has the same shareholders as The Montreal Star?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes; a parallel company.

Senator Everett: That is not The Montreal Star (1968) Limited?

Mr. Price: Yes, it is. The Montreal Star (1968) Limited. It was created a little over two years ago to be responsible for the planning of The Montreal Star and for the development. They have undertaken a considerable amount of research into the trends in our own industry and others to try and peer into the future to get some glimmer of understanding as to the events that may be coming along. That essentially is the role of Infocor—planning and research organizations.

In other companies, in other corporate structures, it might have been set up as a corporate planning group within it.

Senator Everett: Was there any reason for setting it up as a separate corporation? Again you can refuse to answer that question.

Mr. Price: I would say that there is a specific reason for setting it up in this way. As I mentioned, we have other interests. The Montreal Standard, whose future is also dependent on some planning. They will provide services to other companies in a consulting type of role to allow the operators to operate the company while Infocor spends the time on research and planning to make that material available to them.

The Chairman: Infocor will provide to other companies?

Mr. Price: To our companies.

The Chairman: Not outside papers?

Mr. Price: No.

The Chairman: Not outside papers?

Mr. Price: No. As I said, it would be the equivalent to setting up a planning group in a corporate structure. Infocor would conduct that research and provide that service to our own interests.

Senator Everett: Would the excerpt I have read from your brief enunciate the principle or principles on which Infocor is operating?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, I think so; but the brief and items that you read were specifically concerned with the comments and statements that one hears from time to time about multi-media ownership and the concerns that there are about the concentration of the voices, the channels of mass communication into the hands of a few companies.

Now we in our history have not participated; we haven't been multi-media owners.

When we have entered into ventures quite often they have been as with Weekend, cooperative ventures in participation with other publishers. We were essentially preoccupied, I suppose, with the creation of a daily newspaper and I think it is also fair to say that we shared, as we say in the same brief in the supplementary questions, we have shared the concern of people about the control over the channels of mass communication.

Our views as they evolved, and they have been evolving over the years, represent some change. First of all, we recognize as a corporation that we must compete with very formidable competitors who can take advantage of the economies that chain ownership provide or the economies and advantages that are derived from ownership of other media and we are concerned perhaps about the competitive trends, the prospects, if we are limited to this narrow base. That is when one looks at the corporation and its future.

I think there are other factors however that are operating here. We are not today as concerned as we were about multi-media ownership or the concentration of media in a community. I think the evidence is becoming quite clear that technology both in our own industry and in the printing industry is making it possible for there to be many voices in the community.

I think the thriving local newspapers, usually weekly in this country, are an example of this and that there are now each year more voices rather than less, although as you know there have been no increases in the number of daily newspapers.

Further, we are struck by what electronic technology is going to do. We have been very limited in the broadcast spectrum with the number of channels of mass communication that have been available. We were rightly concerned about the ownership of these and concerned about concentration, but we are quickly approaching the day when we will have not one or two television stations but twelve—twenty-two—twenty-seven—fifty-four. Technicians will go much further—fifty-four channels. Today we can produce, we can deliver, I am told by engineers, twenty-seven channels of television through cable into the television set.

That seems to me to indicate we now have many more voices available. So that our concern about participating in more than one media has been too much of a concentration in our community. Really, it does not seem to hold if we are but one, let us say, electronic voice amongst twenty-seven. It would be a different situation than one out of two or one out of three.

I think beyond that we are interested in how the daily newspaper is evolving; how it is changing; how the media—the things that the daily newspaper used to do, that we used to do, are now being done some of them by other media and done better than we can do them.

As Mr. Walker was saying earlier our role is changing and the way we report is being changed and I think our interest in other media is the interest to participate in these other forms of communication, to participate in the evolution of these services which we provide.

Mr. Walker and I have talked about this some length, about the evolution of editor function and service to readers. Frank, can you repeat what we were talking about some weeks ago?

Mr. Walker: Yes. I think we feel, and think with justice, that the very thing we are doing with the reader as such, we should be allowed to do with the non-reader, because a very large segment of the population is not taking in its information visually and I would think if we were to do a whole job as a newspaper we would be doing both; we would be providing the printed material for those who ingest their information that way and doing the same type of job for the non-readers. I think we would be good at it, that should be good at it. After all, that is our job.

I find the tendency to say because you are dealing with the reading audience you should therefore be excluded from the non-reading audience to be nonsense and also bad for the free flow of information.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Do you propose to confine these activities then to Montreal only to provide an adjunct to the service you are already providing?

Mr. Walker: From my point of view, I don't know the corporation's point of view, yes.

Mr. Ferguson: I think we should say (in the public knowledge) that we presented an application in association with The Toronto Star for a UHF television station in Toronto. Now we would not be interested in a UHF television station in Toronto ourselves as the owners of it. That is part of our philosophy here. Our criteria would be that we would join with and participate with others in the community.

Senator Everett: You might do this anywhere in Canada then?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes.

Senator Everett: To be specific we are talking about AM and FM radio and television either EHF or UHF or cablevision?

Mr. Price: Yes. If we thought we could bring a strength to a venture of that sort from our particular locale of being Montrealers or Quebecers it would help in the programming sense or content sense; yes, we would. As a co-operative type of thing rather than a sole ownership type of situation.

Senator Everett: Except in Montreal.

Mr. Price: Yes, very definitely.

Senator Everett: Do you mean anywhere in Quebec?

Mr. Price: Yes.

Mr. Ferguson: We would have partners in any venture.

Senator Everett: What I gather you were saying is that outside of a certain area, be it either Quebec or the City of Montreal, you would always be in partnership with other people. You would not want to be by policy sole owners?

Mr. Ferguson: Yes, we would prefer it.

Mr. Price: Within the community of Montreal we would be prepared to be sole owners but actually we would prefer to have partners...

The Chairman: Could you speak a little louder?

Mr. Price: Just different voices I think rather than to present one voice. Let us put it that way. You have different voices brought to the community.

The Chairman: Are you leaving that?

Senator Everett: No, Mr. Chairman. Is the application, which I assume is to the...

Mr. Ferguson: The Canadian Radio and Television Commission.

Senator Everett: In concert with The Toronto Star; is that the only formal move or application that you have made in Infocor to fulfill its principles? Again I am talking about a formal...

Mr. Price: Yes; formal presentation, it is. It is the only formal application to the CRTC for a licence.

The Chairman: When was the application made with The Toronto Star and what was the determination? Where is it at now?

Mr. Ferguson: Application was made in the spring. It was made earlier—over a year ago. The CRTC has not yet heard those applications.

The Chairman: So it is still pending?

Mr. Ferguson: That is right.

The Chairman: I have a question which I think would be unfair to ask.

Senator Prowse: Your statement that you feel that the other media could be combined with the newspaper in order to give more voices—is this philosophy based on your position in the Montreal area or as a general principle?

Mr. Price: We don't think it can be combined. We think it can be complemented. I think what Mr. Walker was saying is that the written word to some people is a means of learning and a visual presentation is to others. I think we feel that we perform the printed word and the written word with a sense of responsibility and we should be therefore allowed to extend the electronic media.

Senator Prowse: How many radio stations and TV stations are there in the Montreal area at the present time?

Mr. Price: We have many both English and French.

Mr. Ferguson: Eleven AM and nine FM radio stations; four television stations; six daily newspapers. This is an interesting kind of variety. We have seven English-language weeklies; fifteen French-language weeklies; thirty-three biweeklies—a total of fifty-five weekly newspapers.

Senator Prowse: So the fact that one particular editorial group, or one management group, owns not just one voice but, say, five or six voices really does not substantially change the overall competitive picture except perhaps to increase it in your situation?

Mr. Ferguson: I think what we are talking about, senator, is we don't want to own four television stations. We would like to have an extension of the newspaper in Montreal in the electronic field; to complement what we are doing in The Montreal Star as an extension of the editorial comments.

The Chairman: I would remind the senator that he is on a supplementary question.

Senator Prowse: I hope I am on a supplementary. The supplementary is this: whether the principle would still apply to an area which is common to many of the smaller communities where you have economical use of one station; you can have one newspaper, one TV station and maybe a subsidized government TV station in there, and one or two radio stations. Would you feel in that area of very limited competition that your philosophy would be equally valid?

Mr. Ferguson: It would not be equally valid. It would be a different situation. The point I think that I was trying to make earlier is we must be careful of the future. We must watch what is coming. What the technology is doing is making means of communication, or channels of communication; it is modifying the channels of communication. We should not go into this future with attitudes that were based in conditions of scarcity.

Senator Prowse: In other words, when we get the thousand-channel TV...

Mr. Ferguson: Then I think we will want those who have a record of responsibility in mass communication. We will want, perhaps we will insist that they participate in these other media. My concern is that attitudes that we have been sympathetic to in the past must change or evolve with the very rapid changes that we think are probably going to come quickly in the future.

Senator Prowse: I gather you assume the impossibility, let alone the undesirability, but the impossibility of those whole thousand channels, for example, being in one person's control?

Mr. Ferguson: Well, physically I suppose they will be but surely we will have the wits to regulate the use of those channels.

Senator Prowse: This is the point you accept: the necessity of regulation in that area?

Mr. Ferguson: Oh, I think so.

Senator Prowse: Now the final question on the supplementary: if you accept the necessity of regulation in part of your operations, which will be the electronic media—I think this is a fait accompli now anyway—do you foresee any possible danger of that flowing back into the press end of it?

Mr. Ferguson: Well, I hope that the regulation will cover the allocation of those media, the technical standards within that media—the maintenance, the service, the way we regulate. I would hope that neither in that media nor any others would we see regulation with regard to what people want to say except the usual things we have...

Senator Prowse: The allocation, the Canadian content. That is fine.

The Chairman: You are not saying the should not be analysis of program content by a government agency, are you?

Mr. Ferguson: In the future that we were talking about with Senator Prowse I don't think Canadian content is going to be a factor.

The Chairman: I was not referring just to Canadian content. Let me put it in a more direct way: you don't quarrel with the role and function of the CRTC?

Mr. Ferguson: Not a bit.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, you have a supplementary question?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Ferguson, insofar as you Montreal readers are concerned, or maybe should say your potential Montreal readers are concerned, what you are looking for in this way is protection for The Montreal Star setting up Infocor and giving the impetus which you have referred to.

Mr. Price: I think protection for the changing role of the newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: In view of the technological improvements and developments and so on?

Mr. Price: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I think I am more concerned with Montreal proper. Have you considered ideally what vehicle of electronic media you would prefer to be interested in?

Mr. Price: I think it is a matter of record, of course, that we did—I don't know whether it is a matter of record here—but we did make a bid to buy Canadian Marconi Broadcasting Division. We were not successful. I think that we are really now assessing this. This was a preliminary move without all the amount of study done. I think in the intervening year probably our ideas are changing and not totally formulated yet.

Mr. Fortier: The very interesting situation may arise where you would continue to be The Montreal Star and you would service, I may use the word, the non-readers through the electronic media, try to communicate the same message. On the one hand your written medium would not be subject to any government agency and your electronic medium which would be delivering, if I understand Mr. Walker well earlier, which would be delivering the same message, would itself be subject...

Mr. Ferguson: Only the means would be subject; not the content.

Mr. Fortier: As the Chairman pointed out "and the content."

Mr. Price: In the sense of the Canadian content we are living in that community and I don't think it is a problem.

Mr. Ferguson: If you are talking about the same product, it would not be the same product. The Canadian content of The Montreal Star would certainly meet the CRTC regulations.

Mr. Fortier: It still is an interesting hypothesis.

The Chairman: Would the feature content of The Montreal Star meet the Canadian content regulations? Certainly the news content would. Would the contents of the comic strips meet the standards of the CRTC?

Mr. Walker: No, they would not.

The Chairman: I have commented several times, and I will comment again, on the flood of American syndicated material in Canadian day papers.

Senator Everett, it is your question.

Senator Everett: On the same question but leaving Montreal for a moment, I gather then from your actions in the Marconi situation that Infocor is prepared to purchase radio, television or cablevision properties if necessary or to join in the purchase of them?

Mr. Price: Yes.

Senator Everett: Anywhere in the country?

Mr. Price: No; it has not indicated that. CIEF is a Montreal company.

Senator Everett: To phrase that more precisely I am asking if that is the intention, part of the philosophy of Infocor would be to purchase broadcasting properties anywhere in the country.

Mr. Ferguson: I wonder, Senator Everett, if I might ask here—you are now asking questions about the corporate policy and we live in a competitive world, and I wonder if it would be possible to arrange for in-camera sessions with the Committee at which time we would be delighted to talk about corporate plans, aspirations and hopes. It seems not quite right to ask our long-term corporate plans in public.

Senator Everett: I don't think that is unreasonable but you will recall that I have not and the Committee has been careful not to ask you any information that would not be a matter of public record on the actual actions you have taken.

What we are concerned about is this change in philosophy that says not only do we have to protect ourselves in the City of Montreal but we may also expand in other directions. Now you can indeed answer that by saying "We have thought of nothing yet. It is all in the future."

The Chairman: In fairness, Senator Everett, if I may say, it could be they have and would not want to say something which is not in keeping with the truth. It has been the policy of the Committee since its inception that if any witness at any time would prefer to answer any question in camera we will accede to that request. I think in fairness, and I am sure you will agree to, Mr. Ferguson, if he would prefer to deal with that kind of question which I think does bear on future plans and I think the point is that could easily give information to competitors—if that is the feeling that you have.

Mr. Ferguson: I don't want to be unreasonable.

The Chairman: I don't think he is being unreasonable.

Senator Everett: I don't think I have got to the point yet. Do you feel that questions of corporate philosophy as opposed to corporate action should be in camera?

Mr. Ferguson: We will attempt to answer all the questions if I may draw back from time to time hesitating on it.

Senator Everett: The only two questions that I had were: it is part of your corporate philosophy to purchase broadcast properties. Is it part of your corporate philosophy to purchase newspapers in other areas than Montréal? I leave those questions open if you want to answer them later or if you want to answer them in camera.

Mr. Ferguson: In terms of philosophy we have made the point very strongly, particularly in the supplementary material, that we live and work in Montreal and we think this gives us particular strength—where the owners and managers are brought to account by their neighbours. This has been the philosophy of The Montreal Star and continues to be the philosophy of The Montreal Star.

We see the advantage of an independent operation locally owned. So in terms of philosophy we can say it as unequivocally today as we would have said it twenty-five years ago.

The Chairman: Does that satisfy you, Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Well, it doesn't answer the question but I am prepared to leave it at that.

The Chairman: I was going to make a point, Mr. Ferguson. I agree with Senator Everett that you not answered the question as it was put. I am not going to insist that you do but perhaps we can discuss it privately with the Committee.

Mr. Ferguson: By all means.

Senator Everett: I am quite satisfied.

The Chairman: Do you have other questions?

Senator Everett: Yes. Is The Montreal Star unionized?

Mr. Price: Yes.

Senator Everett: Could you tell me what unions are involved?

Mr. Price: We have the International Typographers Union; we have the International Press...

The Chairman: I am sorry to say they can't hear you.

Mr. Price: The American Newspaper Guild, Stationary Engineers.

Mr. Ferguson: Copies of the union agreements were sent to the Committee.

Mr. Price: You have all our contracts.

Mr. Ferguson: We volunteered all our contracts to the research group with the complete details of our salaries and fringe benefits.

Mr. Price: Salaried employees in the editorial room are not unionized. All other people are unionized.

The Chairman: I think it is important to note that that information is not part of the public record. I think it should be understood that that is why Senator Everett put the question.

Senator Everett: That is fine.

Now question No. 6 on technological developments in your supplementary brief in the last sentence you say:

"We must take every opportunity to exploit technological improvements particularly in the production and distribution of our printed product and we must seek other ways of using other complementary communication techniques."

Dealing with the first part of that sentence have you been frustrated in any way by union action from taking every opportunity to exploit technological improvements?

Mr. Price: I would answer that very simply; that we have not been frustrated by it. I think we have been backwards in the past in technological innovation, bringing in technological equipment or changes; quite static for many years.

Senator Everett: Because of union?

Mr. Price: No, not because of unions, but we would say Infocor has been established. I look at the situation. I cannot really say unions have been responsible for stopping any development.

Senator Everett: You did a study on the underground press, I believe?

Mr. Price: I will direct that to Mr. Walker.

Mr. Walker: We subscribe to the underground press. I haven't particularly studied it.

The Chairman: The Montreal Star has now conducted a study specifically of the role and function of the underground press?

Mr. Walker: No.

Mr. Price: Are you asking about an editorial feature we might have done or research progress?

Senator Everett: It sounds to me like a specific project. It may well have been.

Mr. Price: No, we haven't.

Senator Everett: Can you tell us, Mr. Walker, why Logos has grown in Montreal? Is this a failure of the newspapers or is it something that is a phenomenon that newspapers just can't do anything about?

Mr. Walker: No. I think Logos is a different kind of instrument to the daily paper. It is doing a different job. I don't know that it is own that much. It had a remarkably brilliant young editor called Paul Kirby and while there it was quite exciting, interesting; but they were not trying to do what we do. They certainly were meeting an obvious need because I am not sure of the figures but I am told around thirty thousand at one point. It may still be.

I found it an interesting newspaper or paper, or periodical, whatever you like to call it. It was more visual than it was written. It did go further in many respects than we do. Its language was more picturesque than ours but I did think that it fulfilled a need we didn't fulfill in the town, a need we couldn't fulfill.

Senator Everett: Are you attempting to fulfill it in any way? Is there any change in your reception? Have you been influenced by the Igos type of publication?

Mr. Walker: No, not really. I know Kirby very well; he is a friend. But, no, I would not think so.

Senator Everett: Have you become more swinging on The Montreal Star?

Mr. Walker: No, not really; pretty quiet, you know.

Senator Hays: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Hays. I will just ask one first.

Is Logos out of business?

Mr. Walker: Well, it is less frequent.

The Chairman: It is still publishing?

Mr. Walker: That I am not sure of. There is a group in it. I haven't seen a copy for about a month, I guess, or six weeks. I think it is still in business.

The Chairman: Senator Hayes, you had a supplementary question? What was the supplementary question?

Senator Hays: Mr. Walker said it was a pretty conservative newspaper and they were not swinging, and that sort of thing. I have an idea here...

Mr. Walker: That is an editorial.

Senator Hays: An editorial rather, of those nude women and a man.

1431-2;

Mr. Walker: That's not very swinging, is it?

Senator Hays: It looks pretty swinging to me, out in our country.

Mr. Walker: It is not swinging in Montreal. The gentleman has trousers on, you will notice that.

Senator Hays: What are you trying to put across? Polygamy, or something like that? Three to one?

Mr. Walker: No, just an illustration of an article. Rather interesting I thought. It certainly attracted attention. People seem to have even clipped it.

Senator Hays: What about this one; two nudes in the top and down below three nudes with fur hats, and the caption "Priest drums up teen business"... That may be pertaining to the bottom.

Mr. Walker: That is again part of the news section of the paper. If you want to use a word like "swinging" you might say so. I think it is pretty orthodox, pretty straightforward. If you go to the movies or almost anywhere these days, this stuff is pretty straightforward.

Senator Hays: What is it representative of?

Mr. Walker: An attitude, I imagine.

Senator Hays: What sort of an attitude? Try and define it a little bit.

Mr. Walker: I think we are talking about things or writing about things that ten years ago we would not have written about and we are illustrating them in ways that ten years ago we would not have done. It is part of the wind blowing through not only the press but through conversation, social attitudes.

Senator Beaubien: Behaviours?

Mr. Walker: Behaviour patterns. I think the section "Life Styles" is meant to reflect the style of life of at least a section of the population.

Senator Hays: What is the next step; where do we go from here?

Mr. Walker: I am not sure, senator. We don't have far to go.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier has a supplementary question.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I wondered if you could tell the Committee, Mr. Walker, how the new section has been received by the Montreal community.

Mr. Walker: Very well by the young, that general age group up to about thirty or thirty-five; and with less enthusiasm by those who are older. We hope that it is broad enough that it really is not just naked ladies, attractive as they may be. It deals very seriously with problems of contraception, drugs, family relationships, fashions. It really is what it is called, an attempt to explain, to discuss the style of life which is confronting us in 1970.

Mr. Fortier: Have you received many letters to the editor on the one hand critical of this new approach and on the other hand approving of it?

Mr. Walker: Yes. You get more critical letters on anything than you ever get letters of approval. We have had letters. There was one much fancier picture than the one Senator Hayes produced, a lady with a painted body, that produced some fall-out.

Mr. Fortier: In colour?

Mr. Walker: Not in colour, unfortunately.

The Chairman: How did you miss that, Senator Hayes!

Mr. Fortier: You are referring to letters?

Mr. Walker: Yes, largely from the more elderly people.

Mr. Fortier: You don't mean a drop in circulation?

Mr. Walker: No, no. Complaints. Most of what we do—I think perhaps it is a mark of the effectiveness of it, I am not sure, does produce fairly sharp pro and con positions.

Senator Hays: Did the circulation go up?

Mr. Walker: No, unfortunately not. It is about stationary.

The Chairman: On this point you said in referring to the particular pictures of the three ladies with the gentleman, I think you used the word—I wrote it down—"This is a fairly orthodox approach." Would you agree with me, Mr. Walker, that it is not orthodox by the prevailing standards of the member papers in the CDNPA?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I can't recall seeing any letter to the editor critical of this news treatment following December 19th; am I right?

Mr. Walker: No; most of my contact was directed over the telephone and that is what you get, or tend to get, much more of than letters. The letter-writer is not as moved as the telephone voice.

Mr. Fortier: If you had received a letter from a reader very critical of this treatment of the news would you have published it?

Mr. Walker: Oh, yes, indeed. We publish far more critical letters than we do letters supporting something we are doing, for the reason these people are entitled to a voice whereas the ones that support us...

Mr. Fortier: Amongst my friends in Montreal, one of them told me one night he was going to write to you to commend you on this particular page. Did he ever do so?

Mr. Walker: I don't think he ever did.

Mr. Fortier: Did you hear from this publisher?

Mr. Walker: I think I heard from this president.

Mr. Price: I was going to say that Mr. Walker probably receives more complaints but I must admit on this, and the painted body I got an awful lot of complimentary comments about it.

Senator Hays: In the morning or late in the evening!

Mr. Price: Do we have to answer these questions?

The Chairman: I apologize to you, Senator Everett; I am still transgressing on his question period. You made reference, Mr. Walker, again referring to this picture, "to the win of change". I think that was the phrase you used. This trend, in which certainly The Montreal Star is obviously a leader, you think that this is a healthy trend, do you?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you think it is a trend which will soon appear in other daily newspapers across Canada?

Mr. Walker: I couldn't say.

The Chairman: You really couldn't say?

Mr. Walker: No. I would not know. Your scale of publishing is different as are their attitudes, as Senator Hayes pointed out. You might not do something like this in Saskatoon or Winnipeg or somewhere. You might do it in a big city any place in the world. You now, we are not really that remarkable if you compare us with the London papers. I am not talking now about the popular papers but the good Sunday Times. They are pretty free about the subjects they discuss and the illustrations that go with them.

The Chairman: Do you use the so-called four-letter words in The Montreal Star?

Mr. Walker: We have. Which particular one do you mean, sir?

The Chairman: I am more interested in knowing if you intend to expand upon the use of four-letter words in The Montreal Star.

Mr. Walker: No, I don't think so. When we use them I hope we use them because they help.

The Chairman: May I ask one other question on this point? Perhaps you are familiar with the book, let us take for example, Bertinotti's Complaint. Why is it in your opinion, that four-letter words, all of them to refine them, are used in a book which became a best-seller in the United States and also in Canada and yet to date at least, they are not permissible in newspapers?

Mr. Walker: I don't think we have a reason to use them. That is the only reason why we can't. If somebody was quoted and the words they said included those words and it was part of the establishing of a man's character or his attitude I would use them.

Senator McElman: We have had some conflicting testimony here as to whether the media, particularly the print media, should be following, leading or reflecting public opinion. Which category would you say you fall into at this point, sir?

Mr. Walker: I don't think any of them really. We do reflect current attitudes. I don't think necessarily we lead or follow. We try as an unconscious editorial policy to take the surprise out of living. If we do our job properly, instead of instances becoming a series of crises every day, we should have the shock value out of things that happen. We should be far enough ahead in that sense, if we can discuss a trend or predict an event or a change in attitude and by putting that into the paper early enough to stop this constant bump you get by being surprised almost every day.

The paper in general terms is a reflection of that effort to so inform that you won't be surprised tomorrow morning; if we do it properly you should not be surprised.

Senator McElman: On this would you say then that the type of page that Senator Hayes has so cunningly displayed today would be reflective of your market area or all Canada?

Mr. Walker: Certainly of our area to judge by the movies shown, other illustrations, and the pictures on television. There would be no surprise in that. At least I would not think so.

Senator McElman: Do you feel that the public, let us say on the prairies, would react similarly?

Mr. Walker: I couldn't answer. When I was out on the prairies they certainly would not, no.

Senator Hays: Is that why you moved to Montreal?

Senator Prowse: We used to have Eaton's catalogue, you know.

Senator Hays: This letter you received from the president; was it a kind letter?

Mr. Walker: I think it was a verbal expression; not particularly kind, no.

Senator McElman: You mean he didn't put his four-letter words in type?

Mr. Walker: No.

Senator Everett: In paragraph 21 of your brief you state:

"We are consciously leaving certain fields to those forms of information which are better equipped to handle them."

Can you tell me what forms of information?

Mr. Walker: The sort of immediate fast news that is very well handled by radio, that kind of field we are not nearly as concerned about now as we were ten years ago. We have in fact sort of given it to them.

Senator Everett: By that do you mean the extra field?

Mr. Walker: Really, yes. The sort of hot news special that we are hopeless at anyway. Before we have thought about it, it is out on radio. In that area we would try background-

ing instead of pushing at it. There are certain things in television that television does pretty well. We have got out of them and tried to do them a different way. We go in much more for the magazine-type article in our paper now than we did five or ten years ago. Here is again the sort of release of immediate hard news to these two mediums, and us fulfilling what I think we can do better than they can—the backgrounding, the filling-in, the fleshing-out of information.

Senator Everett: In those two examples you deal with news, though; you may deal in another form?

Mr. Walker: Not nearly so much the cop-and-robber instrument now as we used to be. We are trying to do crime a little differently—really that kind of thing I am talking about.

Senator Everett: Does that mean you would not report crime?

Mr. Walker: No, we would. We try really, we haven't succeeded at all yet, to be less concerned with, say, the hold-up and more concerned about the conditions that lead a man into hold-ups; to try and intellectualize crime a bit, really is what we are talking about. Criminology more than crime—let us put it that way.

Senator Prowse: The causes as well as the result?

Mr. Walker: That is right, indeed.

Senator Everett: Mr. Price, in your supplementary to the submission you say at question No. 2, the paragraph at the bottom of page 2:

"The economies arising from group ownership are, we believe, self-evident although we doubt whether the loss of so many independent newspapers has been entirely due to economic necessity."

Can you tell me what other factors contribute to this fact?

Mr. Price: I really can only say that some people probably sell prematurely in my opinion; probably feel for their own personal reasons they must sell. I don't think necessarily their paper is losing money and it is necessary to join a group for the benefits.

Senator Everett: As a matter of fact, what you are saying is the growth of the chains or the groups is not entirely due...

Mr. Price: I am saying that perhaps the sale of some newspapers is not due to the fact they are losing money and couldn't stay alive other than by joining a chain operation.

Senator Everett: That concludes my questions.

The Chairman: May I ask one question? Have the so-called chains or groups, the major chains and groups in Canada, at a time attempted to purchase The Montreal Star?

Mr. Price: Yes. I think people have indicated they are interested in The Montreal Star and purchasing The Montreal Star but would say equally as firmly, that never have we indicated a desire to sell it or was there any further discussion other than to say "Thank you for your interest." In other words, The Montreal Star has not been for sale.

The Chairman: I was interested less from your point of view than from the point of view of the activity of the chains. How recent have the overtures been?

Mr. Price: I have been with The Star for three years and I would say that three or four people in that period of time have spoken to me about ownership of The Montreal Star.

The Chairman: Mr. Price, senators, ladies and gentlemen, it is now two minutes to five and we will adjourn until five after four and complete our questioning of The Montreal Star.

—Short Recess.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the session is back in order. I will begin the questioning with Senator Hayes.

Senator Hays: I suppose I should direct this question to Mr. Price. It concerns the Family Herald which was in operation for almost a hundred years.

Mr. Price: That is right.

Senator Hays: It was almost a family bible in rural Canada from coast to coast and also in many, many of the small towns and it left a great gap. I believe your circulation was over around three hundred and fifty, was it not?

Mr. Price: Four hundred and twenty-five.

Senator Hays: Four hundred and twenty-five thousand, and I suppose this was at aying and that is why you have gotten rid of . I would like to know, in your thinking, how this great gap might be filled—because there is a great gap.

Mr. Price: In the farm publication?

Senator Hays: Right through the farm publications. They almost ceased to exist after The Family Herald Weekly Star. We have The Winnipeg Free Press's Weekly and I understand it is not a very profitable publication.

Mr. Price: If I could I will pass to Mr. Walker. I was not with The Montreal Star long enough to be involved with the Family Herald's operations.

Mr. Walker: We found that economically, nothing we did seemed to help us. I lost enormous sums of money for the institution when I was the publisher of it. It was a very good publication, I thought, and it did its job and fled out its field but after ten years of really very substantial losses indeed, it was decided to close it up. I don't know how you would try again. I don't know where your possible revenues would come from. I think perhaps you could try it through television, if you could do it. Television is pretty good in that kind of area.

Certainly whatever we did—our circulation was no problem—in fact we had too much circulation. The writers were no problem. We had a superb group of writers.

Senator Hays: I think you had one lousy one when I was the Minister of Agriculture!

Mr. Walker: Which particular one was that, sir?

Senator Hays: I don't know whether he was under your direction or whether it was just him.

The Chairman: He was an editorial writer?

Senator Hays: Yes.

Mr. Walker: That little magazine was in the forefront of a log of writing. It was on water and pollution long before most people were, and the readers loved it. In fact it was kind of heartbreaking. Certainly the advertisers didn't love it.

Senator Hays: When you changed the format did it deteriorate more?

Mr. Walker: How do you mean, sir?

Senator Hays: Along about six, seven or eight years before you closed it you completely changed it. You used to cover agricultural exhibitions and in Ontario, you covered the ploughing matches—a kind of homey, personal sort of thing. I was wondering if there was any change after that because you never changed back.

Mr. Walker: We went to roto.

Senator Hays: Well I am just a layman.

Mr. Walker: That immediately gave us very long deadlines so spot news began to drop out—country fairs, prize-winners, this and that. I didn't think that was too bad because we filled in with better and I thought more informative technical material. It was just that no matter what we did the enormous high-cost operation—perhaps that was one of our faults. I don't think we charged for it to our subscribers. That was perhaps another fault.

The main fault was there was no revenue.

Senator Beaubien: No advertising, Mr. Walker?

Mr. Walker: We had advertising but not nearly enough.

Senator Hays: How much more in subscriptions would you have had to charge to make it profitable?

Mr. Walker: I am not expert enough on this field. I sometimes thought we might have tried doubling or tripling the price to see what happened. I think the experts went into that and said it would not work either.

Senator Hays: You mention now that maybe television might fill this gap. Are you speaking principally of the CBC or a complete channel for this coverage?

Mr. Walker: The CBC farm broadcasts have been marvellous for many years, I think, and I watch the material every day and listen to it, but I think they could probably do more. They would be the direct and logical way of feeding this material in.

Senator Beaubien: It would cost more.

Senator Prowse: But it would cost somebody else more.

Senator Hays: When you suggest television, it is not a part-time sort of programming. You believe it might be a whole channel like in the United States where you have a weather channel, nothing but weather from eight o'clock until mid-night.

Mr. Walker: This would be nothing but agriculture.

Senator Hays: Do you think this is worth exploring?

Mr. Walker: I would think so, yes. I know that certainly as far as print is concerned nobody is likely to come back and try again and I also think it might work better than print. It would be more direct. We had big trouble on the Family Herald. It was divided into so many parts that we never really did one part well; we never covered from Vancouver Island to Newfoundland where there were different problems. We failed to do any one area properly.

Perhaps we should have gone out and tried to specialize a bit more but if you wanted to cover sheep farming, for example, it is a relatively small group and it should be covered and we would do it perhaps once a year and leave them with nothing really in between. We found our groups were too small for a national magazine.

Senator Hays: I think it was Mr. Price that mentioned you favour partnership and this sort of thing. Do you feel that the media as a whole probably should get into this field on a sharing basis to fill this agricultural gap?

Senator Beaubien: On a sharing of losses basis.

Senator Hays: Maybe it would not be losses. Has it ever been investigated?

Mr. Walker: No, except in a sort of very generalized superficial thinking that we have done at The Star of sort of composite writing matched with television, matched perhaps with radio. Sort of a pyramid structure of doing it. I think that it could work or at least might be worth looking at. I think it could work of course in a much broader field than just agriculture.

Senator Hays: Do you feel that a committee like ours should explore this more? You think it could work?

Mr. Walker: Yes, I think it could work. I think it is an audience now that is almost totally neglected.

Senator Hays: There is no question of this.

Mr. Walker: It is unfair that they should be. Also I think bad for the country but it is also very unfair to that audience. It is 1 now; it has one or two publications.

Senator Hays: What happened to the subscriptions that you had, the long-time subscriptions? They went for six or seven years.

Mr. Walker: The Prairie Farmer took it over. We had some going up to 2005.

Senator Hays: What happened to The Prairie Farmer?

Mr. Walker: I think it is still going, isn't it?

Senator Hays: It is?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Senator Hays: Is it connected with the

Mr. Walker: The Free Press.

Senator Hays: Is this part of the West Producer?

Mr. Walker: No, they are separate.

Senator Hays: What publications in Montreal are looking after the rural areas?

Mr. Walker: No English-speaking publications. There are two or three farm magazines, periodicals, published in the French language that are doing this job and continuing it, and I think quite healthy.

Senator Hays: Financially?

Mr. Walker: They seem to be.

Senator Hays: Are these weeklies or monthlies?

Mr. Walker: I think bi-monthly, and I think maybe there is a weekly, too.

Senator Hays: Are they based in Montreal?

Mr. Walker: One in Quebec City and one in Montreal.

Senator Hays: What percentage of your paper reaches into the rural areas?

Mr. Walker: Very small.

Senator Hays: Are there any Montreal dailies that get out to the rural areas?

Mr. Price: I think the Sherbrooke Daily Record in Sherbrooke covers more of a rural area than it does the City of Sherbrooke.

The Chairman: You are talking about the six daily papers in Montreal?

Mr. Walker: French-language.

Mr. Price: I think La Presse does also.

Mr. Walker: Much more, I think.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Senator Hays: Your basis is mainly Metropolitan Toronto?

Mr. Price: Montreal!

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Price, The Montreal Star is an English newspaper in what is a very substantial French community and you dwell on that in your written brief as to what your role is and how you conceive it. What percentage of your circulation reaches French-speaking Quebecers approximately?

Senator Hays: Sorry. That was a real lunder.

Mr. Fortier: That might help when Toronto comes a suburb of Montreal.

Senator Hays: You say the management of St. Lawrence Sugar Refineries and The Montreal Star are entirely separate nor is there any policy laid down on reporting of news potentially harmful to the sugar industry. Is that correct?

Mr. Price: Yes, sir.

Senator Hays: To what extent do you feel reporters and editors have an awareness of the common bond of ownership of these companies that affects their presentation of the facts?

Mr. Price: I think there used to be a day you didn't tell jokes about sugar around The Montreal Star. I don't know how many of our reporters would be aware of that fact.

Mr. Walker: I think there was a legend when I went to The Herald that one couldn't write about beet sugar. It was pure legend. And when I raised the point with the owner of The Herald he said he had never heard of this. This was invented at a lower level than ownership and we cleared that out very quickly with articles. There would be this tendency sometimes I think, particularly going back quite a few years, to second-guess ownership, and it just was not so. It just didn't happen to be true. Nothing from the time it was in the middle, the thing was created.

Senator Hays: When the Government decides they are going to do away with the sugar factories in Canada and subsidiaries and so on how do you cover the stories?

Mr. Walker: We would cover it straightforwardly. We would, too. We have never had in the time at least that I have been on The Star any suggestions or any hints or anything that might act one way because of the particular interests of the McConnell family because I don't know what their interests are apart from the sugar plant.

Senator Hays: You might get more static from the pictures of naked women?

Mr. Price: I would say somewhere between fifteen to twenty per cent would be our assessment but I must admit that it is a bit of a guess.

Mr. Fortier: You have never made any study of your readers?

Mr. Price: We have made studies of readers and it comes out at those figures but it is a definition: do you speak a little English; do you speak no English? You know—different classifications. It is hard to put it all together in a definite statistic. We estimate between fifteen and twenty per cent is read by French-speaking Canadians.

Mr. Fortier: Has your study gone this far: do you know whether or not this fifteen or twenty per cent also read La Presse or read The Star exclusively?

Mr. Price: No, we would assume—and I think it is borne out—that they probably read also a French-language newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Who do you consider to be your main competitor; is it La Presse; is it The Montreal Gazette; is it radio; is it television?

Mr. Price: I think it is a combination of many things. Television definitely is a competitor and I think La Presse is a competitor, and I also think for advertising revenue—also the Gazette. We don't home in on one special segment for competition. I think they are all competition.

Mr. Fortier: Would that apply also in the field of advertising?

Mr. Price: I am talking about advertising.

Mr. Fortier: I think the Committee would be very interested in having on the record the views of The Montreal Star as to the way the rising nationalism in French Canada is being covered and being interpreted for its readers. Would you care to comment on that point?

Mr. Price: Would you permit me to ask Mr. Walker to answer that? I think he would be perhaps more eloquent.

Mr. Walker: We tried I think in the brief to indicate that. We don't interpret our role as contributing to the tensions that exist in the community. Our handling of news of this kind, of all news really, is very quiet, the general attitude. We are a quiet paper. We spend a great deal of time trying to explain the aspirations of one group to another. We do in fact talk to two audiences even if not directly, and we have, particularly in the entertainment part of the paper, broadened the coverage enormously in the last year or year and a half, I think to the advantage of the English-speaking audience. In the main we regard ourselves as a Quebec paper; not a ghetto paper.

We think we are part of the Quebec community and that we have exactly the same right to speak up and say our views as anybody else, the majority or the minority.

We don't really regard ourselves, I think, as sort of flag-bearers for any one section. Most of our editorial policy is designed, we hope, to be of value to everyone in the province; not just to one particular group.

I think a case in point is the present education controversy which is going on. The paper's policy is—I think it would not be an exaggeration to say—not the policy of a large part of the English community. We think it is the correct policy. That would be our general kind of attitude all the way through.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel that you have a particular role to play in attempting to bridge the two solitudes that Hugh McLennan spoke of?

Mr. Walker: I would rather meld them than bridge them myself.

Mr. Fortier: Is this one of The Montreal Stars' philosophies?

Mr. Walker: I would think so, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Would you subscribe to the view with particular emphasis on what I termed earlier "rising French-Canadian nationalism"—would you subscribe to the view that "good news is no news" in Quebec?

Mr. Walker: I don't really quite know what that means.

Mr. Fortier: Let me give an example. Last week the Department of Natural Resources in Quebec City and Falconbridge held a joint press conference where Falconbridge announced its intention of investing some on hundred million dollars in Northern Quebec in the next ten years. Would you treat such story in The Montreal Star with the same emphasis—I am speaking for the moment from the point of view of news value—as you would the explosion of a bomb in a mail truck or in a mail box?

Mr. Walker: I doubt it. One is a little more graphic than the other but we would, for example, in all probability—or should have done—give it prominence and explain its significance probably on the front page. I don't know what we did with that particular item. If we didn't handle it properly or if we didn't...

Mr. Fortier: I don't see it on the first page of last week's newspapers.

Mr. Walker: I don't remember it.

Mr. Fortier: I believe it was on your financial page.

Mr. Walker: Then I would think that was failure on our part.

Mr. Fortier: In the same text do you at The Montreal Star feel that in any way, shape or form you have a role to play in communicating news as well as views from and to Quebec to other newspapers in Canada?

Mr. Walker: Well, we have a syndicate that does move material that we originate around. We have had arrangements on occasion with The Toronto Star where we have shared news. I don't interpret my responsibility that at all. No, I am concerned enough with just the paper and the syndicate would handle that.

Mr. Fortier: Which syndicate is that?

Mr. Walker: Canadawide.

Mr. Fortier: In which you have a financial interest?

Mr. Price: One hundred per cent wholly-owned.

The Chairman: May I suggest you put the same question to Mr. Price, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to comment?

Mr. Price: Only inasmuch as I would agree with Mr. Walker that we have our hands full Montreal. I would like to think that other people would see our newspaper and react to our newspaper, what we see is Quebec and what is happening. As far as responsibility is concerned, as I say I think we try to expose or material to people and it is really up to them to accept it. We don't meet with them every day so there is no such thing as forcing anything like that to make them accept it. That has to be their decision. We would hope for interpretations, as we see it, would be picked up by other people.

Mr. Walker: Some years ago we did go beyond the normal field and conducted a seminar in Montreal to which we invited newspapers across the country and a substantial number of people came. We had speakers and that was an attempt on our part to enlighten within the trade. I think then there were counter-conferences in Toronto and later a second one which also took place on the same general area. It might be that we should have more of that.

Mr. Fortier: I think you would have a very important role to play in this respect which I think you fulfill in Montreal proper, speaking for myself, and which I think could permeate the city and province and indeed the country as a whole.

The Chairman: Are you leaving that point?

Mr. Fortier: Not really.

The Chairman: I would be curious to hear an assessment that Mr. Walker and Mr. Price might make on the calibre of news coverage of affairs in Quebec in the balance of the English-language press in Canada. I am sure you read out-of-Montreal papers quite regularly. What is your estimate, what is your opinion, of the calibre of the news reports of Quebec?

Mr. Walker: I think it is improving a great deal. I still think that there is a lack of understanding in certain areas.

The Chairman: Which areas? Would you care to be more specific?

Mr. Walker: I think out in the West when we have sent reporters out, as we have in the last year for a total of something like fourteen or fifteen weeks, we have found—and this is a generalization which could be proved wrong in a moment—a lack of sympathy towards the province and what it is trying to achieve.

On the other hand, when we sent Evelyn Dumas to study the French communities of the West she seemed to find a very receptive audience in various parts of the country.

In the main I would think this is probably not newspaper responsibility so much as sort of national streams of news moving backwards and forwards. I would like to see more understanding and less crises talk, less tendency to magnify such civil disturbances as we have had in Montreal. Compared with other places it is pretty minor stuff, I think. If you had a Richter scale for riots ours would be pretty low down. I think there is a tendency to overplay that. I heard a broadcast not so long ago on the air in which the interviewer seemed to be able to think of nothing but violence.

Mr. Fortier: Claude Ryan talked of this in his speech on Sunday night to some doctors and said the positive aspects of Quebec nationalism is not given the same prominence as the negative aspects.

Mr. Walker: I would agree with that speech that he made. I think the enormous and impressive cultural record of Quebec is almost lost once you get across the Ottawa River. We had a week in which seven novels were published in Quebec. We have a constant stream of creative activity going on which is very much part of the life of the province. This doesn't seem to get treated beyond our boundaries.

Mr. Fortier: Some of your very good articles in the entertainment section; do they often get reproduced?

Mr. Walker: No.

Mr. Fortier: In other Canadian newspapers?

Mr. Walker: No.

Mr. Fortier: Would you need to be asked permission by, let's say, the Calgary Herald? How would it be done?

Mr. Walker: I would like to see them buy them but normal courtesy is you would ask if you were going to take whole articles. It would be the courteous thing to do.

Mr. Fortier: Whether it is a commercial proposition or not you have not been asked; is that correct?

Mr. Walker: As far as I know, no.

The Chairman: Mr. Price?

Mr. Price: That would be true.

The Chairman: Mr. Price, do you have anything to add on this question of coverage on Quebec in the rest of the country? Or has Mr. Walker covered it?

Mr. Price: He has covered it except at times I have been fairly angry with the Toronto coverage of the Quebec situation. When you are sitting in Montreal you realize to a degree what might be going on and at times I have been pretty unhappy personally. Personally I thought it was played way out of proportion.

The Chairman: In the Toronto papers?

Mr. Price: I would say in the Toronto papers, yes; sometimes on television also. By the same token there are times when we have been heavily criticized for the way we have been playing it in our own community.

Mr. Fortier: I know you travel extensively in Canada and have you ever picked up a copy of The Star at the airport in Montreal and then landed in Toronto or Winnipeg and picked up the local paper and read about the same story with a different accent; has this happened?

Mr. Price: Very definitely.

Mr. Fortier: What would be your assessment of the non-Quebec accent on the Quebec news?

Mr. Price: I think they played—I am not going to refer to a particular newspaper here—I am just going to say it was—I think one incident, shall we call it a speech—was played way out of proportion to what it was and to the truth, for that matter. I can see in the rush of things it might be checked later and was perhaps toned down but the play it got I think was unwarranted.

Mr. Walker: That particular speech was probably a very good example. It was treated as a very informed responsible comment when in fact it was neither. It took about a couple of days for the papers outside of Quebec I think to ask themselves "Well, who was he?"

The Chairman: Who was he?

Mr. Walker: I forget. Let me not mention the name anyway. It is important.

The Chairman: It might be helpful to the Committee.

Senator Prowse: I am guessing.

The Chairman: We don't want to anyone guess.

Mr. Walker: We didn't treat it—quite small coverage.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: You have quite a few French Canadian reporters on your staff. I am wondering (a) how are you able to attract the very good reporters, and (b) do they find it difficult to report news in a language which is not their native tongue?

Mr. Price: I should perhaps answer the first part. I think they are attracted to the fact that there are a Quebec newspaper now, and interest in what we are doing. As far as the second aspect, I would ask Mr. Walker to answer that.

Mr. Fortier: You make a conscious effort to have the Montreal Star to seek these reporters?

Mr. Price: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You also have some very good English-speaking reporters.

Mr. Price: There are also bilingual reporters, too. I think this is a requirement. It is very important to have French reporters as part of the culture.

Mr. Fortier: I have often wondered myself and I put the question as a matter of fact to one of your reporters and he said, yes, he found it difficult to put his thoughts on paper in English.

Mr. Walker: Yes, that is true of some of them. It takes time but of the vast majority the incredible thing is the ease and the beauty with which they do it.

Mr. Fortier: I think it is a matter that the public can take judicial notice of, that the Montreal Star in recent years has become much more liberal—small "l."

Mr. Price: have any significant portions of your readers expressed their disapproval of this trend?

Mr. Price: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Of your English readers, I meant.

Mr. Price: Yes, I think so. But I think this is quite natural. We have tended to move somewhat and we have left some people who are very comfortable with us a little bit in the lunch. It was a conscious decision and I think desirable. Yes, we have upset some riders and I think we made some other riders very happy.

Mr. Fortier: Have you lost some circulation in English-speaking Montreal?

Mr. Price: I don't think so, not for that reason, no.

Mr. Fortier: This is a very general question. The Committee I think would be interested, Mr. Walker, in hearing it. When it comes to editing the first page of a newspaper—let us take the one that I have before me, Monday, January 19th—have you any set rule as to the prominence to be given, let us say, to the Quebec story, the national story, an international story? How do these all fall into place on any given day?

Mr. Walker: We regard ourselves as a local paper and we regard the most important area of our own area so working from that premise we really work outwards from the urban—first stories based in and around Montreal—then the province, nationally and then internationally.

Mr. Fortier: In that order?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I see on Monday, January 19th, you had eight stories on the first page.

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Of which three dealt with the Liberal leadership convention. This was your first day of publication indeed after the election.

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: One or rather two, I guess, what you would call local crime stories?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: One is what you would call—"I was tripped-out on drugs—Brody" by Nancy Moran.

Mr. Walker: Entertainment.

Mr. Fortier: That is an article which you received from The New York Times Service?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is this par for the course?

Mr. Walker: No. If you go back a day the main sort of themes are national—three sort of national stories; four national stories really; and then what I would call a local story, the Bertrand story. In the main we feel that the most interesting thing to Montrealers is Montreal and also the most important thing that touches on all aspects of their lives, so the story that might be given a reasonably small play if it referred to, say, Paris—the same story occurring in Montreal would of course have much greater prominence.

Mr. Fortier: The abandonment of The Montreal Herald in 1957, was this a policy or economic decision?

Mr. Price: I understand it was financial. It was financial, I think. It had an audience of its own, a very complete audience, but economically was the reason I was given, but I couldn't prove that.

Mr. Fortier: I remember a few years ago before Mr. Pelletier became a minister of the Crown that he was writing a column (this was in your day) which appeared in French in Le Devoir and in English in The Montreal Star. What sort of arrangement did you have, not with Mr. Pelletier but with Le Devoir at the time?

Mr. Walker: Just an arrangement to share the column and publish on the same day. Nothing beyond that.

Mr. Fortier: Has this happened on other occasions?

Mr. Walker: Yes, we have done surveys jointly.

Mr. Fortier: As you did two weeks ago, didn't you?

Mr. Walker: No, we were not in on that. We do a little less of it now, I think. I prefer if I can to hog the copy, if you like to call it that, to make it ours and not somebody else's.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have any working arrangements of any kind with La Presse or with Le Devoir?

Mr. Walker: No; nor with anybody else.

The Chairman: Do you conduct any research surveys of any kind in concert with La Presse or Le Devoir?

Mr. Price: No, we don't.

Mr. Fortier: It is noticeable that in certain cities of the world you have your own correspondents where Canadian Press also has people?

Mr. Walker: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: What are your views on the CP wire service?

Mr. Walker: We have had some complaints which we voiced to them but not on foreign coverage so much as on domestic coverage. We have complained and I think other papers have, too, about the coverage of Quebec; that is the English-language coverage of Quebec by CP. In fairness to CP they have all kinds of problems and they are at the moment studying methods of improving the coverage but on their foreign coverage we have had no particular complaints.

Mr. Fortier: You have your men in Quebec City?

Mr. Walker: We have three.

Mr. Fortier: Do you find that English-speaking papers outside of Quebec tend to use the original Canadian Press story emanating from Quebec or the story which you feed on their wires and which emanate from one of your reporters?

Mr. Walker: I would not know.

Mr. Fortier: You have never looked at that?

Mr. Walker: No. A good many papers now have their own Quebec people but I would not know what happens actually. I would imagine the normal practice is a lot of the material goes out from the Montreal office of the CP might have originated in the Star.

Mr. Fortier: I don't have any further questions.

The Chairman: Senator Hays?

Senator Hays: I just have one question. When the Quebec Government opposes the Federal Government—as an example the Gabon case—did you support the Quebec Government or the Federal Government?

Mr. Walker: Well, we take each issue as it comes, senator, and we have on occasion supported the Quebec Government and on some occasions the Federal Government, but we have no position. In the Gabon affair I think we had very considerable sympathy for the Quebec position.

The Chairman: In Section 15 of your brief you say:

"It would be relatively easy to produce a paper whose primary purpose was entertainment. There are such papers."

Presumably you mean weeklies. Are there any such dailies?

Mr. Walker: I am thinking of a paper—the Daily Mirror in London.

The Chairman: Any such dailies in Canada?

Mr. Walker: No, not really.

Senator McElman: We have had testimony from The Canadian Labour Congress expressing their belief, I think would be a way of putting it, that there is almost a conspiracy amongst the daily newspapers to down-play the good news, and that there is too much of a preponderance of bad news—strikes and so on—little reference to what causes a strike or what conditions are in general, and they then get a very bad show from the daily newspapers of Canada.

Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. Walker: Well, I will comment on my own position. We have had in Evelyn Dumas and now in Adele Lauzon the finest labour reporting going. They are both specialists and both have taught and done work for trade unions, lectured to trade unions. In the case of Evelyn Dumas she has done work for the federal Department of Labour and her writing on the trade union movement I thought was just superb and not only devoted to strikes or to the crisis side of the union movement. We have done a series on labour philosophy and we have had very good background material done by these people. They are experts in their field, and I would say that that charge was certainly not accurate as far as we are concerned.

Senator McElman: They also suggested in their opinion they were getting a much better shake from the French-language press than from the English-language press.

Mr. Walker: In Quebec?

Senator McElman: I think this was in pretty general terms they made the comment. Presumably they were referring to Quebec.

Mr. Walker: I would dispute that as far as we are concerned and I really cannot tell you the Globe and Mail has a particularly about correspondent. I think everybody would agree on that. Certainly from our point of view in general terms we have supported labour, supported many of the strikes that labour has been engaged in. Editorially we have no hang-up on labour.

Senator McElman: Again they suggested that because the newspaper industry is a part of big business it is big-business-oriented and this is having its effect on the type of reporting. Here again this was a general reference to the nation. That is a valid suggestion?

Mr. Walker: No. Well, again, I would doubt that but only talking the way I should talk, which is about our own operation, I don't think the business field in Montreal would feel that we are big-business-oriented. I think they might feel on occasion we were a little too objective.

Senator McElman: Could you give us your opinion, because it is only an opinion, you do keep abreast of what is happening in the media in Canada quite aside from your own publication.

Mr. Walker: I would not say so. Certainly the people who write papers are not. Now I can't think the press in this country is big-business-oriented really.

The Chairman: I have only two more questions. You make reference in Section 26:

"Journalism is a profession which needs challenge, which needs a whip cracked across its back continually, otherwise it tends to grow sluggish, not so much out of laziness but out of sheer physical weariness. It needs constant renewal from within and without."

What exactly do you mean by that?

Mr. Walker: It is one of the few enterprises which every day puts out a wholly new product and nothing is easier than to find formulas and slip into them; formulas of appearance, formulas of attitude. I think an inquiry like this where attitudes are called in question, where performances are called into question, are very healthy for the profession. I think you need to bring outsiders into it because your own people very quickly get inbred; they stick together. It is a very inbred tribe. A newcomer coming in, even moving from one paper to another, even changing editors it is healthy and good, it revives the thing and gives it new life. Things are not necessarily improved but they are changed, and I think this must be constantly the case in the paper.

It is an enormously difficult task to perform and it has to be done every day fast and well, and I think people in jobs like the one I hold, for example, should not be there for long periods of time. I think they should be taken out and replaced with other people. Now I don't know whether the owners subscribe to this, they may be delighted, but I think it is healthy for a paper to change these particular directing hands at intervals and fairly frequent intervals. I know when I was on the editorial page at the end of about four years I was there, I thought, about a year longer than I should have been. Now we have a new editor and it freshened it up and it is better job.

The Chairman: Mr. Price, I would like to ask you this question, if I might. It will be my last question. The senators may have some.

Much has been said about the service you provide the English-speaking community in Montreal. Mr. Fortier was talking earlier about the relationship and coverage and so on of the French-speaking community. As you know there is a third force, or so-called new Canadian community in Montreal. How do you attempt to serve that community?

Mr. Price: The same way we serve the French community, and really our own community. We do find that there is—not a reluctance necessarily—but they probably are not heavy purchasers of our newspaper or subscribers to our newspaper. This might be because they have their own press or it might be still first generation.

The Chairman: Would they tend to buy the French-language?

Mr. Price: No, not necessarily. This is difficult and I think we are constantly making attempts to bring things of interest to them. Also what interests them I think is of general interest to the community.

Mr. Walker: I don't think we do a good job in this area. We have been trying quite hard to improve it so far. We have had symposiums and brought in editors of all the ethnic press and talked to them. We have run this material in the entertainment section. I think much more than the English community these are the solitary people of Montreal; many of them new; many of them gagged by language. And though we have worked in certain areas, we have done a series on the immigrants and we had an enormous reception to a series by Sheila Arnopoulos addressed to them with places they could go to get help and assistance.

In the main I would be unhappy about our performance.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions? If not, senators, on your behalf and on my own I would like to thank you, Mr. Price and Mr. Walker, and Mr. Ferguson. I can only say that this has been a useful addition to the testimony we have been receiving for several weeks and will be, as I say, very valuable information for us to have. Thank you very much.

May I remind the senators that there is a meeting tonight at eight o'clock, Senator Grosart; and at nine o'clock, Professor Beattie of the University of Western Ontario, School of Journalism.

The Committee adjourned.

(Upon Resuming at 8.00 p.m.)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, may I call the meeting to order. Our witness tonight is the Honourable Allister Grosart. In one way or another I have followed his career rather closely and if you have studied his biography you will note—at least the biography I have—that in 1929 he joined the staff of the Toronto Star becoming a reporter, feature editor, assistant financial and news editor. In 1934 to 1953 he was president of the second Public Relations Bureau which was formed in Canada.

He was also—I must say I did not know this—a columnist for the Globe and Mail. I think you are perhaps familiar with the latter stages of his biography.

In 1957 he became the national director of the Progress Conservative Party and had subsequent resounding success.

I think it is no overstatement to say that perhaps no one else in the Senate and very few people indeed in Ottawa who could be available to us, have really the special knowledge and indeed the special working knowledge in the area we are trying to study that is possessed by Senator Grosart.

Some of us thought that he would be a very special and very helpful witness. He did not prepare a brief and it is my understanding he really does not have any formal opening statement but he does have an informal opening remark or two.

Presentation by The Honourable Senator Allister Grosart: I was merely going to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am probably walking proof that whatever the news media might do elsewhere, it does not do very much for its employees in view of the biography you have given.

I could add I was a reporter for the Toronto Daily Star and I was also a script writer for the CBC but I wound up a Diefenbaker Conservative.

Senator Prowse: That is a terrible, terrible thing.

Senator Grosart: And still am.

The Chairman: Perhaps I could put the first question to you, Senator.

I came across—perhaps you read it—the most interesting article in the Globe and Mail of January 15, 1970. The article is entitled "Prospects for Tories in the Seventies" so unnaturally, as you will understand, I read it. It was by one J. Patrick Boyer and it says the top of the article:

"Mr. Boyer, 24, is an aide to Hewland Graffey, the Conservative Party observer of the Hellyer Task Force on Housing and son of Robert James Boyer, Conservative MPP for Muskoka. Following are excerpts from a speech given by Mr. Boyer, Junior, at the annual meeting of the PC Association of Sault Ste. Marie in the constituency of Attorney-General Arthur Wishart."

This is just his background. Mr. Boyer Junior, applied to our Committee to work on our staff. I was very impressed with him. His father runs a weekly paper. He is a very articulate young man. By the time that I and I got together our staff was formed and we could not use him. But in any event there are only two paragraphs in this article which are germane to our discussion tonight. I will read them and then I will ask you to comment and then we will turn to the senators for questions.

He is giving the reasons for the problems of the Conservative Party as they face the Seventies.

I am quoting:

"First, effective opposition is being played by the news media. This is because the media have speed, have information and have a publicly accepted objectivity that political parties don't. Since we are not the majority party

Canada, we've been spending most of our time as the main opposition party and not the government party. Now, with the primacy of communications and the ascendancy into active politics of the news media, we are losing our traditional role, our rationale, even as an opposition party. We're being displaced. (A similar situation exists at Queen's Park, not surprisingly, where we are the majority and governing party. The opposition parties are frequently overshadowed and outdone, in terms of providing effective opposition, by the news media, which upsets some of our readers when they watch TV or read page 7 interpreters that are strongly critical. They simply don't recognize that, at the same time, opposition in the Legislature is fragmented, superficial and desperate—as at Ottawa.)” o, is the media the effective opposition in this country?

Senator Grosart: It is part of the effective opposition, I would say. It always has been. I am quite sure if you go back to specific scandals that the media was as much opposition as parliamentary opposition. To put it crudely they are both in the same racket, that is looking for sensational exciting things to say about the establishment.

bad news is always better reading than good news. The opposition looks for a headline material critical of the government and so does the press.

is very seldom one reads in the running copy of Parliament anything very laudatory about a government program. You might get this in a weekend magazine or in a serious magazine like Maclean's but the running copy from Parliament is sensational copy because the newspaper man is looking for a lead.

I would think there is not much difference between the attitude of mind of the Leader of the Opposition and anybody in the Gallery who was not definitely committed to one political party. When they both take their seats in the House for a question period they are both looking for exactly the same kind of material.

Senator Prowse: Blood.

Senator Grosart: Yes, blood.

Senator Prowse: Like a football game?

Senator Grosart: Yes, it is just the same thing in a hockey game and a football game.

The most exciting thing in a hockey game is a real rhubarb on the ice. The next morning the sports writers cover it and the photographers concentrate on this and there will be a little “tut—tut editorial” by the sports editor saying, “This is a dreadful thing. This sort of thing should never happen in hockey”, but this is what the television cameras will focus on and, as I say, you will have this tut tutting as you do in the papers every now and then.

But, it is much the same kind of comment. You know, it is too bad the opposition is not really zeroing in as they should. I think what the newspaper men really meant is that they are not giving us any blood so that as I say, putting it crudely, I think they are both in the same racket.

I do not think it has changed over the years.

As I read political history, I would think the impact of the media may, if anything, be less—this is contrary to most expert opinions today, but I think if anything it may be less in total than it was when everybody read the daily newspapers and when you called a newspaper “the Telegraph” or something emphasizing the fact that “Here is the hot news” and everybody was reading it. So it was getting through somehow because I cannot think of any political issue in our history (which I know fairly well) that was not probably thoroughly communicated by the media.

I do not think, for example, to go back a long time, to take a specific scandal so that I will not be accused of partisanship...

Senator McElman: And you wrote it. That is all right.

Senator Grosart: Say “the five cent speech”, Mackenzie King’s “five cent speech”. I do not think there was any less penetration of the facts of things like that which determines the course of an election than a similar effect today.

In fact, I am inclined to think there may be less today because the media message, if you like, is much more diffused than it was; because you have far more reporters in the Press Gallery. You have cameras. You have radio and everybody is looking for a different story so you get a diffusion of the interpretation of what is going on in Parliament or in the Department in the day to day conduct of government business which, as I say—when I read history—that you did not have.

Everybody zeroed in. Here is a specific scandal, Mackenzie King’s “five cent speech”.

I can think of a few things that have somehow penetrated right down, if you like, to the taxi driver or the barber shop where you heard it that night. One, for example, that I recall in my own experience was the Liberal Government decision to raise the old age pension by $6.00 which resulted in Walter Harris having to live with the nickname of "Six buck Harris". This just hit right down that night. You heard it everywhere. What a dreadful thing this is. Imagine these liberals. If they had made it $5.00, they probably would have been all right.

Senator Prowse: Or $2.50.

Senator Grosart: Yes, but $5.00 they may have said all right, $5.00 but $6.00 looked like being mean because I think the press realized this was exactly the increase in the cost of living. This is what the old-age pensioners were—this was the impression—bellyaching about so they gave them their six bucks. So you got this reaction.

Now, this was to me immediately—it was my view—nothing to do with the media. As one media pointed out it hit right away at night, people were reading the paper. The Citizen and the Journal—I happened to be in Ottawa at that time—and that would be my general comment that I don't think this is a new phenomena. It probably is to young Mr. Boyer who, as you say, is a very bright young man—he probably just discovered it. We are all doing this. We are all suddenly discovering something.

It seems to be a very large and important hypothesis in politics. At any age you keep discovering this.

I think this is what happened. Mr. Boyer suddenly woke up one morning and said, "By golly that is the situation", but I do not think there is anything new in it.

The Chairman: Now, to ask you some questions we have Senator MacDonald. I think he has some questions.

Senator MacDonald: In reference to what you said—perhaps I have taken the wrong impression of it—but I was astounded to hear you say that the reporters in the Press Gallery did not try to give a balanced picture of what Parliament does from day to day but merely are looking for something which is somewhat sensational.

Senator Grosart: No, I do not think I put that in the terms of the negative-positive question. I do not think I said they did not give a balanced picture or did not try to give a balanced picture. I certainly did not mean to imply that they did nothing but look for the sensational. They do other things as well but a newspaperman's concept of a balanced picture is the story that is built around a logical lead.

Now, the lead is the most exciting thing that has happened. I do not think many reporters—unless it has changed a great deal since my day when I was a reporter—would say "I have got to give an exactly balanced picture of what happened in Parliament today."

Probably nobody would read it.

Imagine giving an exactly balanced picture of what happened in the Senate today. It would be so dull that nobody would read it.

Senator Prowse: They do not.

Senator MacDonald: You gave a speech in the Senate today, did you, Senator?

Senator Grosart: Yes, I did.

No, I do not think it is a newspaperman's job to discipline himself to that extent. I think he is there to get readable news. Most of the large papers have two or three correspondents. I read the Telegram more than any other evening paper at the present time and I am always interested and sometimes amazed on the completely different colour that two or three Telegram reporters will put on the same event.

The Chairman: Can you give us an example that comes to your mind?

Senator Grosart: No, I cannot think of a specific example.

The Chairman: Do you mean a thing about the opening of Parliament?

Senator Grosart: No. I would say...

The Chairman: Biafra, maybe?

Senator Grosart: Biafra is a good example. If you were to read what Lubor Fink has to say about it or Doug Fisher, they will tell quite different stories.

The Chairman: Except in fairness, Fink and Fisher are both columnists.

Senator Grosart: Well, I do not know whether you can make a distinction. In my day you always said "If you want to run a good reporter you make him a columnist." That was a columnist because...

Senator Prowse: It is probably still true.

Senator Grosart: Because you are getting into another very large problem and that is the balance, of course, between fact reporting and opinion reporting and opinion reporting disguised as factual reporting, which is the thing I find annoys me more than anything.

When a reporter or a columnist—I do not see much difference today—in my day there was a difference. The reporters stayed with the facts and wrote the facts. If he became opinionated he got fired. I can think of many fellows who were reporters who were fired or being too damned opinionated.

This is under the regime of Harry Hindmarsh. I cannot imagine any reporter today being fired for being opinionated. He would probably be promoted.

I am not exactly saying this in criticism because I am almost 10 years out of date in this business. I was following it pretty closely up until a little less than 10 years ago; but since then, I have become a spectator but I realize that the theory now is you have to have interpretive reporting.

Straight factual reporting is dull stuff. It is only for squares. You must have reporting in depth. You must try and match television. My favorite reporters—I am not going to name them—are the ones I find most factual. I like to get the facts.

I think I am straining a bit but this would indicate to me that perhaps the basis of my own personal belief, that as far as public opinion reporting that the daily newspapers are considerably more important than television. Somebody no doubt will quarrel with me but the reason I think this is that television is constantly attacking its own credibility with its violence shows and overemphasis of sex. It annoys a substantial part of the audience—the commercial advertising, people say “Well, this is all artificial”. That is the view. You hear people say “I got the news. I saw it in the paper.” But you very seldom hear anyone say “I know it is true because I saw it on television”.

The Chairman: Do you yourself watch much television?

Senator Grosart: It depends on what you mean by “much”. I am passed the age when I get anything but annoyed at long kisses and citches.

The Chairman: I hope there are no supplementary questions on this.

Senator Grosart: As I said, when the whip asked me to speak on the Omnibus Bill amending the Criminal Code, “No. I don’t want to get into it because I was not old enough yet to be interested in homosexuality and I was too old to be worried about abortion.”

The Chairman: You were telling us what you do. What do you watch on television? Do you watch newscasts?

Senator Grosart: The news mostly, football games towards the end of the season when it gets exciting. Hockey—not much lately because the Maple Leafs are losing and I cannot bear to watch them.

The Chairman: You and I have more and more in common.

Senator Grosart: I watch any football game where Russ Jackson is playing. I just like to watch him play. An occasional very square play, an old movie. I am watching now for Ninotcka to come back.

Senator MacDonald: Did you ever see “The Birth of a Nation”?

Senator Grosart: Yes, and the “Ten Commandments” if it comes back I will certainly want to see that; the original version, before they jazzed it up and put all the sex in it. When sex was in the background, that is the way I liked it because I have a puritan up-bringing.

The Chairman: Senator Hays had a question. I am not sure whether Senator MacDonald is first.

Senator MacDonald: Just on this point between TV and newspaper media. Surely what you say does not apply in political broadcasting, a political speech or something on TV. Would you agree it has a greater impact than an advertisement, for example, in the newspaper.

Senator Grosart: Oh yes. I was not comparing a television report of an actual event with an ad.

I have spent a lot of money over the years in newspaper advertising for political campaigns. I am inclined to agree with the United States Senator who once said, “Everybody agreed that half the money wasted on political advertisements in campaigns was wasted but nobody could agree which half”. I would almost think it was all wasted.

I am not comparing those two but comparing a TV commercial with a good daily newspaper ad, I will take the daily newspaper ad, if it is a good one.

The Chairman: Are you talking about a political campaign or for other purposes?

Senator Grosart: No. Political campaigning because that is all I have too much knowledge of.

Senator MacDonald: The impact of a television report of a political meeting when the cameras are right there and a newspaper report...

Senator Grosart: I would take the newspaper report. A good example of perhaps the most famous case on TV having a penetrating impact was the Kennedy-Nixon confrontation. There was almost general agreement that Nixon lost a lot of marks and possibly lost the election; but my analysis at that time—the analysis which I did at the time—was it was not until the newspapers came out and said “Nixon was lousy”, and “He should have shaved”, that the impact really hit. You did not get it immediately, or I did not, but it was when the newspaper reporters and commentators were absolutely unanimous even if they were Republican papers.

You know, they were shaking their heads. “It is dreadful. Nixon ought never to have gone on television with Kennedy” and this kept on going all through the campaign. The television thing was seen once.

If the newspapers had come back and said “You know really although Nixon did not look quite as well, we are not in this election trying to elect a movie idol but Nixon with what he said was solid. This is what the nation needs”. I think the impact would have been the very opposite.

Senator Prowse: Just a moment. Let us take this example. In that election campaign—I would imagine it is the same as every other election campaign in the United States—were not the majority of the newspapers in their editorial opinions supporting Nixon and the Republicans, about 85 per cent.

Senator Grosart: I do not think the figures were that high but I think you are quite right that the majority of the daily press in the United States was on the Republican side but it was because the Republicans who were shaking their heads and saying...

Senator Prowse: Let us take your last civil election in Toronto. There are three big dailies there who all unanimously came out in support of—was it Givens?

The Chairman: You are thinking of two elections ago.

Senator Prowse: Oh, two elections ago.

Senator Grosart: The Chairman can tell you more about that last one than I can.

The Chairman: In the election they had two elections ago, all three Toronto papers supported Phil Givens. He was defeated. William Dennison was elected. Is that the election to which you are referring?

Senator Prowse: Yes. Now, obviously the newspapers could not have had that much impact.

Senator Grosart: No, we are dealing with two different things. Now you are talking about editorial support.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Senator Grosart: This is an entirely different thing. Any figures I have seen on the number of people who actually read editorial and can respond to them in their survey is slow, you can almost say nobody read editorials.

Now, politicians do and many people do but if you take a real depth survey and try to ask them to play back what was in the editorials, you draw a blank but not with the front page.

Now, there is a great difference between the front page treatment and why you get—and this is happening—a newspaper deliberately and cleverly slanting its news. Then you can really have an effect.

I can remember the famous election in Toronto, Sam McBride and Bert Wemp some...

The Chairman: That would be in the early Thirties?

Senator Grosart: Yes. I do not see anybody around here old enough to remember the one.

The Chairman: Mr. Spears, I imagine, was covering it.

Senator Grosart: Sam McBride appeared to be winning in a walk. Bert Wemp was suburban editor of the Telegram at the time.

and not a very glamorous candidate and just about the last two days Sam McBride made some rather scathing remarks about Bert Wemp because he had not turned up at some meeting or something. He said he was a coward. The Telegram came out the next day with pictures of Bert Wemp in uniform with his DFC and the whole front page was Bert Wemp, the hero and it won him the election.

I do not think there is any question about this and this is the kind of impact that you could get. You cannot, I do not think, get that kind of impact from television because there is no credibility.

Senator MacDonald: Do you think that it is one today where newspapers slant its news for a local person?

Senator Grosart: Yes.

The Chairman: Can you give an example?

Senator Grosart: No, I do not want to give examples because...

The Chairman: I did not ask you that to embarrass you but it would be useful to us if you could. Would you do it privately?

Senator Grosart: Well, the thing is so all-pervasive I would have quite a job going back picking out examples but surely....

Senator Prowse: If it is cleverly enough done, you cannot see it.

Senator Grosart: Of course, the classic example was Time over the years, they fooled everybody. Time developed its apparent objectivity in their format. Everybody thought Time was absolutely objective but it turned out later that Time was playing the game right along.

I think every newspaper is doing this to some extent. For example, I very much doubt if a newspaper that was of the establishment in a Conservative sense, would have published MacPherson's cartoons on Diefenbaker. I think these MacPherson cartoons did more than any other single thing to create difficulties for Mr. Diefenbaker.

Now, I cannot see a Conservative paper publishing those. I am sure that the Toronto Star published them with great glee. I know examples—I am sorry I did not come prepared...

The Chairman: That is fine.

Senator Grosart: To bring them up but I think everybody in this room could think of fairly current examples of where newspapers deliberately going into a morgue and getting a picture of somebody that is the least attractive picture. I think Mr. Diefenbaker has been the victim of this because he is very energetic and forensic and he lends himself to bad pictures.

I know when I was with the Star we had a morgue like that. I am going back now to the Thirties—we all knew where to go to get this kind of picture.

We also had another file which was called "The loud-mouth file". It was a file on everything, whether it was liquor or Protestantism or Catholicism or—all sorts of people—there were ministers and so on—you could rely on it.

You just had to call them. You knew that they would blow something highly bigoted or something utterly silly.

As a matter of fact I used to do interviews for the Star. I got into real trouble one time with a British Admiral. He had been a Q-boat hero and he had gone on a tour of the United States and part of his act was to insist he could not be interviewed. He had never been interviewed and they started to call him "The mum admiral of the British Navy".

He came up to Toronto here on one of those hot days of summer. Mr. Hindmarsh sent me down to interview him and we had prohibition in those days. The admiral said "Well, we will have a drink". I said "You cannot get a drink here. You are in Toronto", he said, "My oath". "Well, I said if you really want one, sir, I can get one". I was on the hotel beat anyway so I knew my way around so I got a bottle of Haig whisky and we drank it and the admiral was not mum any more.

He had been thirsty for a long time and so I went back and wrote a story about the "Mum Admiral of the British Navy." Between interims of protesting that he never was interviewed, he commented on everything that was going on at the time.

Well, it was a dull day and somebody put an eight column line on it, on the "Mum Admiral of the British Navy."

The first thing I knew I was called into to see Mr. Hindmarsh. The first thing he said—being a Star reporter—"Did you see him"? I said "Yes, sir, I did. I did not make it up". Then "Where" and so on and I apparently established the fact I had seen him and he said "What about this?"

Well, I told Mr. Hindmarsh the truth. Mr. Hindmarsh was a great prohibitioner. He did not approve of liquor in any form but if you got a good story by the use of liquor, he would relent. A good story was more important to him than that particular principle of his.

Senator Prowse: It was your soul, not his.

Senator Grosart: Yes, sir, so he got the Admiral quietened down anyway and then he said to me "You know, Mr. Grosart, you are starting in this business and you are writing pretty good interviews but remember one thing. If you ever write an interview about anybody and the subject likes it, it is not a good interview"; and there is a lot of truth in that.

In other words, a newspaperman is out there trying to get this fellow to say something that is not what he would say if he were in fact writing his own biography.

Senator McElman: Do you consider this to be honest reporting?

Senator Grosart: Yes, honest from the point of view of your job. You are not distorting. Who is to say you are distorting? Who is to say that it is not a better picture of the Mum Admiral than the picture he wanted to give you?

I do not know. I think it takes all sorts of looks at anything to come up with a composite picture that is nearer the truth. It is the old story. I put an apple down there and the Chairman says to me "What colour is that?" And I would say "It is red". Senator Prowse might say "That man is crazy. It is green". He is looking at it from the other side.

I think this probably applies in the newspapers. Again I say it would be an impossible restraint to put on a newspaperman to say to him "You have to come up with an exactly balanced account of this. You must have exactly the same number of pros and cons".

You go over your copy and say "Well, I have said five good things and five bad things, "because nobody is much more than 50 per cent good and 50 per cent bad. We do not vary very much.

The Chairman: I think if Senator MacDonald will allow, some of the other senators want to ask some further questions.

I have Senator McElman and Senator Hays. I think Senator Hays was first. Was your question a supplementary, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I wanted to go back to the Senator's suggestion that the printed word has more strength than television and then just in general terms of the actual strength of the print media.

Would you not agree that the relative strength can be measured by the whole circumstances and aura of the particular—let us say—election period. I am thinking, of course, of the Truman period where everybody was knocking Truman and he was out and then was in the print media and he came through without the media getting partisan.

An even more recent case of where everybody in New Brunswick were—not just at election time but for a two year period in the particular area in which I am familiar—knocking the stuffing out of a particular party and Premier and yet he came through.

The whole aura and the whole circumstances, do they not negate the principle of occasion?

Senator Grosart: Well, there are bound to be exceptions, Senator. You have used the word "everybody". Everybody is nothing.

Senator McElman: I mean the media. I doubt if you really mean it is the print media in general.

Senator Grosart: Well, I do not know the situation.

Senator McElman: Let us take Truman.

Senator Grosart: In the Truman case they were not all knocking him. They were saying he was going to lose. As a matter of fact there was a good deal of admiration for Truman.

Senator Prowse: Obviously.

Senator McElman: And yet the media was knocking him out, Senator, I think you would agree with that.

Senator Grosart: I would not disagree because my recollection is not precise on that but here again—are you talking of editorials or are you talking about the reporting?

Senator McElman: The full effect.

Senator Grosart: The full effect, it seems to me—I am only guessing because I am not basing this on any kind of theory but my view is that Mr. Truman conducted a first class grass-roots campaign, that he was the underdog and I think this was not perhaps the intended objective of the press committee or the press reporting but this came through

I would think that any kind of analysis of that election would show it was the press that got the Truman message across.

Senator Prowse: He was fighting bravely but hopelessly or against hopeless odds.

Senator Grosart: Yes. Roosevelt is really a better case because Roosevelt actually—as I remember him—had a large part of the press absolutely hating him.

Senator Prowse: Not just the press.

Senator Grosart: Yes, but we are talking about the media. The press was vitriolic about Roosevelt. He capitalized on it and I might say on those fire-side talks.

This is an interesting thing. Everybody has the impression that Roosevelt gave scores of re-side talks. I have forgotten the exact number but I think it is three. This surprises everybody. Whatever the figure was it was very low. But when we think back and, you now, we think that he was on the radio every week with a fire-side talk; he was not.

I think here it was the sheer excess of trivial that did this.

There is somewhat the same thing with Truman but now I am mixing up the two, editorial and the reporting and yet there is a clear distinction but very often the editorial attitudes seem to me to spill over into the reporting.

I have been a reporter. I can tell you a story. Perhaps it should not go on the record because the gentleman is still alive and in contact both gentlemen concerned—and one is now a very famous columnist. It was in the George Drew campaign and we were in Newfoundland and one of the reporters covering him—

The Chairman: I might say this is going on the record.

Senator Grosart: That is all right. One of the reporters covering it got very drunk and was not able to file his copy. The word had gotten around and they were talking and somebody said “Grosart”—I was the sort of man for Mr. Drew. Somebody said “You are an old Star man. Why don't you follow through and do his copy” which I did.

Well, I wrote the story the way I thought the Star would want it written. I did not exaggerate the attendance there and so on. Mr. Drew got terribly annoyed and would not speak to the reporter for days and we had an awful job covering up the fact I had written it.

Well, I knew the Star's style. I could write the style because I had been on the Star. I could have written it for the Globe and Mail at that time.

Senator MacDonald: Do you think reporters slant stories, Senator?

Senator Grosart: Unconsciously. They have a viewpoint. I think we all slant. If somebody asked me my opinion—as they often do, in and out of the country “How is your Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, doing?” Well, my viewpoint—no matter how objective I try to be—is slanted.

Senator Prowse: The answer is “Not very well”, as far as you are concerned.

Senator Grosart: No. I found myself trying to be objective and winding up being silly. I do not think any of us in any kind of comment are free from environmental slanting. I do not think you can even expect a reporter to be. After all, he is a human being. He is not a computer. He is reporting something as he sees it.

To some extent he is reporting its effect, its impact on an audience.

A good example is, let us say, your theatre and drama critics. You take up the paper and one fellow says that this violinist left the audience cold and the other critic will say “Fantastic success, standing ovation” and we have all seen this happen.

That is why somebody like Nathan Cohen is good because everybody else is trying to be kind so it will not sound like Nathan Cohen's view.

The Chairman: I think Senator McElman has a second question.

Senator McElman: Yes. I would like to get back to this comparison of the effect between the print and broadcasting, particularly television.

Before I do, you raised the matter about Roosevelt and how many people either hated him well or loved him well.

One of his favourite after-dinner stories was about a Wall Street broker who hated him and each morning as he arrived near his office he would stop at his favourite newsie and pick up his paper. He would look at the front page and he would say “Damn” and he would throw it in the big waste counter beside the newsie's stand.

Well, after this had gone on for a long time the newsie mustered his courage and said to him "What is it you are looking at on the front page that bothers you?" He said "The obituaries". The newsie said "But, the obituaries are not on the front page". He said "The S.O.B. I am waiting for will be". So then I think that points up the story of Roosevelt. He was hated or loved.

Going back to the Nixon-Kennedy debate. The television thing was a one shot deal, Senator, was it not?

Senator Grosart: Well, yes, in that case.

Senator McElman: Now, as you very properly put it, the print media from there on kept playing that Nixon did not shave and he did not make a good show and so on. Let us put the media on all fours.

Let us say for example for the remainder of that campaign it had been permissible—which it was not—that the Democrats had been smart enough to have a video tape of that performance and had taken clips from it and had played one minute or three minutes or five minute clips periodically through the rest of the campaign. Would you not think television then would have had a tremendous impact and perhaps would have equated anything that the print media might have done?

Senator Grosart: Well, I do not think so. It is really the "Truth Squad" case. It was either going to be a brilliant success or it is going to fall flat on its face.

The Chairman: Which do you think the Truth Squad did?

Senator Grosart: It fell flat on its face but it did not have to. It was a pretty bright idea. I thought it was at the time.

Senator Prowse: You are half right anyway.

Senator Grosart: But it did not work. There were reasons. I think it probably would have worked with anybody except Mr. Diefenbaker. He has the particular ability to ridicule.

Senator McElman: Why would not this other have worked?

Senator Grosart: Because again television elsewhere destroys its credibility because there is an obvious purpose in doing this. You are pillorying Nixon whereas in the media comment—it is the continual oblique reference to this. Even a favourable comment favourable reporting will keep coming back and so in spite of his bad shot in the confrontation with Kennedy, he did terribly well here in Peoria.

They keep coming back to it. They get fascinated with it and of course this is one of the devices that propagandists try to use. You try to plan this. If you can develop for your own party a certain stance and you give evidence that it is sound. Let us say some party came out and said right now "we are the party of the middle class." Vis-à-vis the white paper. Well they would hope the opposition party would keep saying: "Ha, ha, that is the party of the middle class." The more they said it, the more it would stick—the idea that they were the party of the middle class.

I am not talking about propaganda, which is another side and not supposed to be very nice. I have indulged in a bit of it in my time but I do not think...

The Chairman: Well, I am thinking of one story which I will not tell that makes the point, I think, Senator.

Senator Grosart: I think I know the one you mean.

The Chairman: I am sure you do. I have Senator Hays and Senator Sparrow who wish to ask questions.

Senator Hays first.

Senator Hays: You said, Senator Grosart that you liked reading factual reporting and then you made a statement that most of what was opinionated reporting. Do you think there is room in Canada for a newspaper or part thereof where there will be real factual reporting?

Senator Grosart: Yes. If you mean would be a success, I would say I don't think so. It would probably depend on what comics was able to get and I mean that, that without this colouring I do not think a paper is going to be a success.

The Globe and Mail experiment is a very interesting one and I think a successful one. I have no doubt they have surveyed it from the point of view of readability and circulation. I do not know what they found but it certainly added a great deal to the prestige of the Globe and Mail.

Every morning you can see a bit of straight factual reporting and that is direct quotation from Hansard.

The Chairman: Do you mean the question section on page 7?

Senator Grosart: That is right.

Senator Hays: Do you think these are well read?

Senator Grosart: I would think it is very well read but I do not know, Senator.

I have no way of knowing it. I have not surveyed it. I used to survey the different things but right now I do not know.

I am sure it is one of the very important elements in giving the Globe and Mail the status it got recently in a world survey of newspapers. It was rated quite highly.

Senator Hays: Of course, you do get this in the financial page, pretty well factual reporting or statistics. The Stock Market is factual.

Senator Grosart: Yes.

Senator Hays: And this sort of thing and quite a few people read them and since we have started these hearings, I have made it a point to ask everybody I have an opportunity to speak to, if they read newspapers. I do not think I have spoken to a person that believes in newspapers today. Some things perhaps, but they take it pretty much with a grain of salt.

The reason I ask this is in your life-time, you have seen over one-third of the world lose the freedom of expression through the press. I do not know what the circumstances were before. Another three hundred million people lost it and were defeated where you had a completely controlled press.

The American people and the Canadian people are concerned about the credibility of the press and that is part of why we have these hearings and people are disturbed about this.

Am I just wondering if in your opinion there is a reason to have more factual reporting.

Senator Grosart: I think from an absolute idealistic point of view, yes. On the question of credibility I would like to put it this way. I would say if you asked a representative group of teenagers about the credibility or the accuracy that they are getting from their parents, you would find they would say "There is no credibility in this at all"; but this does not mean that their parents are not having an influence.

Now, it may be a lessening influence today—it obviously is...

Now, if you ask a group of people do they believe everything they read in the newspapers, they are going to say "No". The very question of credibility does not really give you what the impact of what they read in the newspaper is. That is why I think it is very high because the structure of the newspaper lends itself far more to credibility than the structure of television, not so much radio.

I mean, radio is sort of in between the two but you do not find in the newspaper large segments, pages and pages of presentation to the public, that anybody would tell you is resented by a large part of their audience but you do have this on television.

People who watch television would not be without a television set but are objecting all the time to the emphasis on violence—they are complaining about what it does to their kids. They are objecting to the over-emphasis on sex, to the very subtle—I was going to say "attacks"—it is an attack on the moral values of perhaps your generation and mine. Now, this in my opinion, and it is only my opinion—I have to emphasize that. I have not made any studies. I have read a good many, but I have not made any myself—does make a very great difference between the credibility and therefore the impact of a Canadian newspaper on the voting patterns of people and probably extending beyond that.

At the moment I am only talking about the credibility of people, you know.

Senator Hays: Somebody may say "Well, if he expresses thoughts it is a fact. You can believe it. It will not be coloured. It will be a fact." Another person might have a reputation and people say "Well, you cannot believe him. He colours it" or some fellow might deliberately lie about it.

Has the credibility of newspapers say from 30 or 40 years ago degenerated or is it better than it used to be or is it becoming more coloured?

Senator Grosart: I would think the credibility, again as an absolute comparison in time, is less today. What I am really speaking of is the comparative credibility and the more or less impact of a daily newspaper, and I would also include the weekly newspaper, of course, and television. I would think there has been a loss of credibility due perhaps to what seems to be a very great increase in opinion writing rather than fact writing.

Again I go back to my own days when most of the reporters were out there writing about facts.

The Chairman: Do you specifically in any way shape or form except the Canadian Press from these observations?

Senator Grosart: I would say that the Canadian Press is in rather a different position because the Canadian Press has a built-in stabilizer.

The Canadian Press reporter knows he is writing his piece, for a Conservatively inclined, a Liberally inclined and perhaps an NDP inclined press. He does not want his stuff rejected. He does not want somebody pointing to a footnote or Fraser McDougall saying well, "I don't want any more stuff from so and so", because it hurts him professionally.

I find, for example, in the public relations business, that of the newspaper fellows that would come in, by far the best were the CP reporters. They make the best PR men because they have been under this discipline.

Senator Hays: You are speaking of a pretty factual subject, are you?

Senator Grosart: That is right. All reporting, if you are going to use the word "reporting" in the sense I use it, is a fact. The other is comment. My objection is that I find personally too much of the reporting today is such a mixture of opinion and fact.

Senator Hays: Mr. Templeton was here. His opinion was that television would be No. 1 as far as credibility was concerned because the people say "Well, I saw it with my own eyes, you know".

When the first Conference in Ottawa was held, they watched it and they were interested but it is not long before it slips again because the reports we get are so opinionated.

I am wondering if in your opinion newspapers should be like the old Christian Science Monitor or some of these papers that said "That is the way I saw it. You can call it". We apparently do not have a Canadian newspaper that just has this sort of reputation in my opinion.

Senator Grosart: This is so and I think the reason is that it is generally agreed the Christian Science Monitor is one of the greatest newspapers in the world. In terms of a newspaper and so on, it probably has about the lowest circulation but take the New York Times. Its circulation, I think, is about half a million.

The New York News has pictures, is very heavy on sex scandals and has one column—apart from Ed Sullivan and a gossip column—on the capital news—that is Washington. It has a column of local New York news and one of New York State news. That is the normal pattern. It has very objective reporting.

My opinion is that this is editorial policy. I say we have all this other stuff in there. Now to hold a certain audience we will give them the facts pretty cold in these columns and very often buy the New York News.

When I am in Toronto, I go over for lunch to Murray's which has a lot of people around there are people sort of looking at me askance because I am reading it. It is the New York Morning Graphic that finally came to be called "pornographic" but I sometimes get the feeling that I get a better window on the news once in awhile out of the New York News than I do from the New York Times because I get tired of reading the New York Times.

Even though I may be very much interested in fact, I can only read so much of Jimmy Reston and I give up after about paragraph eight of Jimmy Reston because he starts to pontificate and it is in depth reporting. He is a great reporter but eight paragraphs is enough. I feel I have got pretty well with Jimmy Reston wants to say and I will let him preach to somebody else for the rest.

Senator Hays: What is the most important part of a newspaper? Is it the dollar bill?

Senator Grosart: From whose point of view?

Senator Hays: From the publisher's point of view or from the owner's.

Senator Grosart: It depends on the publisher, I suppose. Dr. Roy Thomson seems to have made a ploy of insisting he is only interested in the dollar. I do not believe that of Roy Thomson. I think he has an intent ploy in the quality of his newspapers.

The dollar is important because from what I have been able to read, it is not the easiest thing in the world to keep a daily newspaper from going bankrupt. So the dollar has to be important. You have to stay in business.

But the same thing with a Member of Parliament. Criticize him all you like but Somebody said "You cannot be a statesman unless you get elected". So you do not have a newspaper unless you watch the dollar and I think the two go together.

Depending on the size of a particular newspaper that is issued there is a match between quality and circulation.

The Chairman: Now, Senator, I hesitate to interrupt you but there are other Senators that wish to ask questions and there is another brief we are going to hear. We have scheduled that brief obviously too early for nine o'clock. It is now about eight minutes after nine and I would like to turn to that other brief presently.

Senator Sparrow and Senator Prowse have questions for you, Senator Grosart, and with your forbearance, I will let them ask their questions and then we will turn to the other brief.

I wonder if they could make their questions succinct and I wonder if you could make your answers succinct.

Senator Prowse: If you have any problems with time for the next brief, my question is not that important so I will forget it.

The Chairman: All right. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Just perhaps a quick question with a quick answer if it is possible. Whether you have had an opportunity of following our hearings so far might depend upon your answer to a degree.

With your experience in Ontario back to the 1930's in reporting in a period when there were a multitude of independently-owned newspapers and today we find that the newspapers and news media of different forms are owned by groups and chains—some with interlocking ownerships and some owners having more than one type of media and so on. Do you from your experiences see a danger in this growth in the group? Is there a danger and would you have any recommendations in regards to that danger, if there is a danger?

Senator Grosart: I think it is it is fairly obvious that the ideal situation is at least two competing papers in every major city or every major daily paper area, if you can have it and each independently owned, preferably in that area.

When you are getting a report in total. You are getting a report of the constituencies around the country. You can look at these papers in total. You have a pretty fair idea of the playback of public opinion because these papers are going to stay fairly close to public opinion.

When you have a chain the danger is, as in any kind of bigness, conglomerates or monopoly. There is always a danger there but it is not necessarily bad in my view.

It must be a very, very hard thing—let us say—to be in the position of directing policy of let us say 10 papers, to be interested in politics, to have that power and not use it.

The impression I get from reading your hearings is that either these publishers have done a beautiful snow job on the Committee or there is not very much danger.

I do not know which the answer is.

Senator Prowse: Maybe we don't believe them.

Senator Grosart: This is maybe so. I am just now taking the reports of the evidence as I heard it. They certainly have insisted that they never, never, never, ever heard of a case. The impression I got was that they never heard of a case of an attempt by the publisher to influence anything in the paper. Well, I do not believe that because anybody that has been around Ottawa knows, on a half a dozen occasions, of Press Gallery men who have quit on that very point, that they objected to their copy being changed when it got to the editorial desk, wherever it was.

It is too much to believe of human nature that in certain cases the publisher will not, one way or another, influence the news.

If a publisher of a newspaper was arrested for drunk driving, I think you might almost be entitled to say "At least wait until I am found guilty before you publish it". You might have a very different view to that than you would have through the normal dissemination of news.

If I may say this in conclusion. The one worry I have about the freedom of the press is its freedom to report the worst.

To put it in crude terms if tomorrow some young girl around here were to lay a charge against anybody in this room of rape...

Senator Prowse: Nobody would believe her.

Senator Grosart: The papers would report it and it would be a great story.

Senator Sparrow: Would you say "attempted"?

Senator Grosart: They may believe it or not. "Senator accused of rape". But you would have a difficult time to live that down.

Senator Prowse: Think what it would do for the Senate.

Senator Grosart: This is a real worry I have.

The Chairman: My worry is that that will be the lead in tomorrow's story.

Senator Grosart: No. This, to me, is the matter of real concern.

The Chairman: I take your point.

Senator Grosart: This becomes a matter of real concern. This has been so all over the world and in particular in Britain. They have tried to tackle this in the various legislative devices to say "You cannot report evidence until a certain point".

I do not see why most of the publishers object to the idea of a Press Council in Canada. I think it would be a good thing to have a Press Council because I think that the newspaper business is no less in need of continuing social control than any other aspect of the private enterprise system, in which I believe.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator Grosart.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, I think there is one very important question, Senator Grosart could give us a valuable opinion on and I think it should be asked.

What is your view, Senator, of the current discussion of whether Parliament itself should be televised, let us say, the question period. Let us take that as a starting point.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, with great respect I think that could lead into quite a lengthy answer.

I agree that Senator Grosart's opinion would be valuable but it is not a matter which really this Committee has been examining up until now. I am wondering if we really want to get into it tonight.

Senator Prowse: I do not know whether the Committee should get into it at all.

The Chairman: I think with great respect, Senator McElman, we should leave that at least over until another time.

Senator Grosart: I will give you my answer.

The Chairman: Please go ahead.

Senator Grosart: I think it would be great because we would have better attendance and less speeches read.

The Chairman: Is that satisfactory, Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Yes.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Senator Grosart, on behalf of the Committee. We are most grateful. It is obvious from the interest you have engendered we could have kept you here till midnight. I am sorry we cannot schedule you for longer. Perhaps we can ask you to come back again.

We are looking forward to hearing from the next witness and that is Professor Beattie who is here. Would he come forward please?

Honourable Senators, I think we might perhaps turn to our next discussion and that is with Professor Earle Beattie whom I have insisted upon several occasions elevating to the Dean of Journalism. I understand you are a professor of Journalism. Those Senators who have studied the biography in the book will realize that Professor Beattie has a wide background in just about every phase of journalism.

He has worked in a great many regions and areas of Canada.

Now, Professor Beattie, the brief which you were kind enough to prepare for us did not reach us until about early this week. So what it has been mimeographed and circulated. I must say I am not sure of the extent to which the Senators have given it the study which it deserves.

However, I have gone through as best I can and I am sure we will have questions for you.

Would you care to make an oral statement to begin with or would you prefer to proceed with our questioning.

Professor Earle J. Beattie, Professor of Journalism, University of Western Ontario, London, Ontario: I do have an oral statement.

The Chairman: Then by all means please present it.

Professor Beattie: I will try to confine it. I am allowed 15 minutes, am I not?

The Chairman: Yes. Perhaps you could bring out the main points. You carry right on. Go ahead.

Professor Beattie: Well, Mr. Chairman and Senators and Members of the public who are here, it is a pleasure to speak to the Upper House and I applaud the decision to set up a Senate Committee on Mass Media because I think it is long overdue.

Mr. Chairman, because you make that occasional announcement, I do not regard this as a court of law.

The Chairman: Good.

Professor Beattie: I think if some publishers do so, they have been watching Perry Mason on television too long and I am going to speak about the American influence on Mass Media a little later.

Topic one of the guidelines says "Define your own Position". I think the Chairman has said that I have worked in the media generally that is in newspapers, radio, television and film magazines. In 1949 I took over the journalism department at Ryerson Institute and taught there for five years. Then I did a stint of public relations and came to my present position in 1958. I am now Professor of Journalism at the University of Western Ontario in London.

Now, as regard the brief itself, the first section is on ownership and control of the media in London as it relates to performance. To illustrate, I have taken the "John Dickins case." You heard about the "John Dickins case" last Wednesday night at about exactly the time.

In my opinion John Dickins was put off the "Gen Line" program of CFPL because he did express opinions on social issues that the management of the Free Press Company did not like. He represented the voice of dissent and I would say perhaps the voice of news or dissenting views at any rate on the air waves in London; and as such I think that he was fulfilling Section 2D of the Broadcasting Act which does ask for different views on matters of public concern.

These issues are outlined on pages 2, 3 and 4 in my brief and just to summarize them—John Dickins called "a travesty of justice" the jailing and fining of 17 young people in London. He voiced approval of a demonstration near Sarnia which was a demonstration against the detonation of an atom bomb in the Aleutian Islands.

He criticized London judges for automatic sentencing—to use an expression—"hit-offenders—shop-lifters."

He criticized the Free Press itself for not running an ad by a well known local plumber by the name of Bob Paton. He opposed the Ontario Government's OHSIP program and its Tax Debate Plan. He spoke of the hazards of cigarette smoking, along with other issues.

Now, in handling the John Dickins story, none of the Free Press Company's spokesmen—that is for CFPL Radio, both AM and FM, CFPL-TV or the Free Press Newspaper, either the morning or afternoon edition,—provided what I would call a believable reason for the non-renewal of Dickins' contract.

They had printed a cut line on a page 1 picture October 16th last, which is one of my exhibits. That is Exhibit 3 and the cut line said that he will devote more time to development of the National Institute of Broadcasting. Now, the Free Press spokesmen—and I have talked to people in the Free Press and to John Dickins—say they could not reach John for comment before their deadline, but in my opinion this does not justify the use of a misleading cut line.

They well knew that John had left in protest and not just to get more time for his one man radio school. The same day when another man took over Dickins' former program, no mention was made of the change and CFPL radio news carried substantially the same story as that of the Free Press; the editor again claiming he could not reach John for a statement.

However, after Dickins aired his views on CKSL and CJOE they did manage to reach him and carried his views—that is in Exhibit 4—but again no official statement was ever given or has been given to this day as to why John was put off the air.

I think it should be pointed out that insofar as John Dickins did get his views aired on two rival radio stations in London that his reference to the Blackburn news monopoly cannot be fully sustained. Monopoly really means exclusive control of the market. It is however a quasi-monopoly having the lion's share of the London market. Perhaps it could be described as "an overwhelming dominance of the market".

On October 22 the Free Press published a letter to the editor by John Dickins and that is Exhibit 1. That letter was greatly edited. I have the original letter as Exhibit 2 and I have indicated by underlining the parts that were taken out. It will be noted that five of the nine social issues which Dickens said were unpopular with CFPL management were removed from the Free Press letter and that is in my brief.

Page 2, 3 and 4 are point 6, 7, 8 and 9. The editor's note at the end of the published Exhibit 1, that he had edited for the sake of brevity and possible libel seems to me a specious argument. In my opinion he simply took out portions that would have been embarrassing to the company.

The John Dickens charge that there was suppression and distortion seems to be born out by the exhibits.

In preparing my brief, incidentally, I omitted another rather interesting letter. On October 23 John Dickens wrote a second letter to the editor protesting the handling of the first letter and this he submitted personally to Mr. Heine, the editor. This letter was never published. Mr. Heine has claimed that all letters to the editor are published except those that are in the crank category but I cannot see how John's letter could be in that category.

My conclusion to the Dickens case is that where there is a local combination of media under one ownership, as in London, there can be a closing of ranks to suppress or distort information especially when that publication itself is under attack and that means manipulating news and comment in the interest of the company rather than providing what the Hutchins Commission back in 1947 called "a truthful, comprehensive account of the day's events."

Other criteria than this of the market place must be applied in mass media or programming will be only for the majority because that is where the sales potential of an advertised product is at its highest.

Many opinions must be aired that are reflective of minority views and media must lead a little. It must become educated to some degree. On pages 9 to 12 of my brief I discussed the manner in which the Free Press puts down any demonstration in the streets of our fair city.

I note a similarity between the story of December 14, 1968 and one published this last December 13, 1969 on the Viet Nam war moratorium. This is almost a year later. The first one was a demonstration against the California grape growers and was headed "Only 23 heed labour call for mass grape pickets". That is Exhibit 5.

In my opinion there is a negative bias throughout the story starting with the word "Only" in the head and continuing with such phrases as "40 minutes late" and in the sentence "In silence 23 pickets straggled single file through the market's northeast entrance. It was over in two minutes and fewer than half the customers or stand operators even saw it".

The second half of this story is a reprint of material from a booklet published by the California Grape Growers Organization and this is known as balance in reporting. Not biased in the first half and a propaganda piece in the second half. The words "straggled" is what Sam Hayakawa, the semanticist would call a snarl word rather than a peevish word.

In the handling of the Viet Nam war moratorium story, the Free Press reporter took no time in getting to that word "straggled". This is Exhibit 6. The lead paragraph reads "A straggle of 147 protesters against sun wars and ideologies staged a quiet one-hour march in downtown London today".

Later in the story "As the group straggled by the sidewalk to St. Peter's Basilica a middle aged woman with an eastern European accent called out "God bless Nixon".

They always seem to find some little old lady that gives them the exact right quote they want. If they do not find a little old lady then it is a little old man who marches out of the park saying "One of those damned communists". He may be real. He may be a product of the imagination, I do not know, but he always seems to be in the story.

Again we read in this story "Few people saw this parade". As Walter Lippman put it "For the most part we do not first see the parade then define. We define first and then see the parade." It seems to me that the reporter brings preconception to a story and brings in this case editorial opinions into the story.

I think the Free Press has got into serious rut about this that when one group demonstrates against both the invasion of Czechoslovakia and the American role in Viet Nam, it was left speechless. It was so baffled that it carried no story at all, just a picture and the Free Press did refuse to carry the advance notices that were sent in to the editor on that occasion.

Their argument seems to be that advance notices help recruit demonstrators but that solid citizens hold a protest meeting of their own sort, like the one on Finance Minister on's White Paper on taxation quite recently, here was advance notice. This of course is an eminently respectable issue, money.

I wrote a letter to the publisher criticizing the moratorium story and did not get a reply. Any criticism of the media seems to draw either of two reactions, self-righteous anger or silence. It seems some editors suffer from some sort of ancient guilt that makes them over-sensitive to criticism. They seem to conceive of themselves as sort of knights in search of the Holy Grail who are suddenly accused of rape.

Exhibit 7 and 8 concern bias in the play of labour story. Exhibit 8 and 10 illustrate the bias in the handling of a CBC story and Exhibit 11A and 11B illustrate to my mind bias in the handling of a strike lock-out of brewery workers, struggling manfully to get into the twentieth century.

Today it allows outside columnists to enter the sacred precincts of its pages. At one time it seems the Free Press was trying to conduct a closed society in London. One of the outside columnists is Charles Lynch of the Southam News Service. His presence there is due either to the merit of his column or the fact that Southam has a 25 per cent interest in the Free Press.

About a year ago the Free Press took Weekend magazine out of its Saturday paper and substituted The Canadian. Now, this was not really a question, to my mind, as to whether the readers preferred one over the other but one of corporate linkage, as The Canadian was owned by Southam and the Toronto Star, under the name of South-Star.

I do not want to give the impression that the Free Press stands alone on some of these questionable media practices. It has company. On pages 16, 17 and 18 of my brief I refer to the Toronto Telegram coverage of the Ontario provincial election of 1967. A survey done by one of our journalism students shows that from October 10 to October 17 that year the space devoted to the three parties was P.C.'s 19 column inches. New Democrats 585 column inches and Liberals 446 column inches.

Now, when we applied a semantic scale to the stories and the heads on the basis of favourable, neutral and unfavourable material the scores worked out this way. Conservatives—1,873—that is more than double its column inches, the Liberals—39, and the DP—minus 916.

There is more detail in the brief itself. It is a rather complicated process but it is a qualitative analysis and there is a certain amount of subjectivity involved in making that kind of analysis. But as I say, you get more detail from the brief itself.

On pages 18 to 21 of the brief you will find material on the disappearing dailies and development of chains. In 1911 Canada had 143 dailies when the population was 3,272,000. Today with somewhat more than six times that population it has 114 dailies at my last count and half of these are part of the six newspaper chains. This concentration is much greater in Canada than in the United States. That is, on a circulation percentage basis.

The largest U.S. chain, the Chicago Tribune group, holds only six per cent of the total circulation of all U.S. dailies and that compares with 18.5 per cent held by the F.P. Publications in Canada of total Canadian circulation.

In other words three times as large as the largest chain in the States.

Nobody in the United States has played the game of newspaper monopoly as efficiently as K.C. Irving who has set up all the dailies in one province, New Brunswick. There is no newspaper owner or chain owner in the United States who has an entire state like this.

To sum up the ownership and control question: six groups own about half the dailies in Canada and command more than half the circulation.

I have more detail about this in an appended article I wrote for the Gazette, International Journal on the Sciences of the Press, which was published in Amsterdam. That is Exhibit 12.

When some of these chains hold corporate and media interest in radio and television and magazines, questions must be raised concerning the concentration of power in a few hands with possible effects on free speech. Centralization also makes it difficult for new papers to start up and independently owned papers to survive the chain competition.

On page 22 of the brief I point out the dilemma of the print media being privately owned but expected to act like public utilities. I think the public has a right to accurate, truthful information and diversity of viewpoints in their paper as they pay the full shot. They pay this through their subscriptions or buying street sales and actually by buying the products that are advertised in the paper. The cost of that advertising is put in the price of the product, of course.

Parliament and government as the custodians of civil liberties also have a right. The sale of information and comment affecting public opinion in a democracy cannot be treated like the sale of corn flakes and yet it seems to me that the government does little or nothing to assist the print media financially or to help create competing papers.

Perhaps a public corporation like the CBC could produce a national newspaper. In the meantime I believe a press council or media council could be created to serve the public and to serve the media themselves.

On page 24 I point out that 10 nations of the world now have such Press Councils and I list their objectives.

A research foundation with public education would be vital to this as many people do use media as a scapegoat and have a narcissistic complex. They expect the media to reflect back only their own images of reality.

We really have not had very much study in connection with media in Canada. I think that the founding of a picture in media study in Canada was Carlton McNaught's "Canada gets the news" published in 1940. Scholarly books have been few in particular. There has been Wilfrid Kesterson's "History of the press" published only two years ago. There has been "Mass Media in Canada" a collection of essays and there has been "The Vertical Mosaic" by John Porter. There have been, of course, many articles in newspapers and magazines and so on.

In the United States this kind of study has been going on for 30 years and I think the research function would be an important part of any Press Council.

I deal in the next section with advertising and I conclude with a comment that the eight and nine columns draw sheets of daily papers are really made to accommodate the ads and not the reader. McLuhan once quipped that a newspaper is not something to read. It is something you get into. And I think it is something you get ads into.

I really think that the information and comment can be better packaged and this would mean tabloid or quarto size. I think its contents could be organized by computer in categories, pretty much like a news magazine so that you could find the news. Today the news is lost in the ads. You do have broad categories like sports and women's news and business news and sometimes local news pages.

Display ads like classified ads could be grouped at the back of the paper as in the yellow pages of the phone book.

Now,...

The Chairman: Professor Beattie, I am wondering before you go on I would point out now, sir, you have been speaking for about 30 minutes. I am sure you did not realize that and neither we because it was so interesting but I am anxious to turn to the questioning.

How much longer do you think you will need to finish your comment?

Professor Beattie: I have three pages here. can probably summarize them.

The Chairman: I would be grateful if you could, sir. I do not mean to be rude...

Professor Beattie: I am used to talking to classes of students for an hour or even two hours at a time and 15 minutes is quite a restriction.

In this latter part I am just calling for more Canadian correspondents abroad. I do not think the Canadian Press is putting enough people in the field. Individual newspapers like the Montreal Star or the Toronto Star or the Toronto Telegram who are putting correspondents in the field, of course, are helping but I wonder why they do not put that money into Canadian Press, because you do get a lot of American bias on our news service—certainly carried over in connection with Vietnam and anywhere American foreign policy is involved.

I ask here for more of that and a survey conducted amongst freshmen students across the country a couple of years ago showed these students knew American figures more than they knew Canadian figures.

For instance, Lyndon Johnson was better known than Lester Pearson. Robert McNamara was identified by three-quarters of the students and only 65 per cent knew Peter Hellyer, knew his position.

This kind of information is growing and I think our opinion is being formed south of the border because of the news wire service and because of a lot of syndicated material that appears in the paper.

God knows what damage Little Orphan Annie has done to this country. We have 1 the comic strips. We have Ann Landers and on. I think we can generate this locally.

Let me end it all by saying I think the schools could do a lot, that there could be media education in high schools. We at our university at Western are attempting to educate journalists. I think we are turning out a good calibre of students and we are trying to educate them not only for today but for tomorrow because we are facing the electronic newspaper and perhaps the delivery of all news electronically on cable TV that will be delivered on screens and by print-outs though a kind of facsimile.

This is a summary of the brief.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I did not mean to hurry you at the end, Professor Beattie. I think the questions this evening will begin with Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: Professor Beattie, the John Dickins case facts were set out completely here previously. We have one side and we have also had the other and because of the likeness and the fact that we are not a court to decide these things anyway, I do not know if we need to go too far into that again.

I think the point has been made and if I understand your point correctly it is that the only newspaper and the major radio station were owned by the same person and you feel that Dickins was not given a full or fair opportunity to air his complaint and that these two units did not give it the play that you would expect that they would have given as a matter of the importance that you think it is.

Professor Beattie: I think these units of the Free Press distorted the story of one of their own, so to speak and that concerned a story, that was really a cut line, with a picture on him leaving their services because he wanted to develop his school.

I think that would be a distortion of information and then the radio station, which they also own, carried pretty much the same story.

The TV station carried nothing whatsoever and so when you get a local combination like that you get what I call a closing of ranks on that kind of story.

We do not know just how many times they might do that on something else. There is a certain danger in this kind of combination.

I did say however, you cannot really call it a monopoly in London because John did get on a rival radio station with his comment.

Senator Prowse: And the Toronto papers which did carry the story on it, come into the area too, do they not?

Professor Beattie: Yes. The Globe and Mail sells the highest in London. I think the combined circulation of all papers coming into London is around six thousand. That was in the Free Press presentation last week.

The Globe and Mail is the leader.

The Chairman: It is around six thousand, I believe.

Senator Prowse: I thought it was 16,000. The thing I wondered about this is: if Dickins was doing such a good job, why did not one of the other radio stations grab him up?

Professor Beattie: Well, they did.

Senator Prowse: Is he working for one of them now?

Professor Beattie: He is now the manager of CJOE, a rival station.

Senator Prowse: Is he still running his hotline program?

Professor Beattie: He has opened up what he calls "Action Line" now for another station.

Senator Prowse: So the story has a happy ending then?

Professor Beattie: For him it does, yes.

Senator Prowse: And for the people of London. They now have a chance if they want to listen to him. Is he doing the same thing in his new capacity that he was doing before?

Professor Beattie: It seems to be pretty much the same thing as he was doing before, yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, in reading your brief, you have complained about the mass pickets was that you suggest on page 5—I think—. Is the exhibit of the grape pickers?

Professor Beattie: I think you have gone beyond 5 on that.

The Chairman: Exhibit No. 3 is the grape pickers.

Senator Prowse: It is page 9. My note says "the grapes of wrath," that is the way I have it written down.

Professor Beattie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Your objection here is that you say the story is not as objectively written as it should be. Is that correct?

Professor Beattie: I think that it is a put-down and it shows the same kind of language used in another demonstration later. You get one of the words "straggle". You get "nobody saw"—"A few people saw", I should say, and words to that effect.

Senator Prowse: Well, this brings us, I think there is a good chance to examine the thing called "objectivity". Are there any of these statements untrue or any of these words incorrect descriptions of what happened?

Were you at the protest meeting yourself, by any chance?

Professor Beattie: Not at the grape-pickers meeting but I was at the second one which was the Moratorium.

Senator Prowse: The Viet Nam one. Let us deal with this one first. Let us take the Viet Nam one. Was there anything in the description of the Viet Nam one which is incorrect in itself?

I am not trying to cross-examine you. I am trying to establish the fact.

Professor Beattie: That is fine. We are on page 10 now. I say "A straggle of 147". In the first place—well, I suppose you have to allow a reporter some figure of speech but "A straggle" is a put-down word. Why "A straggle of protesters"? You know why not "A group" or something like that in referring to . . .

Senator Prowse: Is that a word out of Time magazine, maybe?

Professor Beattie: I think it is a negative word.

Senator Prowse: It is a kind of word that Time magazine would use, is it not?

Professor Beattie: It is what Hayakawa would call a snarly word which is one of those types of words.

Senator Prowse: It is a pretty descriptive word.

Professor Beattie: It is not an accurate word.

Senator Prowse: If you have a group that is not marching in lines like a platoon or an army parade, all set up in lines, I would think that they would be fairly descriptive.

Perhaps you do not like it but is it not possible that a person might write that word thinking it was just a good descriptive word of a group that was an unorganized group of people coming down without bothering to line themselves up.

Professor Beattie: I say it has been used in two stories in connection with demonstration but you do not see it anywhere else.

If the businessmen, when they were criticizing Mr. Benson, walked into a hall in small groups, they would not be called "A straggle" so you use this kind of semantics for a demonstration but you do not use it for something you favour.

In Time as well, if Time likes a man "strides into the room and shakes hands firmly with the President". If they do not like him "He shuffles into the room" and that is what I am getting at here.

Senator Prowse: Nobody ever walks in?

Professor Beattie: The neutral connotation would be to walk, yes.

Senator Prowse: In other words you are suggesting that this would be a very subtle kind of bias really?

Professor Beattie: Subtle or semantic bias, yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, with the Viet Nam war, they did report it?

Professor Beattie: They did report it, yes.

Senator Prowse: And now the fact that there were 23 pickets who came out; a group of 23 people came to protest. What is the population of London?

Professor Beattie: Well, my figure for the population of London is 120,000 but the Free Press last week gave it somewhere around 180,000.

The Chairman: The Free Press said 180,000. I phoned the municipal office and they said it was 209,000.

Professor Beattie: I am sorry. I meant 200,000 not 120,000. My figure was 220,000.

The Chairman: His figure in his brief was 180,000. My figure is 209,000.

Senator Prowse: Well, 23 people would not be very many people.

Professor Beattie: No, that is true.

Senator Prowse: What I am thinking of is come from Edmonton and if I only got 23 people out to a political meeting I wouldn't get very much space in the paper and I certainly would not get a picture in it. The fact that they got that much space can hardly be the basis for an allegation of bias or a suppression of news.

Professor Beattie: Well, in a way it would be better to have no space at all. If all the mention you get is in the Toronto Telegram, certainly it is a sort of a negative situation whereas the NDP ends up with a minus 916 that count. Perhaps they would have been better out of the paper altogether.

Senator Prowse: Of course, again, you see, the figure of 916—I do not want to put you down—but you admit that this is a very arbitrary semantic weighing. That has just been taken by this person and has not in my opinion been approved or adopted by anybody else, has it?

Professor Beattie: Semantic studies have often used.

Senator Prowse: Who establishes we will multiply it by five for this and one for that and by minus one for that? Who establishes that weighing?

Professor Beattie: My students. My fourth year student who studied in consultation with me. We set up a role but you see it all applies to all parties.

Senator Prowse: I know, but here you want to get this measurement and you had your own yardstick and nobody else used that same kind of ruler. Is that not true?

Professor Beattie: It doesn't really matter what kind of ruler you use as long as you use the same ruler on each party.

Senator Prowse: I used to play chess with my son but I quit because he kept setting the rules and the rules were the same for all of us except he would make them after the play.

The Chairman: I think at this point I should say, Senator, I am sure it is not your intention to quarrel with the academic integrity of that paper?

Senator Prowse: No.

The Chairman: I mean, the witness has brought these figures forward in good faith. I think the point Senator Prowse is making, if I can interpret him, is he is wondering if there wasn't some bias built into these statistics and I think in making that point, Senator, you should be careful you are not questioning the integrity of the witness in bringing that information to us.

Senator Prowse: No, I am not questioning anybody's integrity. I will make that perfectly clear.

The Chairman: Quite.

Senator Prowse: What I am doing I am wondering about the accuracy of this form of measurement or the validity of it. It has nothing to do with anybody's integrity.

The Chairman: Is it a valid technique?

Professor Beattie: I think many people in communications studies would say it is valid and others would say it is not valid.

All I would say and I did say it is open to subjectivity. It is not a 100 per cent precise measurement.

Senator Prowse: You cannot be precise, can you? Well, so far as we know there is no way anybody can.

Professor Beattie: I do not think you can, especially when you are dealing with words. You are trying to define what is neutral or what is favourable or unfavourable. You have a word like "policeman". You can say it is either a neutral or a favourable word but if this policeman is called a "pig" that is an unfavourable word to my mind and can be categorized that way.

Senator Prowse: I think it would be generally agreed it was. Now, the point I was getting at is this: you can establish by a series of views, evidence that would seem to indicate that there has been a great deal of bias in reporting news to the large majority of people in the London area. Is that a fair statement?

Professor Beattie: I would not go that far.

The Chairman: Before we go ahead I want to make sure Senator Prowse and Senators and all others understand that the survey you are talking about was not one made in London, it was in Toronto.

Professor Beattie: Certainly.

The Chairman: It was an election survey.

Senator Prowse: Yes, but I am talking about London because he has used this to illustrate. You cannot just arbitrarily take a figure.

The Chairman: I did not want anybody to be confused.

Senator Prowse: To go quickly over it, the point I am trying to get at is this. You have heard Senator Grosart earlier. You have heard other people; and you also have read and we have heard people say that newspapers strive for objectivity; but at every side of the reporting process, it starts with a selection of facts, and then an interpretation of the facts and I think you even make the point in here somewhere, the question is: to tell the truth about the truth about the facts.

Professor Beattie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: In other words have you got any suggestions as to how anybody is going to ensure that there can be complete objectivity in the reporting of news by any of the media?

Professor Beattie: There can never be complete objectivity. There is no such thing as facts except you might say there are first-order facts, but a fact consists of a context in which that fact appears and you remove that context and no fact will really stand up on its own.

It is a question of abstraction. We can say that this table is so long but who says whether this table is a beautiful table or not? Is that a fact or not? It is just a question of opinion.

You get very quickly from facts to opinion. We think first—as you mentioned—the selection of facts. You select those facts that are favourable to your case if you really want to make a case. You reject those facts that are not. In that way Time magazine has so fooled the people into believing these are the facts.

In the first place, you can never collect all the facts. You must make a selection of information as a sub-set of data. You cannot get all the information on any situation so you see those facts in all the situations.

To answer your question, sir, I believe that a reporter should strive for objectivity knowing that he...

Senator Prowse: Will fall short?

Professor Beattie: ...is perhaps conditioned by his environment. He should strive for balance and objectivity to the greatest degree.

Senator Prowse: We have had witnesses who have come and put two propositions to us. Some of them said, "We insist on complete objective reporting of the facts" and then they tried to separate the facts and opinion. We have other people like John Bassett who says the name of the game is responsibility. People know the Telegram is published by John Bassett and that John Bassett is responsible for what is in there, and if they do not like what is in there, they know I publish so they can make allowances.

Now, of the two, the person who strives for the impossible and ends up with something imperfect and the fellow who says, "It is impossible to be perfect but this is my version," which one, in your opinion, better serves the public interest? The devil you know or the devil you do not know?

Professor Beattie: I would rather the devil you can see if I had to make a choice, because I think that if a reporter or a writer puts a byline on a story, and the more bylines the better, and says, "I see the situation this way", you can read that report and you know who sends it, or at least you have got an idea about who sends it to you, and you know that this is in fact the way he looked at the situation.

We represent as a fact many things that are really not facts.

Senator Prowse: Let us take another one. You have suggested the papers might be put together and have more Canadian foreign correspondents overseas.

Senator McElman: Excuse me. May I have a supplementary on the former question?

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead.

Senator McElman: On this matter of facts and objectivity in the case of Dickins, without going into all the details—you know Mr. Dickins, do you?

Professor Beattie: Yes.

Senator McElman: You have talked with him.

Professor Beattie: I met him the week before I came up here. I interviewed him in this case. I interviewed people in the Leam Press.

Senator McElman: Your brief says you have dealt with him at some length.

Professor Beattie: Yes.

Senator McElman: Did you also interview Mr. Blackburn and Mr. Heine?

Professor Beattie: I talked to Mr. Blackburn in London.

Senator McElman: In this particular case?

Professor Beattie: Yes. And I talked to Mr. Hugh Bremner, who is the news editor of the radio station, and I talked to one editor of the radio station on this issue.

Senator McElman: Did you talk to Mr. Heine himself, the one who dealt with this, I believe, from the information we have.

The Chairman: Where did he deal with it?

Senator McElman: Was he not involved in the Free Press end of it?

The Chairman: In the Free Press end of it, yes; I am sorry. Murray Brown on the broadcasting side and Mr. Heine on the Free Press.

Professor Beattie: I did not talk to Mr. Heine, no. This was a radio station matter. I could have talked to Mr. Heine about the publication of that letter perhaps, but I did not.

Senator McElman: Did you talk with Mr. Brown?

Professor Beattie: No, I did not talk to Mr. Brown.

Senator McElman: Would your answer to these questions not fall into the category of what we have just been discussing, the presentation of all the facts from the sources available?

Professor Beattie: I think having talked to Blackburn himself and Hugh Bremner, the news editor, and Ron Laidlaw the TV editor, and Gord Whitehead, another news editor, this is about as far as I could go in getting the facts—

Senator McElman: You did not think that Mr. Brown and Mr. Heine could have given you information? It would have been useful to discuss it with them since they were, from the standpoint of the broadcasting unit which was involved and the news editor which was reputedly very deeply involved in not properly handling the story, these are the people responsible, are they not, in each case?

Mr. Heine is responsible on the newspaper and Mr. Brown is responsible on the broadcasting side.

Professor Beattie: I think the two letters speak for themselves; the letter that he submitted and the edited version of the letter and Bill Heine—I was here last Wednesday night when he did make a statement on this and heard that statement, and when Mr. Brown made a statement, and said John was not performing satisfactorily. He gave an opinion without facts. I took a note of this.

Senator McElman: Yes, but was your brief not prepared in advance of that?

Professor Beattie: Yes, it was.

Senator McElman: Well, I am getting back to my basic question. Do you not think it would have been useful to a consideration of the whole discussion or the whole problem, if you will, that the two members, the ones basically responsible for the publication of the newspaper and the management of the radio station—the man who did not renew the contract—would your discussion with them not have been germane to the whole issue in getting a balance, fully factual?

Professor Beattie: Well, I think having talked to Walter Blackburn himself and he is the man over the whole show there, and the radio people and the TV editor, I was just about covering the field. I could have gone on but there is a limit to the amount of time in interviewing I can do for this brief.

Senator Prowse: Now, on page 32 you talk about Canadian foreign correspondents, and then you go on on the next pages and you deal very impressively and very convincingly with the difficulties that are presented to Canadians by the fact we do not have more foreign correspondents abroad. You suggest that the papers perhaps should do more.

In view of the fact that we have figures that it costs probably a minimum of $35,000 a year in order to maintain one man abroad—almost anywhere—by the time you figure his salary and travelling expenses, and then to find a man who can speak the language of that particular country and who can get some background on it—I would think this would probably be the minimum figure.

Do you think it would be practical for many more papers outside the big metropolitan dailies, who are doing some of this now—to be sending out their own correspondents abroad?

Professor Beattie: No. I would favour the Canadian Press as the CP has 103 newspapers and the CP is the best agency for that, and a pooling of their resources.

If Mr. Bassett would put up money for the Canadian Press all the people of Canada would get the benefit through all the papers, not only the Telegram.

If other firms could do the same, if the Toronto Star did the same, I think we could probably field a dozen correspondents.

Senator Prowse: They have been asked this question. Their general attitude is they have been trying to sell the services to other papers in other parts of the country. The Southam service goes to all their papers. Thomson, I do not think makes any attempt at that. The Globe and Mail does it and then they make it available to anybody that wants to buy it. It is in the FP group.

Then they usually have services involved, the Montreal Star has its Worldwide service, which is available for any paper that wants to buy it. And they have said the trouble is nobody wants to share the expenses with them.

Professor Beattie: It seems to me you have a fragmented situation there where the Star can only afford, say, two or three correspondents abroad, whatever they have. They can only cover three capitals of the world. If they put that money into the CP pool, there would be three. The Globe would be another three. The Toronto Star some more. You could cover a dozen capitals.

Senator Prowse: But the CP now does provide services. They have men in these main places. They serve these main places with their men. From their New York office they have services of all the major international news agencies.

Professor Beattie: Oh, yes.

Senator Prowse: Reuters, Agence France-Presse, UPI, and Associated Press; and they bring it in that way.

Now, we are getting a choice. We are getting somebody else's opinion—at least it has filtered through presumably Canadian editors.

Professor Beattie: Well, it is just filtered and no more. The men who sit at the New York desk for CP or the London desk for CP are only able to process the copy. They cannot check back and relate back to the source of this, you see, and they do not have many foreign correspondents as such in the field who get news at the source. They had a Moscow correspondent. He has been withdrawn. They now have a Paris correspondent. I think they have one or two in Washington. But as far as I know they have only got probably three foreign correspondents now in the field.

Senator Prowse: It is the same thing with the CBC. They have agents or stringers or somebody out there.

Professor Beattie: The CBC is bigger than the CP in terms of foreign correspondent. They must have about seven men in the field regularly and this is the largest Canadian foreign correspondents corps.

Senator Prowse: Now, another thing that worries me about foreign news—let us take the Biafra story. That was referred to here earlier today. There have been a lot of reporters that have been sent over to Biafra and have you seen any two stories that look the same?

Professor Beattie: I cannot say I have, no. I think they all take a different look at the situation.

Senator Prowse: And if we did have a single one doing it, the complaint we have had about CP is, because it has to serve 100 newspapers, they just come down to the bare bones, and although they have made a great improvement, we are told, it still tends to be a relatively dull reporting of the news.

What will we get if we had something like that? We may be worse off than we are today.

Professor Beattie: Personally, I think if you compare the dullness of C.P. against the colour stories that you see on foreign situations, if you want colour, you have to go to Gordon Sinclair and the Llama in India and that is colour, but just how accurate and meaningful is it?

Senator Prowse: If he stumbled on a fact it would be pure accident.

Professor Beattie: No. I think the lesser of two evils is this: as between colour and a sort of neutrality of the CP.

I would like to see more neutral writing but you had a dozen Canadian Press correspondents in that field it would not prevent the Toronto Star from sending a man into a really big situation that they think that requires for themselves alone.

Senator Prowse: But the metropolitan dailies are not going to pay the whole shot of getting out a CP man to completely duplicate a service they are already providing for their own readers. That would be for the use of their competitors; that is not practical.

Professor Beattie: I suppose not. I suppose they sort of look after their own interests first. If CP is supposed to be a co-operative news agency.

Senator Prowse: Now, the next situation from a practical point of view is the one you suggest. You suggest maybe we could have a national newspaper set up by the Government along the lines of the CBC.

In view of the fact that the government of the day, or whoever the government happens to be, catches more heck because of the CBC than probably anything else that happens; do you think anybody in this country would stand for a minute and how long would any government last that attempts to set up its paper?

Professor Beattie: Well, the way I look at it.

Senator Prowse: A Canadian Izvestia, I suppose.

Professor Beattie: I would say I would look at that with some misgiving, but the CBC generally has kept well free of political control. I think they have turned out some very good programs. It is not really government-controlled. It is public—it is a Crown corporation, so to speak.

Senator Prowse: That nobody can control.

Professor Beattie: And it is very difficult to control, yes.

Senator Prowse: They do not even have the marketplace control them. That is one of the criticisms, is it not?

Professor Beattie: Well, they seem to be moving more and more into the marketplace, in my mind.

Senator Prowse: If we wanted to do it, would the practical situation be that the press attaché or the Third Secretaries or First Secretaries or authorized persons attached to Canadian missions abroad, might be able to send in a despatch for the use of the CP?

Professor Beattie: I doubt if that would be a very workable plan.

Senator Prowse: Would you think that a national newspaper could be set up in a way the public would believe it was not to be an instrument of government propaganda?

Professor Beattie: Well, I think if it was set up like the CBC is set up and had its own correspondents as the CBC does.

Senator Prowse: Of if the CBC would do it.

Professor Beattie: Possibly.

Senator Prowse: That is fine. Now, when it comes to the matter of owners; we have been told time and time again the reason that there is this increasing concentration and development of the chain, and you have referred to it, is because of the impact of taxes. I do not know whether we can do anything about this or not. There would be other things.

There is a tendency for a person to want to sell the individual family-owned newspaper. The only people that can buy it is either somebody who has a lot of money in which case he may have other axes to grind, or else he owns a chain of newspapers.

Now, we have protestations of those people who have chains that they allow their editors complete independence. This is their evidence and we have no evidence to the contrary, but even though they may, it is not desirable they should have too many or get too big, or have too many in one area.

Now, have you got any suggestions as to how, when we are faced with the practicalities of a growing concentration, we can maintain both the fact and the appearance of independence so that the public will be able to continue to have confidence in what they read in the newspapers or hear over their radios or see on their TV?

Have you any practical suggestions to deal with this very, very serious problem?

Professor Beattie: It seems to me that you have two alternatives, to start breaking up the chains that are there now or you can put through legislation that they will not be able to grow any larger. That is, as far as the physical plant is concerned.

Senator Prowse: You have more chains in...

Professor Beattie: Well, I was making a comparison with the United States where there are many, manymore small chains. There are linkages of two or three of maybe six newspapers, and this sort of thing, and I think that is a little healthier than the situation we have of six big chains. They are not all big, but six chains have 50% of the total circulation of the country.

You wonder how this could have developed in view of the anti-combines legislation.

I am not an expert in law, I do not know, but to my mind it is not a good situation.

Senator Prowse: I would suggest to you that I have looked at American newspapers outside, about a half-a-dozen big metropolitan dailies. The average American city up to a population of over one million does not have a newspaper that can hold a candle to what we get in cities of 250,000 and up in this country.

Professor Beattie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: In the amount of news and the quality of the news.

Professor Beattie: I quite agree.

Senator Prowse: They depend on their TV for an hour and a half of news and their big national dailies.

Professor Beattie: I have found the quality of the average afternoon daily in the United States much lower than that in Canada, and I have spent summers in the United States on courses and whatnot. World news is poorly covered, real trivial news.

I think our newspapers as a group are away ahead of the Americans.

We are ahead of the British except for the Times maybe and the Manchester Guardian, but I think our papers are good.

You know, you talk about British journalism. You have to talk about the Express, the Daily Mirror and the News of the World. Papers like that are not high quality.

Senator Prowse: Now, there has been a suggestion made—let me read this to you and see what your reaction is. It is out of "Grass Roots Editor." It is called "Revolt of Journalism, the Obligation for Survival," and it is a speech by Mr. Bryce W. Rucker?

Professor Beattie: Yes, I have read it.

Senator Prowse: Have you read this one?

Professor Beattie: Yes.

Senator Prowse: He deals with the fact here that the answer may be to put a professional newspaperman in charge of the whole editorial section of the newspaper. In other words, the same as businesses today are no longer run by the owners but by professional business managers.

If we stop thinking of the newspaper in terms of the, you know, little country editor whose job was to print the news and raise hell, but that we have coming up a group of professionals and that we try to hasten the process by which they become real professionals; and that when you appoint an editor he is the fellow who has the whole responsibility for the news and such other people probably ought to be with him.

I think there are a couple of newspapers in Paris that do this and I understand that the German Newspapers Editors Unions are working on it and may have had some success.

Do you think that may be a realistic answer to the problem here?

Professor Beattie: I think it would be an excellent answer.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the ownership of a newspaper would just be another form of investment and the running of a newspaper then would be the job for professional people, who would have to perform or get fired.

Professor Beattie: Well, senator, I think that this is actually the case on some newspapers. The owner is not very active on the newspaper. He has turned it over to the editor-in-chief.

You take an owner like John Bassett; he believes in personal journalism. That is not the exception than the rule today, so I think Bryce Rucker's article is something I would agree with and should be extended as much as is possible. This is: return the newspaper to the newsman. This is really getting back to the editor as controller, a sort of John Dafoe editor, perhaps.

The Chairman: Before Senator Prowse goes on, I would point out to the Committee that this is now ten-thirty. I gave commitments to certain senators and I am anxious to keep these commitments. The Committee is meeting at ten o'clock in the morning and I hope that the Honourable Senator Prowse will keep that in mind.

Senator Prowse: I will make this the last question.

The Chairman: I do not mean to limit you.

Senator Prowse: No. It is just one point that I think it probably the most important thing he has talked about.

Here I have found the quotation: "I firmly believe that the only solution is for the working journalists to assume complete unquestioned control of the news editorial operation of the news media.

"Without doubt the working journalists of America have to be given a completely free hand, the desire, the drive, the guts, the know-how to make every medium of communications in this land a vital force. You have had the training and experience to accomplish what generations of owners have failed to do. You have the right, indeed the obligation to demand control. You have precedents on your side."

and then he goes on.

This sets out the proposal. Now, is that a proposition for the future basis for a really free and worthwhile communications media, not just the press, in your opinion?

Professor Beattie: Well, I do think it is an ideal and it is something I would favour. I just wonder how many owners of media would be willing to back up that much.

Senator Prowse: Well, the owners all say they are going to have to sell. Even before Mr. Benson came out with his White Paper, they said they had to sell; so if we are faced with the inevitability that they have to sell, maybe somebody ought to be trying to sell them.

Professor Beattie: Of course, you know as Jim Porter says in "The Vertical Mosaic", the policies of top editors are not that much different than that of the owners.

Senator Prowse: Yes. But if the whole working press is responsible for doing this, and you use the editorial conference—extend that into the management team and not just that single light at the top of the pyramid.

Professor Beattie: In other words, you would democratize the newsroom and a lot of decisions would be made?

Senator Prowse: Down to middle management anyway.

Professor Beattie: Yes, I think it would be a very good idea.

Senator Prowse: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Do any other senators have questions?

That being so, I would just simply say, Professor Beattie, on my own behalf and on behalf of the senators that we are very grateful to you for a very useful documentation and it is one which I am particularly anxious that the members of the Committee study.

I do not think that has been possible because of when we received it. I think we all do our homework. I think this particular document will be studied with great interest.

As I point out now and will point out to the other members of the Committee, the document contains an enormous number of extremely useful statistics which quite frankly sets some of the problems we have been talking about into a perspective. It really hones in on some of the problems which concern us most. I can assure you it is a valuable documentation as such. I think it will be a valuable document for the Committee.

Do you wish to add anything?

I think this is a very thorough documentation, and we are grateful for it.

Professor Beattie: Thank you very much. No, I have nothing to add. I am talked out.

Senator Prowse: May I just add one comment?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Prowse: I would like to add to what you said. The thing I was impressed most with was the tremendous amount of personal work which you must have put into it in order to have completed it.

The Chairman: I think the operative word is "perspective" and this paper helps to put it into perspective.

Now, may I remind the senators the schedule for the balance of the week?

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, January 29, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, I would like to call this session in order. I have no announcement which I have made several times. Please note that the brief from The Just Society will not be received today at 2.30 so after this morning's session the next meeting will be at 4 o'clock, upstairs, to receive the brief from Professor Donald Cameron of The Lysterious East. Both the meeting at 4 o'clock and the meeting tomorrow at 10 o'clock to receive the brief of The Toronto Star, will be held in the room upstairs.

Following this morning's meeting I would like to ask the Senators to stay just five minutes to talk about scheduling and subsequent weeks.

This morning we are receiving the brief from The Canadian Society of Professional Journalists. Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Frank Drea, who is President of the Society and director of The Toronto Telegram's Action Line.

On my immediate left is Mr. Martin Goodman, Vice-President of the Society and Managing Editor of the The Toronto Star.

On the right end of the table is Mr. Rae Orrell, a member of the Society and a legal writer for The Toronto Star.

At the left end of the table is Mr. Jeff Arruthers, a member of the Society's executive board and a science writer for The Ottawa Journal.

I would just point out, as the brief does at the top of page two, that I think it is important to realize that the collective experience of this group embraces a wide number of papers in various regions of Canada, including both wire services active in Canada. The Senators will realize we have been anxious and remain anxious, as well as hearing from publishers and owners and other people with special views on communications, wherever possible to hear from members of the working press.

Mr. Drea, you have a brief which I don't believe we have received and therefore perhaps you could read the brief and following that we will have some questions for you. I am sure they will be directed to other members of your panel as well. Mr. Drea.

Mr. Frank Drea, President of the Canadian Society of Professional Journalists: Mr. Chairman, The Canadian Society of Professional Journalists is pleased to appear before your Committee and welcomes the inquiry into the performance of the press. The purpose of our appearance is primarily to allow the Committee face-to-face contact with working members of the profession, with people who are concerned about the standards of journalism and who have had a wide range of experience in it. Before I indicate some of the Society's purposes and goals, I would like to introduce the delegation before you. Since Senator Davey has done that I will forgo that.

I would like to say that Professor Ted Schrader would have been with us but unfortunately his health did not permit. That is why he is not here.

The collective experience of this group embraces a wide number of papers in most regions of Canada, including both wire services active in Canada. Between us we have also done most of the jobs that exist on newspapers. I hope our broad knowledge of how newspapers work will prove of some use to the committee. While we are here as members of the Society, the views expressed in answering your questions are of course personal.

Let me now explain the purpose of the Canadian Society of Professional Journalists.

Reporters and editors in Canada's print and electronic media are members of one professional community. That community, to date, has lacked both a forum for discussion and a united voice. The Canadian Society of Professional Journalists was formed to provide such a forum and such a voice.

The society holds that professionalism involves responsibilities both inside and outside journalism. Inside, professionalism implies the conscious and determined pursuit of high standards. Outside, it implies a united effort to strengthen the rights and enlarge the usefulness of the profession.

The founders of the Society were members of the Sigma Delta Chi, an American-based professional association, who recognized that only a specifically Canadian organization could promote the necessary dialogue and participation among Canadian journalists.

The Society proposes to work for higher professional awareness:

By fostering the interchange of ideas and the growth of fellowship among journalists from different media, and by assisting and co-ordinating the work of specialized groups working in the interests of weekly newspapermen, radio and TV news directors, business paper and industrial editors and others.

By putting the special skills of senior professionals at the disposal of the membership through seminars and workshops, and creating a platform for newsmakers to speak to journalists on an informal basis;

By researching the state of journalism education and recruitment and making recommendations for improvement; and by bringing working journalists into contact with journalism students and educators.

The Society proposes to strengthen the position of journalism in society:

By fostering freedom of information;

By the legal and moral support of journalists adjudged to be victims of illiberal or restrictive law or practise;

By the submission of professional opinion to governmental and other inquiries into the media;

By concern for the maintenance of Canadian-owned and Canadian-operated organs of information and opinion;

By professional recognition of outstanding achievement in all media.

The main concern of the Society in this appearance is the professionalism of those involved in journalism.

The survival of an accurately informative press in Canada surely is the primary concern of this committee.

No one suggests that the Senators have arrogated this function to themselves. But perhaps it was not unrealistic to have hoped that the proceedings would point the way to this goal by clarifying issues and identifying problems; by compelling the industry through exposure to examine itself and its resources to seek out the leaks in its roof and the cracks in its walls.

If this is a valid supposition then the almost complete lack of testimony and senatorial inquisitiveness directed to the professional standards of news reporters can only be described as dismaying.

A newspaper cannot be informative and imaginative unless its reporters, on balance, are informative and imaginative; because reporters—the newspaper's own and those employed by the agencies which supplement its coverage—supply virtually all the material available for publication.

Good editors thus cannot create an intelligently informative newspaper with raw material provided by poorly-qualified reporters.

Nor can a newspaper staff its desks with good editors unless it has a pool of good reporters to draw from. There is no such thing as a good editor who was a bad reporter for the simple reason that both tasks demand roughly similar talents, although different. Applied, good judgment, perception, a sharp eye for relevance, the ability to sense the presence or proximity of "news" and the reflexive instinct to know what to do with it.

For these reasons, this Society regards high professional reporting standards, vigorously pursued, as indispensable to the presence of an attractive, intelligent and aggressive press in Canada.

What troubles us is that so few newspapers are actively committed to this concept.

The Toronto newspapers and those in a handful of metropolitan centres elsewhere in Canada operate summer training programmes for university students whose desire to enter journalism is accompanied by the glimmer of talent.

But few, if any, newspapers in Canada have really explored the possibilities of upgrading news reporting standards by such means as leaves of absence for university refresher courses, special language classes, workshops, seminars or staff exchange projects.

The Universities of Carleton (Ottawa), Western Ontario (London) and Laval (Quebec) have journalism departments. It their relationship with the communications media apart from the cities in which they are located is remote to say the least. They operate no communications research centres and because they function entirely at the university level they have little if anything to contribute to the professionalism of a reporter who has been working for 5, 10 or 15 years.

It is, therefore, not difficult to see why excellence in news reporting has been, historically, a "bootstrap" exercise by the individual newsman who, having defined his own goals or having observed his shortcomings, sets out to achieve or to remedy largely on the strength of his own unaided resources of intellect, ambition and craftsmanship.

The lone pursuit of professional goals, university teaching centres that follow rather than lead, employers who remain aloof from or indifferent to the standards of practice—one of these fragmented states can be permitted to continue indefinitely if the communications media of this country are to meet the challenges inherent in an increasingly complex and demanding society.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Drea. Do you wish to add anything to that formal statement or do any of your colleagues wish to add anything, or should we proceed to the questions?

Mr. Drea: I think the questions. I think that's really what is relevant.

The Chairman: I think Senator Prowse is going to begin the questioning this morning.

Senator Prowse: I will go to the first one on page 5:

"If this is a valid supposition then the almost complete lack of testimony and senatorial inquisitiveness directed to the professional standards of news reporters can only be described as dismaying."

I have had during the course of this hearing two people who came to me and said why don't we dig into something, and I have said to them "All right, give me the facts." The answer is "Well, I am not going to stand up and get crucified and lose my job and not get another job."

Now have you got anything to tell us that we ought to be digging into that we haven't dug into? Without facts, how do we get without making fools of ourselves?

Mr. Drea: Well, Senator, when we put this paragraph in we were not talking about digging into certain things that are underneath the surface or apparently underneath the surface. I am like you, I frankly don't think they are there. If they were, they would come forward with facts.

One of the things that is disturbing to people whose careers are in this business—and mine has been for almost 20 years and Mr. Corelli has been longer and Mr. Carruthers is just starting out—one of the things that is dismaying about this Committee, and granted you have no control over it, has been the pushing forward of some very time-honoured myths. What we are concerned about is when this Committee is over and the report is written and it is forgotten, as it will be in a year because it is not hot news any more, the legacy of this Committee is going to be the perpetuation of certain myths: such as that newspaper copy is tampered with according to certain interests. If this is true—and I suggest to you it is not, because we went in the beginning to look for people and promised them a great deal of anonymity and we couldn't find anyone.

What we are concerned about is a year from now, that the legacy of such an important Committee as this is going to be all that these myths which I don't think are true are going to be perpetuated in the public mind.

The Chairman: Let us take that myth as an example. Why do you think it is going to be perpetuated by this Committee?

Mr. Drea: Oh, I don't think it will be perpetuated by this Committee but it was brought forward here and this is the thing somebody is going to remember.

The Chairman: If I may say, it is brought forward here quite frequently but as frequently as it is brought forward it has been denied, so surely we might have the reverse effect to the one which you fear?

Mr. Drea: No, I really don't think so. I think the myth has been with us so long that any credence put into it here, such as somebody just saying it, automatically pursues it. I think the other thing we are concerned about...

The Chairman: Before you go on to that, and I know that Senator Prowse will forgive me—and still on this question of tampering, I must say that I have shared the experience that Senator Prowse speaks of. I have had reporters in the press gallery and I have had reporters from Toronto during the course of these hearings who have come to me. It has certainly happened more than once. They say "You are not digging into the facts. The publishers are covering up... and so on. "There is this sort of tampering."

I think it is important to put it on the record that in every single instance we challenged the person to give us the specific information and we would put it to the publishers. If I may give an example, the 4th Estate in Halifax had an article which said the Chronicle-Herald "censors the news". Now we put that specific question to Mr. Dennis last Friday and he denied it. Without proof we cannot go any further than we have. We must, of course, as we do, accept Mr. Dennis's word at face value.

That is the repeated experience we have had and while we will turn specifically to the point here I think I would also caution you before making judgment on the Committee, either relating to the ones we have discussed or to the ones you are going to discuss, I am sure that all you have been able to read are the reports that have appeared in the press. I am not quarrelling with their accuracy. I am not quarrelling with their thoroughness, but in a study which has been exhaustive—there are days we have been here nine and ten hours—it is physically impossible, nor would we expect the newspapers to report all the impressions and facts.

I would urge you before making too many judgments to make a point of reading the transcripts.

I am sorry, Senator Prowse...

Mr. Martin Goodman, Vice-President, The Canadian Society of Professional Journalists:

Why would you expect Dennis to say "Yes, I tamper with the news"? If I were a Committee going out to try and do this I would function as a reporter. You have a research staff headed by a very competent gentleman and you could match the news as it appears. I am not taking this as an example but if you want to make the point it seems to me the way you make the point is to go out and look at the news and say "All right, why is this news? What happened in this instance? This is what appeared in the newspaper, how did you come to these judgments? How did the reporter determine it? How did the editor who handled it determine it?"

Then you begin to put to a man the question which he can answer and explain according to that paper's values of what news is. I am really dubious that by asking a publisher

"Do you tamper with the news?" that you are going to get a "Yes" answer.

Senator Prowse: When you ask that question you know what the answer is going to be. That may or may not worry him. The answer may or may not worry his conscience. You know what the answer is going to be. I don't know whether you have read Louis Nizer's book My Day in Court. He talked in there about the rule of probability. Do you remember that? The rule of probability simply stated is this: Given a certain set of facts you can assume that in the ordinary course of human conduct there will be other additional facts you ought to assume or you can assume. Were there any? For B to result from A there must have been some things in between.

Now when these questions are asked over the whole thing I would think that when the report comes to be written, we are going to have to consider the rule of probabilities as well as the evidence; but the reason I asked the question was not to defend the Senate but to put a burden on the people and to put out a public invitation at this time to anybody who has specific information. It is all very well to say "Go and get it. Put your research staff on it."

Now we have spent a hell of a lot of money on research right now getting some basic things and if we were to send out our blood hounds, which is undoubtedly what they would be called, sniffing into every newspaper morgue in Canada and then going back and checking on stories to see whether they were correct, can't you guess right now what kind of editorials would be screamed from every newspaper in the country about what we were trying to do to freedom of the press?

Mr. Drea: I think you may have misinterpreted me. You and I are not going along the same line. When we started out you said that you had heard lots of talk and when you said "Okay fine, here is your opportunity; let's have the facts," you couldn't produce any...

Senator Prowse: Nobody has produced any yet.

Mr. Drea: Nobody has produced any to you yet.

The Chairman: In fairness, nobody is willing to produce any.

Mr. Drea: Well, I want to go a little bit further because we have done in the Toronto area what you have suggested. We went out nany, many weeks ago and we put the word around, particularly in Toronto or any place else, if they ever knew of anybody we would protect them—and there are ways people can be protected—and no takers. I myself have racked down three or four reports where people say they are outside of the business, couldn't get along in the business, their social conscience was impeded and so on and so forth. I have gone and talked to them and it is not true. They couldn't document it.

Now I am not suggesting that these people don't feel in their own minds they have been impeded, but when it comes down to documenting it or showing what a reasonable person would think was tampering with the news... Frankly I don't think in the metropolitan area, and certainly in my own experience I have never been tampered with; have never been dictated to. I have done the most sensitive things, covered the most sensitive areas on a metropolitan newspaper that were are to cover. I was the labour columnist for almost nine years and I was never dictated to; I was never told anything. As a matter of fact I was encouraged to go out and do things. I think that this is true in Toronto because certainly the people who are on the other papers competing against me, they were doing precisely the same thing.

Now I am in an area where I handle the public, where basically I am taking complaints from the public. Now according to the myth, I should be shackled and everything else because all these things involve advertising. I am not shackled; I am not bothered; I am not anything. Nobody ever talks to me about whether somebody is an advertiser or not. The only way I know is if I happen to read the paper and see the ad.

The point that concerns me, and I am sure concerns the people here, one of the difficulties in getting professionalism in the daily press in Canada is that unfortunately we suffer from a legacy that has come up from the United States and that is "You can't believe anything you read in the newspaper"—this is the legacy of William Randolph Hearst.

Senator Prowse: Or Huey Long or William Verhart in Alberta.

Mr. Drea: Well, I understand his place has been the rock-and-roll. I think these are things that the Canadian public, because of the particular communications set-up we have where almost anything that happens in the States is automatically assumed to be happening in Canada six months later or so, we have this legacy and it is very difficult to talk to people and tell them the good things that newspapers are doing when they are doing it. The trouble is that everybody expects a newspaper to be very good. Nobody praises a newspaper. They condemn them for the editorials and they condemn them for the make-up or what have you but they never say what it has done.

For instance, no one suggests that the monument to John Bassett in Toronto is the fact that all the people on construction projects are now wearing hard hats. This is the monument. Before he took up the cause for industrial safety in the province they didn't wear hard hats and they died at the rate of 15 or 20 a year. Now they wear hard hats and nobody dies. Nobody suggests, you know, this is the monument.

Nobody suggests that the Telegram got the minimum wage scale in Ontario. Nobody says that is the memorial. Now everybody criticizes the Telegram or somebody because they don't like the particular scale of the wage.

The Star spent millions of dollars over the years, not only in terms of newsprint but in terms of cost, paving the way for Medicare and hospital insurance in this country. I think it would have come anyway but certainly The Star invested heavily in bringing social progress to this country. Now when you get your OHSIP card or whatever you have in the provinces, your hospital card, nobody has on top of it "Thanks to The Daily Star." Nobody says anything about these things.

The difficulties are when you go to the public and try to explain these things to them. The newspapers can't or they say you are blowing your own horn or the reporter is blowing his own horn. What we are concerned very much about is that if you really look at the cumulative press reports—and I have a scrap book and I have read them through again last night—taking into account not specialized interests you have, or the Committee has, or we have, but the average reader on the street, if he turns back in the paper the whole thing seems to centre around two objects: end the succession duties so we can have independent newspapers. This comes up time and time again. Secondly "We do a good job but Canada is kind of a poor country and there really is not enough money around to do the wonderful job we would like to do for you."

I really think, without being cynical, this is what is being left in the public mind and this is one of the reasons we are here today. We think we have got suggestions which are practical and which will, we would think, improve the quality of the press in Canada.

We think that the time has come to put on the record certain things about the press in Canada.

I think we have done more this morning in about 20 minutes about setting forth things in a condensed form than the Committee has done...

Mr. Jeff Carruthers, Member of the Canadian Society of Professional Journalists Executive Board: Could I add something?

The Chairman: Mr. Carruthers, yes.

Mr. Carruthers: One thing that has been bothering me, you are talking about the public image and what the press has done and what it doesn't do. I am a science writer meeting with so-called public officials and scientists and one of the things that is coming up more and more commonly has been the so-called criticisms of the press, the press's role in covering things such as pollution and DDT, et cetera. At a conference in which four members of the panel were leading experts in Canada there was criticism of the press for supposedly sensationalizing it, playing it up and using stuff just to sell newspapers.

This hasn't come out in this Committee yet but this is the type of thing people think of the press. When you question them after and you ask them "Why haven't you people spoken up..." They complain about Pollution Probe in Toronto and all the fuss they have caused and you ask some scientists and they say "Well, they are so low we would not want to respond to them."

This concerns me. I think that perhaps Frank may have given a wrong impression. I think there is a lot to be done in the press. I think one of the problems that you are running into is people coming to you complaining. To me they may be the problem of the generation gap. I know it is a hackneyed phrase...

Senator Prowse: That is not the problem we are talking to you about, Mr. Carruthers.

Mr. Carruthers: What happens here is sometimes there is a difference in values. What Frank may consider to be totally free rein a young reporter may not. The young reporter may want to do things Frank doesn't want to do. I don't know. This is what is happening—a lot of students are coming into journalism with a different idea of what they want to do and if they are not allowed to do it they are going to feel they are stymied.

Senator Prowse: This is, you think, part of the basics?

Mr. Carruthers: I don't know.

The Chairman: Mr. Corelli?

Mr. Rae Corelli, Member of The Canadian Society of Professional Journalists: Mr. Chairman and Senator Prowse, I have a slight feeling that we are not answering the question. In the beginning you suggested to us in our criticism of the Senate in this area we had perhaps overlooked the fact that you had been given too few facts to go on.

Senator Prowse: I was trying to put somebody else on the spot.

Mr. Corelli: I do suggest to you in the area of professional standards for reporters there are probably few facts to go on. In any event what we are dealing with here are concepts which are vague, to say the least, not yet defined or implemented on a nationally recognizable scale. There are no specific province-to-province paper standards which are analogous to, say, medicine or law. The business standards tend to vary from one paper to the next depending on that paper's concept of what it is going to do.

What we think—and I like to think I am speaking for my colleagues here—what we would like to see you perhaps inquire into, this is again not too vague, is into this phrase we used: "The professional standards of newspaper reporters." We would like to evoke your curiosity as to what the standards might be in the Telegram or the Star as they are reflected in the climate within which we work.

Perhaps to stretch it to the point of the ridiculous and to answer our own question, these standards are probably almost certainly to be the highest in Canada on the large papers for the simple reason that in Toronto there is not only size but also competitive relationships one to another. I think it declines markedly as you go down the scale both in circulation and in the competitive picture.

There is a very strong desire, I think, on the part of virtually everybody in this business to achieve as a group some kind of unanimity of view toward what we ought to ce, toward what we ought to be doing, toward a kind of unifying concept of responsibility. I think that responsibility and responsiveness to responsibility is what this is all about. We are sort of fragmented now, sort of reaching for this. Perhaps you can help us find it.

Senator Prowse: I think in fairness I should say this as part of this discussion: I don't think that any publisher or representative of a publisher has appeared before this Committee without being asked what they do about recruitment, what they expect of their reporters; and the fairly good measure of job standard, what pay rate and why their pay rates are not better.

Senator McElman: And whether they interfere.

Senator Prowse: Whether they interfere. Now the question of whether you interfere always worries me. As a lawyer I know you don't ask a question if you are not going to get the answer you want. You want to be in a position to prove that the guy is lying to you. Unless you are in that position you don't ask the question when the facts may give you the answer without it being asked.

Let me say this to you, let us pursue this line: I think you people probably more than any other group that has appeared before us—at least as well as one or two others in the same position as yourselves—are in a position to tell us what those standards should be. Have you any suggestions to make on what those standards should be? Are you still in an area of trying to find out?

Mr. Corelli: I think we do but I am wondering if they go beyond concepts and ideals. I wonder if they really can be nailed down.

Senator Prowse: If you can't nail them how can we?

Mr. Corelli: I appreciate that. That is why I am also apologetic at not being as helpful as might be. I think standards have to be those perhaps ideally of any profession, if in fact this is going to be a profession. Then it seems to me logical that journalism at the reporter level in the beginning should be a process which begins with education at the university level. It should progress through the granting of a degree in this specialty; it should make available in almost as widespread fashion as medicine or law the graduate courses leading to a master's degree; it should have a practicing code of ethics for its members; it should have a set of standards of practice which are minimal in nature—below these things we won't tolerate aberrations.

It should ideally be self-regulatory. It should perhaps be backed up by statutory authority to be self-regulatory.

How we get from where we are to that point and whether it is even desirable to go to that point—perhaps some of the others have some other ideas to offer.

Senator Prowse: How long did it take to get hard hats? You have to start somewhere.

Mr. Carruthers: I don't think it is as simple as that. One of the things that I keep on pushing is this idea of professionalism. As you say it is tremendously fragmented and differs from city to city. Now what we have to aim at is a common level of professionalism across the country. One of the ways I think you can do this is by starting with the people who are going into the profession, the community colleges and universities we have in this country, and developing in them this professional feeling, you know, and letting them bring it up. It is, I suppose, like bilingualism—it is going to take a period of years before the new breed of total professionals. There are professionals in journalism now but this is the way I think it could be made to grow. It is going to be up to people to define these things and give them to people responsible for education. They will, of course, have their own ideas and slight variations. They have to be instilled in the people.

Mr. Drea: I think a good analogy might be that the journalist in this country is roughly where the doctor, dentist and lawyer were about 1885.

Senator Prowse: At least that far.

Mr. Drea: Yes. There were no standards. Some people practiced and some were not. If you couldn't make it in one city you went west or north. The doctors had to organize themselves. The dentists had to organize themselves. The lawyers had to organize themselves.

Senator Prowse: Boy, we have a good union!

Mr. Drea: Yes, you do; it is quite true. You had to do it yourself. It was in the common interest and this was the one unifying force. It was not to make more money in any of these professions. It was in the common good. Medicine wanted to get rid of the quacks; law wanted to get rid of the Shylocks.

The Chairman: What do you want to get rid of now?

Mr. Drea: Incompetence.

The Chairman: I have one point and I think that this is a very important point. I have been intending to ask this all morning. Your references to date understandably have been repeatedly of and from the Toronto area. We would be interested in your assessment of professionalism, or if you will of incompetence, where it exists in other areas of the country.

Are you or your group competent to make that kind of judgment for us? If we have to discuss the standards we will but as well as discussing the standards, where are the problems which concern you greatest? Obviously from what you have said they are of least concern in Toronto, I gather? Where are they greatest?

Mr. Drea: Let us do it on the positive side rather than the negative side.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Drea: I think the problems for this profession are, I think, problems also for the community. We are concerned about the level of professionalism in the medium size Canadian community, not the metropolitan areas, not the big cities, but cities of fifty to one hundred thousand where there is one newspaper, where it is a monopoly. It may not be a monopoly under the Combine Act but it is a monopoly in communications. We are concerned about there. Who are the people who are reporting the local news? Are these people competent to bring up local issues? Because I think there are as many local issues in the medium community as in a big community. They may be smaller in scale but I think the thing is still there.

We have common problems all across the country regardless of how big the population is.

What dismays me is—and I travel the province of Ontario from north, south, east and west—I am probably in communities that other people are not in this business because I do some things for the Government of Ontario—what concerns me is the total lack of the local issues. These are in communities where the newspaper is the sole method of information.

It is great to say you get the CBC National News but what does the CBC National News have to say about Peterborough unless there is something sensational? They are dependent on the local newspaper. You go to the local newspaper and start looking at the people who are there and some of them have been there a long time and they are good. They might not be very good in Toronto but they are good in their own place. What concern you is there are no standards. Somebody comes in and that is all.

Senator Prowse: In other words, they take a boy out of high school to replace a senior reporter and by the time the public find out that they are being short-changed he probably has enough knowledge...

Mr. Corelli: I don't think the public find out. You asked about some other areas in Canada. Obviously this puts us in a kind of embarrassing position...

The Chairman: I don't want to embarrass you.

Mr. Corelli: No; but in response to your earlier observations you keep getting people running around hiding behind the furniture. I worked for some papers in this country, or paper in the under 20,000 circulation, daily—one of a group of dailies—whose common owner has been frequently in the news arising from proceedings of this Committee. Now this newspaper was staffed by some very competent journalists who were obviously in the minority since the publishing of the paper was not prepared to pay money to good reporters. I am not sure he knew or if he fell over him in the hall.

Senator Prowse: With the lights on.

Mr. Corelli: With the lights on. It was a terrible newspaper. It was consistently terrible, at least it had that going for it. There were some excellent people working for it and this may seem like an anomaly but they were there and did jobs as best they could. The trouble is that this is a one-paper town. I am speaking of. Actually a two-paper town because the afternoon and morning editions were published by the same people. The same people wrote both papers, the presses turned out both papers, the same trucks delivered the papers. The terrible thing about this from that level down—if you can believe anybody going any further down...

Senator Prowse: Oh, there is lower.

Mr. Corelli: The terrible thing is there's no yardstick for these people to use. In other words, when I was on that paper—and this was back a great many years—you got the feeling this was the best paper around because you were working for it. There was no reference point. You read the other papers once in a while and you got a Toronto Star when the mail came through but normally you read other papers of a similar kind and they were also all bad, so relatively you looked very good.

This is a problem with journalism—nothing sifts down to that level that makes an impression. In other words, these people don't look around and say "This is a hell of a way to publish a news story. Look what the Toronto Star or the Globe and Mail or the Montreal Star did with it." They have no critical judgment; they have no social conscience. There is no basis for comparison. They get no better because they don't know that they are that bad. They tend to be rather smug and self-satisfied and go on grinding out this rubbish day in and day out. The only thing that disturbs the status quo is the balance sheet at the end of the year and then the repercussion is purely financial rather than editorial.

I am speaking here from a limited experience but this has been my experience at that level of newspapers in Canada.

Senator Prowse: Let me ask two questions. I want to deal with the question you raised first about a couple of good myths. I speak with some feeling as I earned my living as a working newspaperman for eight years. My ambition was that I might get to work on a Toronto newspaper but some things intervened. Maybe I would have never made it anyway!

The two myths are these: one, newspaper reporters never bother to get the facts. Two, they can take the minimum of information and blow it up into a big story.

Now will you answer the first one: they don't get the facts; why people don't read everything they think they ought to read when they are interviewed by a newspaperman and everything that they said was not there.

Secondly, will you answer the one about whether newspapers do take just a teensy weensy bit and then blow it right up. Let's deal with these two myths, which I consider them to be. Let's hear what you have to say. You fellows know what gets in the paper.

Mr. Drea: We believe that we get accused of doing it.

Mr. Corelli: My first reaction is kind of a wistful one because on the newspaper I work for the absence of facts tends to be a matter for repercussion from the people I work for rather than the people who read the newspaper.

Senator Prowse: You are answering the second one first.

Mr. Corelli: Maybe, yes. I don't know what all the facts are in any given situation. I don't suppose that anyone does. If I am assigned to report a story I get the facts to the extent that I have in my judgment a fully rounded, balanced story, at least to the best of my ability. When do you reach that point? I don't know. Experience tells you you don't need to say any more about this point.

What happens is quite often this sort of situation arises in covering a meeting where two or three people are taking part in a panel. This happened the day before yesterday to one of my colleagues. He was covering a meeting at which three people spoke at various times and he was apparently of the opinion that what one man said was not very important and he concentrated on the other two. In the process of employing his news judgment he says, "From my experience in this specialty of reporting, these things are more newsworthy," and he was called up by three different people 20 minutes after the first edition was on the street. The three people were the man he had not quoted at all, that man's wife and that man's brother-in-law. All of whom said "Why didn't you put anything in there about Harry..." or whatever his name is. He had included the man's name and I think he included enough of what Harry had said to justify his presence at the meeting. Now Harry and his wife and his brother-in-law would all have joined the club and said "That is so typical of newspapers. They never get all the facts."

This is one of our problems and I think a problem that may be involved with communications between the profession we are attempting to define here and the public; not necessarily the newspaper but the profession. Maybe this is another reason to strive for a professional organization.

Senator Prowse: What I was getting at is this: every news story of necessity requires the selection of what the person who is writing the story, and then his editor, decided are essential facts to the story. Is this not true?

Mr. Corelli: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Which means that a whole lot of the stuff you get and a lot of the interviews you get, you decide have no relevance to the story.

Mr. Corelli: Yes.

Mr. Carruthers: This is a personal thing based on my limited experience. If I am writing a story and I can devote enough time to it, almost inevitably I have five pounds of facts and I use really like one pound.

Senator Prowse: Because of space limitation?

Mr. Carruthers: Not only because of space limitation. A lot of stuff is redundant and a lot of stuff is not relevant to the story. It was relevant to the whole picture you went into first but when you came back you fixed yourself on part of it and some of it then is no longer relevant. So I think if one is a good reporter, when he writes a story he has all the facts but he can only use a few. He has all the facts at his disposal and with his skill he takes all the facts and tries to represent them in the best fashion he can.

I think the case you brought out is just being nit-picky for the one fellow that didn't get quoted. The other point of it is I think important. When you listen to people discuss stories you have written, if you give the same story to five people and let five different people read it you will find that five people found five different things wrong about it.

Senator Prowse: What would happen if you let five people get a story and let five people write it?

Mr. Drea: You have two myths there. The first one was, if I recall...

Senator Prowse: The first one is...

Mr. Drea: They don't get the facts straight.

Senator Prowse: That is the myth.

Mr. Drea: I really think it is entirely a myth. I think probably in about 95 percent. I am perfectly prepared to concede that we live now in a very complex time and while anybody could do an interview with anybody 20 years ago and be able to function, ask a few questions and say "Will you please explain it" and get in and out in ten minutes and write a story intelligibly that meant something, I don't think this is possible any more. It certainly is not in politics any more; certainly is not in science.

I know if I was told to write a story about computers—I don't know a thing about computers and I don't like them and a lot of other things—it would probably take me a month before I could understand what the man was talking about even when he tried to bring it down from his level.

I think there is some truth in that and when I say "some truth" I want to qualify that because the usual thing is, and this is particularly prevalent in Government: "Don't tell them anything. They screw it up. Stay away from them."

Now then the point there—I don't think it is a conscious decision to hide information or conceal information that should go to the public. What really is being said there is "This is very complex and unless we are prepared to spend five or six days explaining it in great detail so it is understandable and an understandable story can come up, then it is best not to tell it. Since we are not prepared to spend that time in providing some kind of background—okay."

Mr. Carruthers: I can give you an example. The Agriculture Department today in this city has this attitude on DDT. They are not hiding the facts but they don't want to give you the facts because they figure they are too complicated, and it is as simple as that. I have been refused.

Senator Prowse: Here in Ottawa?

Mr. Carruthers: Yes. There are publications. This is not available to the press.

Mr. Drea: This leads to "They take a few facts, a glimmer of something and blow it up."

Senator Prowse: A good imagination and a facile pen?

Mr. Drea: Yes. There is always going to be speculation about significant people. I think this is something that comes naturally. Let me put it this way: I think there is a good deal of speculation in Ontario at the moment that the Premier is going to vacate his office. Now then when he takes his press secretary, who has been with him since the beginning, and the press secretary takes another job this leads to speculation that it is just about said and done that he is going to go. I think that is a very valid speculation.

Senator Prowse: I got fooled in Alberta on the same thing once.

Mr. Drea: I think this is a judgment. This is taking a small fact and blowing it up.

The Chairman: Have these speculative stories appeared?

Mr. Drea: Yes. What I want to come to is when people say they took a little thing and blew it up out of proportion. Invariably when that happens a particular few facts are not the best in favour of the individual. When they take a few facts and blow it up that are favourable to you, they are geniuses but when it is the other way around we don't like it.

Again I think it comes to the point it is a judgment and there is no sense kidding anybody, there is no such thing as an objective news story. Anybody who tells you that is goofy. The only way you could get an objective news story is to almost have somebody without a mentality doing it through a computer and have the computer programmed to take out all the bias and so forth. It is a judgment.

The Chairman: Do speculative stories indicate in the news story that it is a speculative story? Does the reporter say "Premier Roberts may be going to resign" or does he sometimes say "Premier Roberts is going to resign?" Which should he say?

Mr. Drea: Well if he knows he is going to resign, he better say he is. If he doesn't know or he is speculating he better say "may".

Senator Prowse: Informed sources...

Mr. Drea: Yes. I don't like "informed sources".

The Chairman: That was my next question. have been getting a good deal of mail in the course of this inquiry and several people from all over the country have written to me on the same point: the question of a story which says "Sources close to so-and-so" or "Un-named sources, usually reliable sources". Is that a valid technique?

Mr. Drea: Professionally I would not use it. I think this "informed sources" business leads to management of the news. We are not kidding anybody. If we are talking about a political person and we say "informed sources" that means that one of his associates has spread the news. It is a managed story.

If Mr. Trudeau is supposed to do something and is going to do something and wants to fly a kite, then it becomes "informed sources" and it is flying a kite. I personally would not. Either he is going to or not going to and it is based on my judgment.

In the United States there are informed sources. There are degrees of informed sources. The State Department is going to do this but you cannot say "The State Department" so you have to use this code to get around it. They don't want it to appear in black and white they are going to do it even if they are. This is starting to come to this country.

The Chairman: Before you leave that, have any of the four of you in your entire experience ever seen an "informed sources" story or "usually reliable source" story made up out of whole cloth? A fake?

Mr. Drea: No.

Mr. Goodman: Yes, in Washington.

Mr. Corelli: You would have to qualify the answer by saying none that we recognize. There might have been lots.

Mr. Drea: If somebody floated a hoax that good it would be all over Canada. Of course we have been talking about one level. You have forgotten there is a checkout. Newspapers are the first industry to put in a quality control. Long before industry did, newspapers put in a quality control because they didn't take the pearls of wisdom from the reporter and put them in type. They put up a copy desk to make sure he could spell and then put in real quality control. If you are going to put through some kind of a story that is not true, somebody is going to catch you. It is easier to fix a football game than it is to fix a story on a newspaper. All you need to do on a football game is two or three but on a newspaper you would have to pick nine people and hope that one of the nine didn't get sick that day and some guy came in who didn't know the thing was on and it would get in the paper.

I think what people tend to do is they look at a speculative story by a reporter which he has written in his best judgment—he really thinks it is going to happen and he writes it. Then it doesn't come true for any one of a dozen reasons. Maybe he was wrong in the first place. Then of course they lump it altogether in the cherished old bit, "You can't believe anything you read in the newspapers."

Senator Prowse: Would it be helpful for the newspapers to stop being so modest? Would it be helpful if they wrote a few stories on the editorial page or the opp-ed page or a straight feature story explaining these problems you have to the public? I don't remember ever reading in a newspaper the story explaining the troubles you have getting the news as fairly as you can in front of the public.

Mr. Drea: I think it might have some value, Senator, but I don't think the public would appreciate it. The public doesn't care how you get the story, they don't care if you get beaten up or killed. They couldn't care less about it. All they want is their dime's worth.

Senator Prowse: In other words you are going to have to live with this.

Mr. Carruthers: It is on an individual basis. I run into a scientist who says "I don't want to talk to you. Twenty-five years ago a reporter from The Journal made a mistake." This happens all the time. The only way you can do it—and this is one of the reasons the Society is being formed—if you get people who are concerned about doing things properly, perhaps getting rid of mistakes that do occur—the reporter deals with one person and does a good job and then the public will individually slowly but surely realize there are problems but at the same time things can be done properly.

Mr. Drea: I don't believe some of the things that are bandied about. One survey says that 45% of the people don't believe what they read in the newspaper...

The Chairman: What survey?

Mr. Drea: The Gallup Poll. I don't believe in this. It means that three-quarters of the nation are absolute utter fools because they go on spending their money on something they don't believe in. It defies credibility. Would you pay a dime day after day for something that was not true?

The Chairman: Well, I still don't know who won the hockey game, the Leafs versus Pittsburgh. I will pay a dime to find out.

Mr. Goodman: It seems to me that what we are talking about really boils down to gut criticism, the gut of what it should be doing, what the Society is about, trying to define what the news should be and what standards should be applied or what competence should be required to gather news and distribute it. By "distribute it" I mean in terms of getting it out to the people.

Surely the news that is relevant in terms of judging a morning newspaper in Ottawa is how it is covering national affairs, not how it covers the Toronto Maple Leafs last night and the technological problems involved.

All the questions that Senator Prowse has been raising really devolve to the standards you want to apply to news. You start from there and the fundamental question really is: what is freedom of the press? The publishers will try and have tried to answer the question to some degree. I would submit that I consider myself in this context as a reporter and the reporters have at least as much at stake in that definition as any publisher does.

What is our right in the first instance to gather news and to publish it? What is news? Surely this is the key question that you should be raising. Why do you print that and not that? What is the judgment brought to bear? Who suggested this story should be in the paper and this should not? When you can define the two fields you can say what kind of people are eligible and what kind of competence do they have to be able to carry out these duties.

At that stage you then have a structure of standards and competence which, since we are fairly good communicators most of the time, we think we can set out in a body of writing and establish that.

Now if the Committee, for example, come out with a report and tries to define what freedom of the press is, what it really amounts to: is there any special privilege to the publisher? Any special privilege to the reporter? Really an extension of the public's right to know? These are things that publishers in the United States do say, they have special privileges, special exemptions. There is the anti-trust laws and we have publishers here who say they should have exemptions from estate taxes.

Now if it is right to have a Canadian press and you feel you have to have an estate tax for it, surely this is the right of the public you are looking at. It boils down to the fundamental questions about freedom of the press, what it is; news values; what news is and the competence and standards of the people who should be in the profession.

With this body of information you can apply it against your daily of 20,000, against any one of the Toronto papers, against a medium sized paper, and a member of the public looking at these standards, and looking at the newspaper, would then have some way to judge whether the newspaper was carrying out its responsibility as a group of informed people defined it. This seems to me the fundamental premise which should be examined.

When you talk about estate taxes without any relevance to what freedom of the press is and what its responsibilities are and when you talk about the price of newsprint without relevance to whether the press has any special privilege or status in Canada, I think you avoid the main issues that this particular Committee should be looking into.

Senator Prowse: I think it should be pointed out at this point that most or at least a number of the people who have appeared before this Committee have dealt with the question of exemption from estate taxes in the larger area.

Mr. Goodman: What have they said about the larger area?

Senator Prowse: The larger area should apply to all estates. Some specifically said "We don't think we are entitled to this alone but we think that it is a problem we have in Canada and if you want to keep the ownership in the hands of Canadians or want to keep individual family ownerships then this should be a general thing and we should get the benefit of it."

Mr. Goodman: You have a Commons and Senate Committee looking at taxation with massive documents and a whole battery of experts. Is taxation what you are about?

Senator Prowse: Just a moment. Are you suggesting that he should not point out if he believed it to be true and if he feels that one of the reasons for it is the impact of estate taxes, now is that not a valid thing for them to talk about and a valid thing for us to listen to?

Mr. Goodman: All I am suggesting is you have to go forward. I think you have considered going backwards. You have to say "Why does the press exist? What is the purpose? What is the function?" If it is right there should be a number of independent voices or at least you need to preserve the press then you look at these things. What I am getting at in this context is there should be more discussion about what the freedom of the press means. It is a hackneyed old cliché. What does it mean?

The Chairman: May I say to Mr. Goodman, Chairman of this Committee I think I have attended every minute of every session and I must say I could provide you with reams of material in which publishers and others have attempted to define freedom of the press. I must say in fairness that practically everybody here has taken a run at it. The newspapers of the country haven't chosen to carry all the definitions, nor do I think they should have. I don't blame them but I must say I think we have had a pretty exhaustive discussion of what freedom of the press is.

Mr. Corelli: I wonder if I might interject something here, Mr. Chairman. I think he raised a good point. He apparently is of the opinion that things like succession duties and estate taxes, while perhaps relevant to the inquiry, surely are subsidiary to the central issue. I think they are strictly subordinate clauses in the whole structure.

Could I take this one step further? I am only speaking personally here but what I would like to see come out of this Committee as an individual working reporter is some kind of recommendation which would help us as a group of people to get busy on doing things that Mr. Goodman talked about: defining the right of the press, defining standards and practices, defining and approaching an opinion of freedom of the press and things like this as a group of people writing things that appear in the paper.

One idea that occurs to me, and I throw this out for consideration, is that newspapers of this country have already demonstrated for many years the value to each of them that accrues from co-operation in the gathering of the news. The Canadian Press demonstrates the fact that when papers get together and pay the shot they can get more for their money than if they attempt to do it individually. Would it be reasonable, I wonder, to consider the same kind of newspaper head tax, if you like, for the purposes of establishing a secretariat for the profession of journalism in this country which would be located in a central area and staffed with people devoted to research activities of a clearing house, to the creation and the application of standards to the people working in the industry? Let's call it anything you like, let's call it the Canadian Society of Professional Journalism Secretariat. Why not? Why shouldn't they get the money? And have this thing financed by the newspapers. Who stands to gain more from a higher professional standard than the people who employ the reporters? Surely if the survival of the Press in Canada is germane to this inquiry then the quality of the product is germane because if there is no quality it is not going to survive no matter what you do about estate taxes.

Senator Prowse: How about the Managing Editors' Conference?

Mr. Corelli: I have never attended one, Senator Prowse.

Mr. Goodman: I haven't been to one either.

Senator Prowse: Well, what about it?

Mr. Goodman: I don't think they are sufficiently concerned, nor are the American Managing Editors. They finally got around last year to trying to set together for the first time guidelines for managing editors.

Senator Prowse: There has been a mass of stuff produced by various people in the States.

Mr. Goodman: The Sigma Delta Chi have evolved to look at standards particularly in close relationship to freedom of the press and have been one of the most formidable forces in the United States on freedom of information. What I am suggesting here is it seems to me you start from a definition of what these responsibilities and purposes are. What we are trying to do is establish, in a written form that will have meaning, standards for people who are in the profession. I have also suggested it is as at least important to reporters, people who are working in the profession, to be able to define these things as it is for publishers or anyone else.

Mr. Carruthers: If I may interject, you are concerned about the mass media and the Canadian public. When they think of the press they deal with the individual reporter who comes to them and he writes something and it filters down or up and finally appears in the paper. As far as the public are concerned the journalists are the press because what they do is what they see or hear on television. This is the essential thing. They have to have confidence in us. Again this is my personal opinion.

Publishers, it is very nice for them to talk about what they consider to be the problems of newspapers and what they are trying to do, even if they are trying to do something and even if they are trying to prevent something from happening, but it is what the people down at the bottom are actually doing that is important.

The Chairman: I asked a moment ago about the Managing Editors Conference. Isn't the question of standards and ethics something which the Guild might be interested in?

Mr. Drea: Yes, I think they are. Mr. Rupert when he appeared before you had some statements to make on questions of privilege which certainly is a very important professional point. I will take a plunge at this because I belong to the Newspaper Guild, I have belonged to it for some years and served in office on it.

The Guild is no longer in a position, let's be frank about this, to really do anything about professional standards in Canada for two reasons. One, they are an industrial union and do not have the time nor the inclination to set up something along the lines of Reuther's Skilled Trade Department in the Auto Workers. They have a separate section recognizing the fact that they have different interests, and professional standards are one.

The Guild is too small and cannot do this or it won't. I prefer to think it can't. The second thing is the Guild in organizing in Canada has been a dismal failure. It exists for all practical purposes in Toronto and the west coast, in Vancouver and Victoria. It has no paper here in Ottawa and a couple of smaller papers and that is it.

Now we are talking about 135 papers so don't think you can rely on the Newspaper Guild to set up standards. That is why we started this. Believe me, after nine months of this is there were a structure that we could have gotten in and gotten control of and moving towards standards we would have. This is pretty difficult starting from scratch and trying to move forward.

The Chairman: Why in your opinion has the Guild been a dismal failure?

Mr. Drea: Organizing in Canada?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Drea: It has been a dismal failure because we might as well face the very unpleasant fact there are in this country about less than ten publishers, there are less than ten corporate entities. You take the three chains and you take the Montreal Star, two papers in Toronto are independent and there is the odd independent scattered about the provinces, and that is it.

The second thing is the concentration of ownership and having been two years in the union business that is a tough nut to crack. Now the second thing is the Guild is a very small union. I think the Guild has around thirty-odd thousand in both countries. Economically it is not viable, therefore they don't have the money such as the Steelworkers with a million people or the Auto Workers with a million people to go out and organize. It costs money to organize. There are exceptions but unless it is big enough to undertake the long term campaign there is just no sense making out cards and sending out cards saying "Why don't you be a good boy and join the union?" The guy says "Why should I?" I think it is as simple as that.

Why is there not a Newspaper Guild in Winnipeg? I think for the very simple reason the reporters in Winnipeg don't want a Newspaper Guild. If they wanted it there are legal procedures; they could go through the Manitoba Labour Board to get it.

I think when you work for a chain newspaper that you have very great qualms about doing something that the owners will not like. Now this may be right or wrong but I think you still have very grave qualms; plus when you work for a chain newspaper you have to take into account that you can withdraw your services and you don't hurt them very much. They have a whole big pool and they can bring them in.

Senator Prowse: And there have been examples of this.

Mr. Drea: Yes, certainly.

Senator Prowse: I was not asking, I was saying.

Mr. Drea: The Peterborough Examiner. Oshawa—the Guild could get a small newspaper not because it was the Newspaper Guild but they got a small newspaper because the United Auto Workers and the Steelworkers in Oshawa had a long legacy against The Oshawa Times and the Steelworkers and the Auto Workers and the Seafarers, of all people, put the muscle on the picket line and he police—it was a union town and the police were not going to escort anybody through and that is the way it went. That is the fluke. It didn't happen in Peterborough which is not too far away, about the same size city.

I think myself in all fairness if I was organizing for the Guild I would have some qualms about going to employees of a small newspaper and saying "How about signing the card because we are going to take you on to better and better things." I think I would have some qualms of conscience about that because I think I would be taking them one way and that would be into an abrupt shift of jobs.

Senator Prowse: Without opening up the whole area, which I don't think would be useful to you or us here, in other words your organization proposes to fill what you consider to be a necessary gap by setting up a professional organization for the people employed in the editorial news departments of newspapers and radio and TV. Is that correct?

Mr. Drea: Yes; plus another aspect to it, Senator. If it were the Guild you could not employ the talents of Mr. Goodman because Mr. Goodman is management and a lot of senior people in the profession who have a great deal to contribute are management. With a professional society you can bridge the gap. You are not confined within the structure.

Senator Prowse: John Bassett told us that in his opinion the calibre of reporters in Toronto and the wage scales they were receiving were higher today because of the Guild than it would be had there not been a Guild in Toronto and he felt he was able to put out a better newspaper. Would you agree that is probably true?

Mr. Drea: Yes.

The Chairman: Might I suggest, Senator Prowse, to give the reporter a break and give ourselves a chance to stand up, that we have a seventh inning stretch and adjourn for just two or three minutes, and then reconvene.

Senator Prowse: When we come back I have one new area.

...Upon resuming at 11.25 a.m.

The Chairman: If I might call this meeting back in order. Senator Prowse, have you a line of questions or just a question?

Senator Prowse: No, a new line.

The Chairman: I might just turn to the others.

Senator Prowse: Yes. That is why I told you beforehand.

The Chairman: Senator MacDonald?

Senator MacDonald: I was wondering about your society, what are the qualifications for membership? About how many members you have and is it a Toronto based society or do you take in persons outside?

Mr. Drea: I will answer it going at it one at a time. We took over the existing membership of the American professional society in Canada so that we do have members across the country but we decided if we were going to have a society which was meaningful at all we had to start out on a gradual basis because this is a rather large country.

We decided the first thing we would do would be to organize very extensively in Toronto and then carry that out throughout Ontario. Then when we were in a position, we would go into the Maritimes on one side and into the West on the other side. That is why at the moment it is somewhat top-heavy with people in Toronto.

Senator Beaubien: What about Quebec?

Mr. Drea: There are two organizations, the English-speaking organization which appeared before you. We are attempting to enter into a dialogue with them, as a matter of fact we already have, whereby perhaps they would come in with us or at least there would be some kind of link-up, because they have different problems as English-speaking journalists in the Province of Quebec at the moment and they feel they have to have a separate organization.

The French Society have their own organization and they are making certain proposals to the Government of Quebec. We honestly don't think we are capable of entering into a dialogue with them because they represent French journalists almost entirely. We do not represent journalists entirely across the nine provinces. When we get to that point or close to it I think we can talk to them on an equal basis.

To come back to Senator MacDonald, the second question you asked...

Senator MacDonald: How many?

Mr. Drea: We have right now about 80 since we have started to push this, and quite frankly because of this Committee. We have brought in excess of about 45. So this is a long slow process. It is always very difficult to set up an organization where you cannot promise immediate tangible results. We are talking about intangibles that may take years but we are moving along because we think it is our responsibility. We don't think it is the responsibility of the Government of Canada, we think it is our responsibility. If we can't do it then it becomes a matter of concern for the Government or the public. I think we at least deserve a chance to see if we can do it ourselves. I think it would be much better if it were established by journalists and became self-regulatory.

I think there is always the fear, particularly in something as sensitive as the press, that anything launched by the Government might, no matter how well the intentions, in the future come to be some kind of infringement. That is why we are doing it that way.

Senator MacDonald: Earlier you mentioned the fact about legal and medical societies being self-governing bodies. My impression was that is a pattern you hoped to follow in yours. In those cases most also had provincial organizations as well as national. You are concentrating now in Toronto or Ontario. Could you not at the same time start your organization in other provinces?

Mr. Drea: Yes, we could. We would like to show them before we went to other provinces we would like to show them what we have been able to do in our own. I agree with you that if we are successful and this does become a national organization, it would of necessity then have to become perhaps not provincial but certainly regional. I think the problem and outlook and almost everything in the Maritimes is quite different than Toronto and things in Toronto and the rest of Ontario are quite different than when you go to the West. I think there is a need for a national one and then to break it down there is a need for a provincial one and to break that down even further if not a big city there is certainly a regional one and the essence of the thing is being able to communicate within the community.

Mr. Corelli: I wonder if I might add something? I would like to go back to the reference I made to a permanent national office for this society. I think if we did in fact succeed in achieving the agreement, as one way of doing it, achieving agreement among newspapers that they would finance the operation of this central office for this society.

Senator MacDonald: Might I interject right there? Why not your own society rather than asking the newspapers or somebody else?

Mr. Corelli: Perhaps it is conceivable but the only thing that occurs to me is the amount of money involved to do a thing like this. We probably couldn't raise it among group like this. Maybe after we became professional...

Senator MacDonald: There must be thousands of people eligible to join your society?

Mr. Corelli: Actually very few. The daily newspapers have a combined editorial staff of fewer than 2,000 people. Now if I might finish that... If we could establish a central location, which was not necessarily an extravagant one but neither a shoe-string operation, from this central point we could perhaps begin through the dissemination of information and through the use of communication, which we are supposed to know something about, we could begin perhaps to raise the standards in other parts of Canada where they could stand to be raised a little.

Senator MacDonald: For example, from the Maritimes what I had in mind was that when Toronto says "You raise the standards," other parts often times say, "Leave the standards as they are."

Mr. Corelli: Well, I worked in the Maritimes and I can tell you that is not the case now, from my experience anyway.

Senator MacDonald: That is 20 years ago.

Mr. Corelli: I was down last year and things don't look any different.

Mr. Drea: Senator, there is one part of the question I didn't answer and I will read you the qualifications:

"Any person employed at least two years in the direction of editorial policy or editing or preparation of news and editorial content of a newspaper, magazine, press or syndicate service, professional or business publication, radio or television; or is a teacher of journalism or student of journalism at a recognized college or university; or any Canadian who is or has been a member of the Sigma Delta Chi is eligible to become a member."

Mr. Carruthers: Might I add, Mr. Chairman, one thing in addition. We are interested in the members of the electronic media and within the profession itself we are just as interested in our female companions; unlike the Press Club in Ottawa, and I think we have got a number of members who are women.

Senator MacDonald: As long as the person has been working for two years there are no other qualifications? You don't care about educational qualifications?

Mr. Drea: No. I don't believe in educational qualifications. If they were put in they might throw me out. I don't think you get any of your ability in the profession by the fact that you went to school for two months or twenty years. It is what you are able to do.

Now just to come back to something which was raised about the Maritimes, there is some resentment that the hot shots from Toronto come in and tell them how to do it. I think it is a very valid criticism. We certainly would not tell them what we expected them to do. We would expect them to take a look at their own surroundings and as professional people to elevate themselves. They would make the decisions as to what they consider to be fair professional standards, which I would certainly think would be in the broad sense the same as ours, and how they implemented them, that would certainly be their own decision because I agree with you; I don't think you can impose what is in Toronto or what is in Montreal or Vancouver upon the rest of the country. You have to be realistic. Whatever criticisms or shortcomings there are in the Maritimes I am quite sure if the Maritime people wanted to come here and take our places now, with not too much effort they could show some of the shortcomings in Toronto.

Mr. Corelli: I would like to clarify a point. I seem to have made an impression and being a Maritimer myself I am not anxious to say that the Maritimers are bringing up the rear. What I am saying is I think it follows necessarily that standards of professional practice in the larger papers, which by an accident of geography happen to be in Upper Canada, are going to be higher than those in smaller papers both in the Maritimes, Ontario, or anywhere else. I am not talking about a geographical schism but a kind of desire on the part of us, if you like, and I am sure everybody else too in this business, to raise the standards of the whole business wherever. In other words, I am not suggesting that Toronto is at the top and all the others are down there some place. I am pointing out what is an industry-wide need. The only reason I say from here we will do it there is because I would envisage a national office if established being somewhere up here.

The Chairman: You don't think the standards of reporting in Toronto are higher than those of Halifax?

Mr. Corelli: Oh, yes they are. They are also higher in Toronto than they are in Guelph.

Senator MacDonald: Okay. We will concede for a moment that the Toronto standards are higher though I will not guarantee it. Is it your criticism of the Maritime papers, for example, that it would equally apply to smaller towns, for example, in Ontario?

Mr. Corelli: Oh, sure. Actually this brings out, you know, a thing I mentioned before. There is a strange division here between the newspapers and their year-in-year-out quality, if you like, and the professionalism of some of the people who work for them. As I mentioned in the beginning some of these men in small cities—in Sydney I can think of Don Mackenzie and on the Old Cape Breton Post, Ian McNeil—I think he is still the editor of the paper—they are first class reporters and you couldn't find better men in the country. Yet for some reason or other this ability of theirs, this extremely high competence of men like MacKenzie and McNeil all across this country, this competence never seems to get through to the product they work for. Why this is I don't know. It is a phenomenon and never seems to make the paper into what these people are.

Senator MacDonald: I don't seem to follow you.

Mr. Corelli: Let me put this to you: there seem to be at work here two sets of qualities, if you like, two measurable things you can look at. You can bring a good reporter from the Maritimes and put him to work in Toronto and he would move in there and operate on a par or close to a par with the average reporter on that paper. He would not be distinguished by the fact that he was a bad Maritime reporter. He would be able to handle the job with no trouble. His copy would contribute to the overall worth of the newspaper.

But when he is back where he was, when he is back there working, his stuff does not seem to contribute to the raising of the calibre of the newspaper. Whether it is because he is in such a minority, whether it is because of editorial policies, whether it is because of editing, whether it is because of the play that stories get or the judgment that goes into them, I don't know what it is but good reporters do not necessarily, if there are too few of them, make a good newspaper. Obviously if they are on balance good then the newspaper will be too presumably; but one or two can't do it alone.

The Chairman: Have you a supplementary question, Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Is it not what you are saying to us this: the analogy would be, let us suppose I am a five handicap golfer and want to get into the professional class. If I am only playing with people that have a 15 or 20 handicap I have far less chance of getting into the professional class than if every match I play is going to be with the fellow who is a professional and has no handicap. Is that not the same situation? In other words, the fellow in a small newspaper has not got somebody better around him from whom he can learn and who will provide the impetus for him to improve.

Mr. Corelli: Right.

Mr. Drea: I think it is true in any business you want to go where the action is and the top part of it. Toronto says they have the best reporters in Canada. Of course they do, they strip the rest of Canada and make it economically worthwhile for people to migrate into Toronto and they build up and form large staffs of professional people.

Senator Prowse: Money and prestige?

Mr. Drea: It is not so much money as it is prestige. Nobody goes into this business to make money. There seems to be an idea that the simple solution... I think we have to talk realistically about money in this business. There seems to be the idea that the simple solution to getting a higher class reporter or better papers is all you have to do is double the salaries and sit back and watch. I don't think this is true at all because the people who go into this business basically do so because they want to do something. They feel they can do whatever they want to do in this world in this business; something not only for themselves but the entire community.

If you want to put money as the level you can but obviously then nobody would want to be a social worker, nobody would want to go into the clergy, nobody would want to go into the civil service. I don't think that anybody would argue that if you double the price you get a better Deputy Minister. I think certainly there are pay levels that have to be established; a person has to have a decent living, there is no question about that.

I don't think it is so much a question of money as a question of prestige and the ability to do something. If you are on one of the afternoon papers in Toronto then you can do a great deal. You get chances to do a great deal and whether you come through is up to you. You get a chance to go into the community and a chance to raise certain issues and to change things, to change legislation by some kind of forces. This is an attraction and that is why people come.

Mr. Carruthers: Now you people have been dressing Toronto reporters but reporters on the middle size papers and the smaller ones feel we can do just as much. We do run into problems but we are doing just as much or more so than the bigger papers.

The other thing I would like to point out is that when I first got interested in this strange business I laughed at my friends and asked Why are you going into journalism? You are going to start out at $75 a week and be laying for 70 hours a week and getting nothing out of it."

By the time I decided to go into it I felt the same. I don't know why. Perhaps we are a bunch of idiots. We would love more money, there is no question about that. I think the guild in that respect has done wonders. Without the Guild we would not be making as much money as we are. Initially that is not why people go into it. I think that is very important.

Mr. Corelli: I would just like to disagree with Frank on something. I think education is essential to this whole idea of professionalism in this business. We will make a special condition whereby Drea gets to stay in even though he doesn't qualify.

I think if we opt for a professional standard in journalism we cannot say that education does not matter. Obviously it does. One of the problems is people coming into newspapers who can't spell; they can't put a sentence together; they can't construct a paragraph if their life depended on it. It is pathetic the knowledge of the English language which is so apparent today in graduate universities.

Mr. Drea: I was trying to say that you cannot exclude a person who has been in the business for 25 or 30 years simply because he doesn't have a college degree.

Mr. Corelli: This seems to have developed into a sort of dancing around the central issue of Toronto versus the world. While this may be a common condition I don't think it is germane to this discussion. As I say, maybe I labour this point to the ridiculous extreme, but if there was a professional organization, if there was a centralized direction to this organization then presumably we could begin to do things like invite representative newsmen across the country to come to the central office wherever it is. God forbid it would be Toronto. We would not want to seduce them that obviously. So we bring people to the central office and for perhaps three weeks to a month or maybe a weekend of workshop seminars and things of that nature, things we decide that will be most useful. Through this sharing of standards of practice, concepts of standards of practice, everybody begins to become better. I think the value of this is indicated by graduates of medical schools.

A doctor who graduates from Dalhousie is no less professional than a doctor who graduates from the University of Toronto. The standards applying in medical schools are rigidly adhered to and there is a common denominator level. There is an acceptance of these standards of practice in any part of Canada. All a doctor has to do is write an exam and he is in business.

This is what we have to try to do. And we have to define what we are about. I think we have just talked about this for so long and pretty soon the exercise comes to the point where we have to say "What are we going to do about it?" We have been talking about professionalism in this business since I came into it 23 years ago and we are no closer to reality now than then.

Reporters are better because the demands on reporters are becoming more and more complex and diversified. That is the way newspapers are going. As far as being a professional organization or national we are not anywhere near it. If we don't get the assistance of some organization such as this, some group of men whose influence is perhaps going to push this thing into motion, we are never going to make it.

The Chairman: Now I think that Senator MacDonald had a point he wanted...

Senator MacDonald: It is pretty well covered. What I had in mind is this professional business. The doctors or lawyers have to have admittance by somebody; the Law Society or somebody says "Yes". Now if you are going to have this professional society you are going to have to have exactly the same thing which means there are going to be certain standards behind it.

Senator Prowse: And to exercise discipline over the members.

Mr. Carruthers: On this concept of education there are two important points that should be brought up. First of all admittedly in Canada a large majority of reporters who are working for the press now probably do not have what we call a university education and they do a better job...

The Chairman: A large percentage?

Mr. Carruthers: I may be wrong.

The Chairman: I don't understand what you are saying.

Mr. Carruthers: I am saying that a large percentage of the working press probably don't have a university education.

The Chairman: Would that be true for your paper?

Mr. Goodman: It is not true at the Star.

Mr. Carruthers: The point I am making is, this is changing. Education is not an essential part, as is shown by these people in the press now, but it is a very important part of becoming journalists, it is becoming increasingly more important as we are dealing with a more complex society and as we are dealing with things like science, technology and social issues.

Newspapers are now setting up people who are becoming sort of specialists, people who have a broader and larger knowledge about certain things like science and medicine. Then education becomes more and more important.

Now the discussion—I have to disagree with you here. This is one of the things that is going to go on between journalists. The point as to whether the Society should set up minimum standards—this is going to be a hot issue. Are you going to say that the Community College people are above or below it? I don't think it is so much a matter of minimum standards. It is the manner that we should push education not only before going into journalism but even continuing education for journalists. It is one of the tangible things. When people say "What can this do for me?", one of the things that I try to tell them is that perhaps as working journalists we will be able to set up mechanisms for you to get a continuing education and bring in people with more experience who are specialized in different fields and let them throw out ideas and share ideas and experience with you.

I don't mean to throw a lemon in here. Minimum education is a very very delicate issue. You have so many people now who have proven that while it is not essential...

Senator Prowse: Education is just a short cut to experience anyway.

Senator McElman: How long has your organization been in operation?

Mr. Drea: The Canadian one since we took over?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Drea: Eight or nine months.

Senator McElman: How long was the one that you took over in operation?

Mr. Drea: Oh, I suppose 40 years but it was American. What it really had were people who had gone to school in the States or had connections with American newspapers. They belonged more I think for social reasons or professional reasons that it was entirely American. That was one of the problems, getting anyone to join in Canada.

Senator McElman: You have some 80-odd members?

Mr. Drea: Yes.

Senator McElman: How many in the Maritimes?

Mr. Drea: None. We haven't gone to the Maritimes.

Senator McElman: I understood there were members across the country.

Mr. Drea: The contradiction in it is that we inherited the lists from the Americans and therefore we did pick up the odd person here and there across the country. We don't consider it to be a national membership because there are one or two in Edmonton. If I received the mailing list correctly there was no one in the American organization in the Maritimes. We haven't gone down to ourselves.

Senator McElman: Would you think in view of the comments that you and Mr. Corelli have made that this should be one of your first points of emphasis because of the low calibre of reporting?

Mr. Drea: I didn't say "low calibre of reporting", Mr. Corelli did.

Mr. Corelli: Thanks a lot.

Mr. Drea: I didn't say there was a low calibre of reporting.

The Chairman: Let me ask your opinion...

Senator McElman: We have Mr. Corelli's.

Mr. Drea: I don't think you can make a blanket statement that there is a low calibre of reporting in the Maritimes. Some is good, some not so good.

The Chairman: Will you try to be more explicit?

Mr. Drea: I don't know how much more explicit I can be. I have worked in the Maritimes. I was with the Steelworkers organization in the Maritimes for quite a while and I dealt with papers in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Some writing there found to be first class and some writing was low class. I don't think you can make a blanket statement there is a low quality of reporting.

Mr. Corelli: Nor did I make that statement, Senator. I did not.

Senator MacDonald: Let us put it this way: the calibre of the reporting in the newspapers in your opinion—I believe this is a correct interpretation—was far below the standards at there are elsewhere. Is this proper?

Mr. Corelli: As I pointed out, Senator MacDonald, I pointed out the existence of a fact. I think the reporting, with respect, the almost obvious inference is that reporting on papers that spend $60 a week for a reporter is going to be of a lower calibre than the newspapers that spend $200 a week for reporters. It is partly economic. For that reason I think it is also a question of the trend, the movement, if you like, the escalation in status and so on is of these bigger papers. You know The Toronto Star is heavily populated with guys from papers all over Canada.

Mr. Goodman: I can answer your specific question. We would not go into the Maritimes as a matter of priority. The policy of the Society is to provide resource people and besides putting down a body of statements on what the job is to provide somebody who can lecture on legal writing and what it implies and so forth. Until we can provide this body of knowledge and set up seminars in the Maritimes and conduct week-long workshops, we would not get into that.

There is a question of getting resources together and at the moment most resources are in Toronto.

Senator McElman: Mr. Corelli and I agree that in the Maritimes there are some high calibre people.

Mr. Goodman: Nobody here has denied that.

Senator McElman: And the resources probably are there for your organization to move in and recruit and have them spread their knowledge and professionalism. What I am simply asking is in your objectives would it not be an area of priority in the interests of your own profession to move into such an area to try to upgrade?

Mr. Carruthers: I think that one of the problems is first of all before we can actually do something which we necessarily intend to do, start doing things, is going to take many many years to accomplish many of these things. We have to be able to obtain the confidence and interest of people who are going to be doing it for us, the working members.

One of the reasons that we concentrated our efforts in Toronto, Ottawa, London and a few other places in Ontario is so we can gain the interest first of all, capture the interest of people we are closely related to and then, you know, get these people interested enough to get resources and then go on to other areas.

For instance, you go into the Maritimes and take a few journalists in there and organize and in a few years bring up the professional calibre of the people who need to be brought up.

This is going to take a viable organization which means something to journalists. If we had thousands of dollars and our intent was to use the money to build up areas that were undeveloped—call it that in talking about the Maritimes—then I can see just going in and pouring money in where it was needed most.

Mr. Drea: I really think this might explain it. Going into a place like the Maritimes really is no different than going to Hamilton, very close to Toronto. It costs a little bit more money but I am out about a thousand dollars out of my own pocket so far getting it going. I think before we do it in a place like the Maritimes we have to be able to offer something and show we have done something in Ontario. The reason we chose Ontario is we could do it with the least possible expense. We have a concentration of people.

We could say "We have done it now and we are prepared to help you do it. It has helped them in the Maritimes and you get yourself a Committee and you set yourselves up and you tell us how you want to help yourselves and what you want to do." Then it flows from there.

Senator McElman: I will come back to my question. Should this be an area of priority once your organization is going?

Mr. Drea: Yes, certainly. Particularly, I think, Senator, the journalists in the Maritimes suffer as much from the geography of the area as just about everybody else because the mainstream of communications in Canada is Toronto. There is no getting out of that. Magazines are published there, the telecast starts from there. It is the centre. The Maritime journalist is at a particular disadvantage compared to the western journalists because there is a block between him and Toronto which is Quebec.

Senator McElman: A block in what sense?

Mr. Drea: There is a communications block. There is a thousand mile gap.

Senator McElman: That doesn't stop communication surely.

Mr. Drea: Certainly it does. If you are in Toronto, reading the wire service in Toronto, you don't get very much about the Maritimes. I am sure much more happens there than comes across on the wire.

Senator McElman: Is that because of Quebec?

Mr. Drea: Yes, I think so; because the Maritimes are removed from the communications centre of Canada. They are a thousand miles away.

Senator McElman: But communications are instant.

Mr. Drea: They are and they are not.

Senator McElman: What is the relevance?

Mr. Drea: The press is not instant communications.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Goodman wanted to add something.

Mr. Goodman: The answer might be more in the area of interests. There are areas of interest in Quebec of great concern in that province but they are not going to be of great concern in the Maritimes or in Ontario. Sometimes it is hard to get that kind of information coming into Ontario. One problem one of the reasons is the CP wire does not pull in as much. There is not so much demand in terms of the Quebec papers for that news and therefore it is circulated regionally rather than coming to central Canada.

Senator Prowse: Did you ever drive from say, Toronto to Edmonton?

Mr. Goodman: I have driven across the country, Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: Did you notice what I noticed, that you get a real map as far as North Bay and until you hit Vancouver from the Manitoba border you get no information as to where the camp sites are?

The Chairman: I think that is not a problem for this Committee.

Senator McElman: We have excellent maps in the Maritimes.

On the matter of finances, was there suggestion that either the newspapers or the Government should contribute?

Mr. Corelli: I suggest it might be an effective way to begin if the newspapers would be willing to bankroll this operation at least this initial stage.

Senator McElman: You don't feel that subsidy from this level would have any effect? You don't fear a subsidy from the area?

Mr. Corelli: I fear it less than any other source.

Senator Prowse: What about the Canada Council?

Mr. Corelli: I don't think they have enough to spare after their investigations on fifteen-century Egyptian agriculture.

Mr. Drea: I frankly think that if we went to the Canada Council for money we would lose our membership. When we use the word "newspaper" there is the collective newspaper, the Canadian daily newspaper, and that is a collective one so there is no individual responsibility or restraint. I frankly would prefer we got it out of our own pockets if possible.

I am a firm believer that the moment you take money from somebody, he is not giving it out of the goodness of his heart and that you are in a debtors position.

Senator Prowse: Have you incorporated yet?

Mr. Drea: No.

Mr. Corelli: If we did take money from the newspapers—God forbid—we are really all working for them anyway, to a certain extent we are captive of the newspapers if we want to go on eating.

I am wondering if the proximity of the newspapers to the interests of the Society is not such that this might be—this might gradually minimize any sort of threat. In other words, the newspapers presumably want a better product and if the reporters are the ones who are in perhaps the best position to make the newspaper a better product in terms of what is in it to read, then these two ends become very close together, I think. Does that not follow? In other words, I think if we kept it in the family...I agree with Frank that the ideal thing would be to pay the shot ourselves and we might be able to do it after three or four or five years and have a national assessment of some substantial amount of money to the members that would perhaps reduce that sort of money.

Senator Prowse: The Canadian Press got a grant from the Government to start with and so soon as they were on their feet they said "We don't want it any more because of possible implications."

Senator McElman: Mr. Corelli, in the light of your own suggestions I think we should have all the facts. Would you tell us what newspaper you worked on?

Mr. Corelli: It was east of...!

Senator McElman: Do you recall the name of the newspaper?

Mr. Corelli: Yes, I do.

Senator McElman: Would you tell us the name of the newspaper?

Mr. Corelli: I would prefer not to.

Senator McElman: Why?

Mr. Corelli: Certainly not because of any inclination to embarrass the publisher. I think it is purely a selfish motive, probably not easily defensible. I have some very good and long standing friends working for the paper, both good friends and competent journalists, and I would not want to have my remarks interpreted as a slur against the characters, personalities or abilities.

Senator McElman: This is one of the problems we have in getting direct information of this nature.

Senator Prowse: Would you give the information in confidence to the Committee afterwards?

Senator MacDonald: I don't think it is relevant to the question anyway.

The Chairman: Yes, I think it is.

Senator McElman: When examples are given I think it is quite proper that we ask for particulars of the examples.

The Chairman: How long ago was it?

Mr. Corelli: Twenty-three years.

The Chairman: Does the observation have validity in the circumstances that prevail today?

Mr. Corelli: I said that I was back there last summer and distinguished no visible change. If you know where I was last summer you are in business.

The Chairman: I think, Senator MacDonald, then this does become relevant. Perhaps you can tell us privately afterwards.

Senator McElman: We have been talking about myths and the ones that bothered you as professionals. Let me say first of all before I move into this, Mr. Drea, that I was quite impressed with the depth of your humility when you suggested after reading your brief that you in 20 minutes had done more than the Committee had up to the present time.

Mr. Drea: I must have a bad voice. I didn't say that. There was a very frank discussion and we did put into a condensed form... Senator Davey brought up the point that we were perhaps being a little bit hard-nosed in our approach about this, saying we were dismayed, and I replied that in 20 minutes I think there was a very good discussion; certainly not by me but by this Committee, on the fact they have heard a lot of reports about certain things that were wrong and when they investigated those reports they found out there was so little substance to them they couldn't be documented. There was so little evidence.

I must carry you the wrong way...

The Chairman: I think Mr. Drea's interpretation is a fair one, Senator.

Senator McElman: Perhaps you would not be surprised if I suggested that many of the matters you have raised in your brief and elsewhere have been probed at some depth; I think many of them if not the bulk of them.

Could you suggest to me why it is that these have not reached through to you and the members of your organization?

Mr. Drea: I have read...

Senator McElman: For instance, your conferees from Quebec, the Association of which you spoke, have covered many of the matters that you have covered in your brief and in your comments.

Mr. Drea: I have some comments about their brief; yes, I do.

Senator McElman: I am giving this as one example. Then in the course of questioning of witnesses coming before us we have dealt with many, many of the questions you have raised today and I think we have had some excellent testimony on it as well. Why has this not gotten through to you?

Mr. Corelli: Perhaps I can...

Mr. Drea: I frankly don't know.

Mr. Corelli: I have here, if you can believe what you read in the Star, I have a handful of news reports filed on these proceedings which cover approximately the most recent week. I don't see anything in here—which is not to say it didn't take place—nothing but the earlier critical issues—"It might not be a bad idea if all the papers were run by the same guy."

Senator Prowse: Is this an indictment of the press rather than the Committee?

The Chairman: Well, I think in fairness to all concerned, in fairness to the witnesses and in fairness to the Senators, I think these are observations which are better made after all of us have had a chance to study the transcripts of the evidence which are very long indeed.

In saying that I say that it is in no sense an indictment of the coverage that the hearings are receiving.

Senator McElman: I am asking why the fact that many of these matters which these gentlemen properly consider to be highly important, most important to them, of course, why the discussion of them has not gotten through to them. I think that is a very valid question.

The Chairman: I think it is. It is one we are better able to answer once we have seen the transcripts.

Senator Prowse: I think you are missing the point, with all respect, Mr. Chairman. We have been carrying on hearings since early December and we are about half way through, and yet these gentlemen when they prepared their brief and came in here this morning were of the opinion we haven't looked at a number of issues or examined a number of issues that everybody on the Committee, and I am sure any people following the Committee, would agree that we have. At least we have not finished examination but we have received a lot of evidence.

Now I am not suggesting this is being improperly kept out, but it perhaps illustrates better than anything else the difficulties of communication.

The Chairman: Perhaps, Mr. Drea, you could direct yourself to Senator McElman's question. Do you want him to re-phrase it?

Mr. Drea: No. You want to know why the work you have done here has not gotten through to me?

Senator McElman: Or any member of the group?

Mr. Drea: Well, we said here, and I went through this before: "Lack of testimony and Senatorial inquisitiveness..." There was or I can recall that was in Montreal. I have been sitting here this morning since about o'clock and nobody has asked me my qualifications to even talk here, which amazes me.

Senator McElman: Frankly, as far as I am concerned the questioning is just nice and underway.

Mr. Drea: I said that I had been in the business 20 years and so on and so forth. I was asked a highly professional question when we got into news judgment and how an interview is conducted and so forth and then it dropped off. Nobody asked me "How do you make a judgment?" or "How does anybody here?" These are things we are interested in and we say there has not been terribly much inquisitiveness, certainly not this morning.

Senator McElman: You have not given us much time to be inquisitive. You have been talking a great deal.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, I don't think that is a fair comment.

Senator McElman: I withdraw that comment, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Prowse: When I have a person who appears before me as an expert witness, if I ask his qualifications they are always going to be excellent. In determining what weight should be given to his evidence I ask questions and the way he answers the questions will answer my curiosity far better than his answers to a direct question. Does that tell you something?

Mr. Drea: Yes. I will come back to the Senator. I know what he is asking and I thought I gave a reply a couple of minutes ago. You said "How come?" You said "The transcripts will back us up" and so forth. Why don't you know?" I said "Frankly, I don't know." I have followed the press and allowed it on television and the only answer can give is that obviously in the professional judgment of the people who are covering this from the press and electronic media the questions that I consider to be, and this group considers to be important, have not seemed that important to them and they placed their emphasis on other matters.

The Chairman: I think that is a good answer. I think all of us, and I include myself, would read the transcripts and then I think we would be in a better position to make these kind of judgments. As far as your credentials are concerned, I think you and I and several others had dinner in Toronto some number of months ago at which time as you recall I asked you a good deal about your credentials. The very fact that you are the Fiction Line Editor of the Telegram and resident of the organization certainly qualifies you to come here and testify. I think little could be served if a person like you or Mr. Goodman or the others, or indeed the witnesses who have come before the Committee, we began a long series of questions on biographic information.

I realize you are not apologizing for being here. You are qualified to be here and we want you to be here. As Chairman I would not presume to bring you before the Committee if I didn't feel your credentials were all right. I think it is an unfair criticism of my colleagues that they didn't try to determine your credentials.

Senator Smith: I have a whole batch of notes and I want to be able to ask questions about education and training. I am sorry about the sensitivity and not mentioning that particular subject. I was going to go into that and half a dozen others.

Mr. Drea: Excuse me. I was not being sensitive at all. I was asked a rather good solid question by your fellow Senator and I was attempting to answer it. I certainly don't think that he was out looking for something unusual. I think it was a good comment. I think his remarks were very accurate and in the course of that we kind of got on other things.

The Chairman: Senator Smith, I will come to you in a moment. We want your list of questions. I don't think that Senator McElman has exhausted his list.

Senator Smith: First of all I would like to apologize to Mr. Drea. I perhaps was getting overly sensitive because of some of your comments about the Committee and so on.

Senator Prowse: Scratch a Maritimer and you get blood.

Senator McElman: We Maritimers and Westerners have a lot in common.

Mr. Drea: I think you and I should quit while we are ahead!

Senator McElman: Earlier on there was considerable reference as to how you had asked for examples of covering up of news, prohibiting of news or whatever the terminology is you used, and that you had found none. Were you here last evening?

Mr. Drea: No, sir.

Senator McElman: Have any members of your organization been represented here following the activities of this Committee?

Mr. Drea: Directly?

Senator McElman: Yes?

Mr. Drea: I would not know. The people who are covering it...

Senator McElman: I am thinking as an association.

Mr. Drea: No.

Senator McElman: Then you don't have first hand knowledge. It is coming back to the other question. It is what you are getting through the media?

Mr. Drea: Yes.

Senator McElman: Last evening we had Professor Beattie giving testimony and in his brief and in his verbal comment he dealt very extensively with the so-called Dickens case in London. I don't know whether you are familiar with it or not?

Mr. Drea: The hot line man?

Senator McElman: Yes. We felt, or at least I felt that he had presented perhaps very strongly one side of the case so I asked him a question as to whether he had in fact interviewed the editor, I believe Mr. Heine, the man who was directly involved at the Free Press and also the top management man, Mr. Brown, and he said, no, he had not done.

Would you think that in such a circumstance we were getting a fair presentation of such a case, and would you think we did proper questioning to delve into a charge in that instance?

Mr. Drea: To answer your second question first, the answer would be "Yes". It is a serious accusation. In essence in a community where there is a great deal of concentration of ownership a man is removed from the job because he voiced opinions contrary to the stated policy of that concentration of ownership. I would think a Committee like this in your particular terms of reference would be most interested and I would certainly think that you would not be doing your duty if you didn't go into it.

On your first question, I think the only way I could answer that would be to put myself in the opposition of submitting a brief on behalf of Mr. Dickens as an outside person, which has happened, and if I was submitting a brief outlining the decline and fall of Mr. Dickens then certainly I think I would endeavour to get the other side of the story. If it was refused to me, obviously my hands are tied. Not to endeavour to get the other side of the story I think is not only ridiculous, it is juvenile. I could come and waste your time and so could anybody here with all kinds of unsubstantiated things and then you find the other side two or three days later and it turns out to be patently untrue.

Does that answer you?

Senator McElman: I should say immediately in all fairness to Professor Beattie that he told us he had interviewed Mr. Blackburn and also others at, I believe, the lower levels of management in both media.

I was wondering what your approach would be and whether we are following the proper course here because what I have gathered to be implied is the suggestion that perhaps we were delving without effect.

I refer to other cases brought before us. Now from my own standpoint there have been examples, and concrete examples, where news has been, by the evidence it would appear to have been suppressed. Now I am not talking about Toronto, and you were not able to find anything. Would you not feel that if this Committee were going out searching for such examples and bringing in one after another, that you gentlemen yourselves would be inclined to accuse us of muckraking?

Mr. Drea: No, sir. I think you would be doing a great service not only to the country but to the particular community where the news, if any, was suppressed.

Mr. Goodman: It is an honourable term of our reference.

Mr. Corelli: One thing I might be able to say, Senator McElman. I think the kind of things you are talking about—and I start with the generic description—often is perhaps suppression of news, meddling in news coverage by editorial direction of the paper. That is what you are talking about, deliberate distortion of the news.

Senator McElman: They are things you talked about earlier.

Mr. Corelli: Once again I am going to make a statement that cannot be proved or disproved.

I have never been, in the time I have been in the business, I have never been told how to write a story from the standpoint of policy, politics or the paper's vested interest in the subject.

Now obviously I have written lots of stories that have gone in the waste basket because they were not any good. This is a great lever. This is what happens and this is what keeps you trying harder the next time. But I have never written a story and had the editor say "You can't use this because it's against the paper's policy."

Mr. Carruthers: There is one thing that does come in. I don't know of any newspapermen myself who have been told that something is against the policy and don't do it. On the other hand I think we are all aware of a very hazy sort of sense that there are some times policies from way above and whether these have been stated or not, they may have been created in the minds of people halfway down, but they sometimes exert a restraining influence.

Mr. Corelli: I disagree with you.

Senator McElman: This is the very point I was leading to. Now you have stated very clearly, and we accept fully, of course, your opinion about it. You say there is no direction to kill a news story and so on. Have you personally run into situations, or are you aware of situations where, let us say, the medium level of management assumes that the owners or publishers might not like certain things to be dealt with, and has it ever had an effect upon you or do you know of situations, without being specific, where this does have an effect?

Mr. Drea: I think to answer it fairly, I think when you start out in the business and when you are young there is what I call "the percolation theory"—don't touch this guy, he's a pal, this is a sacred cow. I think you get the feeling, "Don't touch him. He is a pal of the owner."

I think after a couple of months you find out that you are creating a false situation and that the thing doesn't exist at all.

What concerns me, as Mr. Corelli has mentioned, you have middle management, city editors and copy editors. Now then, people talk a great deal now about newspapers won't tackle the gut issues and a reporter with a social conscience is isolated and put out. Now he's a savior because he has a social conscience not accepted by the middle management, or is he so poor a writer that they don't know what he is talking about and if they don't know what he is talking about how can they publish it because the public won't know what he is talking about? This is one of the great dividing lines.

When we were talking about being discredited, you see, you get sessions of this Committee where people come before it and people say certain things and what I was talking about in the beginning was not what the Committee was going to do. I have every confidence in the world that you will be doing your duty as you see it.

What I am concerned about, and what I think other people in the organization are concerned about, is the legacy—the thing that is left over when the report is finished and forgotten and the Senate is on to other things.

This concerns me a great deal because it enhances this myth.

The Labour people come before you and what is going to be remembered from their presentation?

Again I am saying what was in the press and on TV and what is going to be remembered is the conspiracy of silence. Now this is not true.

The Chairman: Let me make a point. They believe it to be true. It was certainly the nub of their presentation.

Mr. Drea: I worked in the labour movement for two years. I was with the United Steelworkers from 1963 to 1965 and went all across this country and I didn't find any conspiracy of silence against the labour movement. Now in smaller communities it was somewhat difficult, not because they didn't want to publish it but because the reporter didn't understand certain things. Once they understood, the coverage was adequate.

Mr. Carruthers: You mentioned this is a problem with younger reporters and I think I can sincerely say it is probably true. I am fairly new in this business and this percolating effect that you mentioned I sort of experienced. I am sure most young reporters do. These things come from other reporters—Don't go too near this guy. Well, as one gained experience and a bit of expertise it is different. I have done a few stories recently that when I first arrived in Ottawa I would not have done because I thought perhaps the paper would not publish them or would have toned them down.

When it came to the crunch and when I turned out a story that I thought was good it was published. This may be the distinction. The only point I made originally was perhaps for a while members of our profession had the myth in their own mind.

The Chairman: You described the lasting impression which you have from the CLC presentation. What impression did you take from CDNPA presentation to our Committee?

Mr. Drea: That everything was rosy in the newspaper business and why are you really investigating it.

The Chairman: I asked that for a particular reason.

Senator McElman: On the CLC matter we endeavoured when these charges, or whatever you wish to call them, were made, we endeavoured to tie them down to examples. I think this is very correct, Mr. Chairman. We were not too successful.

Mr. Drea: Oh, I think you were.

Senator McElman: Furthermore, when it was suggested that if there were examples that didn't come to mind at the moment or which they had documentation on elsewhere, we asked them if they would obtain documentation and put it in the hands of this Committee. So we still are very much open. We are not forming an opinion. But I think your comment is very valid up to this point.

Mr. Drea: What I would like to add, Senator, is that the implication of that was that the press in the country was deliberately isolating a very large section of the community. Now, the very day that that happened there were all kinds of labour stories in the paper. You asked for examples and whether it is ever going to be documented or not I do not know.

Now, what was done that day by the people here left the impression that labour not only gets a second class position in this country but also that there is a policy on at least one newspaper that they are to be treated as a bunch of hooligans; the editorial policy is to get the violence up there and forget about the egghead stuff. Now, on the day that it is happening the obvious thing that comes, I think, to the public mind is "Well, how would you expect the man, a very large capitalist, who is the owner and the publisher, why would he not cut the throats of those who are against him?"

On that very day you have in the paper a rather long article cutting the publisher's own throat, because it is going to cost him an awful lot of money if it ever came. It was rather gleefully reported that the particular event was going to come to pass and it directly affected two of his businesses and the thing ran in total.

The Chairman: We all know you are talking about Mr. Bassett.

Mr. Drea: I am talking about a rather long article I wrote, based on some conversations with a former associate of mine named Marvin Miller, executive director of the Baseball Players Association. There was a court case in the United States that would end the very restrictive clauses under the Professional Act. If they get in baseball obviously the hockey players will no longer have their restrictive clauses and so forth. The man that pays my salary happens not only to be principal in a hockey team but in a football team. My tone quite frankly was there would probably every chance in the world that would happen and so on. Now this would cost him a great deal of money and the thing remains untouched. Now this is hardly a conspiracy of silence about organized labour.

Mr. Corelli: You asked a question earlier Senator McElman, about middle management's interpretation of what top management wanted to do. These things have not happened to me recently but I did have a couple of funny ones in the past that might illustrate how they happen.

I think by and large there is a responsibility on the part of the reporter to check the things himself. They invariably turn out to be wrong.

I remember one time a newspaper I worked on had a policy which I was informed of—it goes back some years. The publisher was an avid golfer and the direction I got in my capacity as assistant sports editor was to make sure the results of the games played in the Golf and Country Club run in full every day. So I just put them in the paper. One day after this had been going on for weeks and weeks, the publisher came in the newsroom and he looked rather plaintive and turned to no one in particular and said "Why the hell are you running all these golf scores?" This is an example of the kind of thing that goes on.

Senator Prowse: The care and feeding of the boss was misleading.

Mr. Corelli: Right. It is perhaps strange and perhaps indicative of something that the incidents that I can recall all took place in areas that we have been talking about earlier as down the scale from perhaps the mildly maligned Toronto dailies.

Senator McElman: I have one point I would like to refer to. You were asking if there were examples earlier on and you asked whether anything actually had been brought forward. I would like your reaction to the example that was brought forward. I believe it was Senator Prowse when we had one witness before us, it was a document with a story about a new mill being constructed and the rather expensive and first class anti-pollution measures that were being incorporated into this mill. It had been released to a particular newspaper and the matter of pollution was highly current in that area with ac-public, not with the newspaper. The documentation showed that although the story of intense interest in the areas was some, I believe, six to seven pages when it was filed, when it eventually reached publishing in that newspaper it was all in the first paragraph of the story and no more. It didn't get to the gut of the story at all and actually wound up within the obituary column at page 21 of the newspaper.

The publisher of the newspaper was asked—he had asked for instances. He had asked to be shown any instances where his newspaper had done anything improper. When he was presented with this, as I recall, his reply was that it was a dreadful mistake in judgment.

Now that being something of high current public interest, do you believe it is possible or such a thing to become just a dreadful mistake of judgment?

The Chairman: That might be a good question for Mr. Goodman.

Mr. Goodman: I do. There are, as I have found, some incredible lapses of judgment that can occur with very senior experienced people. I know from your point of view it would be nice to be able to pin down something as being a deliberate matter. You certainly can find instances of lack of judgment in all papers. That is the key—was there something deliberate? I am trying to recall an incident. I am familiar with lapses in judgment of that magnitude.

Mr. Drea: Anything is possible in a newspaper. I take it you don't mean they have dreadful lapses of judgment six days a week.

Senator McElman: Of course not.

Mr. Drea: Anything is possible because newspapers are not an automated procedure. You can have great judgments all the way up the line; you can have great judgments all the way up to the top and somebody has got a megaphone and it sits on the desk and gets cut into two paragraphs and you have to live with it.

Senator McElman: At the outset I believe it is as you who said we have been asking publishers certain questions and they are giving obvious answers: are you in favour of fatherhood, that sort of thing—And they say "yes." This sort of thing. Would it have been of value to say "Come on"...

Mr. Drea: I think he gave a valid answer.

Mr. Corelli: The unfortunate part is eventually you can run out a string of circumstances if you had enough examples. The problem is these things do happen. You have two stories on the same two subjects that appear in the same paper on the same day. How does this happen? You simply discover it and you throw it out. It is not only the fact there are frailties involved in human judgment but this judgment is exercised under extreme pressures of time and space. These two things together sometimes make this process go awry. I don't know what the percentage-worth is in a discussion like this but I would guess that the vast majority of things which the newspapers do which appear as errors are products of the process breaking down rather than anyone saying "Let's deliberately do this."

Senator Prowse: Well, it was to his advantage; and I am being unduly suspicious saying this; having in mind the kind of mistake that is made; the only time I get wrong change back, it is always short.

Mr. Corelli: If the circumstances are as you describe, I am sure you are.

Mr. Goodman: Did he do anything about it subsequently?

Senator Prowse: No.

Senator McElman: In the best of humour I ask you this question: we have talked a good amount about myth; could I have your reaction to what I believe to be a myth that has been assiduously sold by the media, and that is that the Senate is composed of eighty to ninety-year-old, doddering sleepwalkers.

Mr. Drea: My reaction; how do you mean?

Senator McElman: To that myth.

Senator Prowse: That is a risky question!

Mr. Drea: This image created by the press?

Senator McElman: Projected to the Canadian people over a long period of time.

Mr. Drea: I don't know that it has been conveyed lately to the Canadian people.

Senator McElman: I have seen some dandy cartoons.

Mr. Drea: Yes. I think you are in somewhat the same position as we are. You are portrayed erroneously; you have the public image, which is erroneous. You are all portrayed as old men and ladies. Just the same as a journalist is portrayed by image as a drunk, a screwball, an erratic, somehow always comes through.

Senator Prowse: The trouble is you don't always come through.

The Chairman: Do you have another question?

Senator McElman: Would you think an elevation of professionalism would perhaps overcome this in both areas?

Mr. Drea: Yes, I do. I think if more journalists had an opportunity to watch the Senate of Canada in operation, watch Committees like this in operation, they would come to other conclusions. I don't think it is fair to say that because a man is over a certain age he is a doddering old man. Certainly Senator Roebuck despite his age is far, far from being that.

I think one of the areas here, although it is not within the terms here, one thing that might be done is put the television cameras in here and let the people make up their own mind without editorial comment. Here you are, there you are, on the screen. They can make up their own mind.

The Chairman: This is not a problem within the immediate jurisdiction or concern of this Committee.

Senator McElman: I have a last question. I believe you said, sir, that you have been an officer of the Guild?

Mr. Drea: Yes, sir.

Senator McElman: At one stage.

Mr. Drea: Yes, sir.

Senator McElman: Mr. Goodman, you have not belonged to the Managing Editors Conference?

Mr. Goodman: I haven't attended a convention. I will go in May. All managing editors appear to belong.

Senator McElman: Before forming your own organization did you really explore the possibilities of working through these organizations to improve professionalism?

Mr. Goodman: When I was in the Guild, an officer of the Guild, I tried to get the membership at that time interested in professionalism and standards, and I didn't get anywhere with it. And nothing seems to have changed even though I left it! I don't think the managing editors are the people who are going to do it. That is one of the reasons I am waiting for the chance tomorrow. The reporters have a stake in this. It is the living of the reporter. You as a person, as a minister, as a senator now are dependent on that person who is in front of you. Lots of other people can do things along the way. That man in front of you is the key judgment, the key resource, the key intellect. It is reporters themselves that produce the impetus and therefore that is where the impetus has to come unless the Guild joins everybody, which the Guild of course does not. It is once every two or three years. The Guild is going to set groups against each other. I think it has to be an all-embracing organization.

Senator McElman: You feel the formation of your organization was initially for these purposes, and could not or would not be served by either of these groups?

Mr. Goodman: That is right.

The Chairman: It is now ten minutes one, and I am anxious to adjourn the meeting at one o'clock, which leaves us ten minutes. I am afraid you fellows may be the kind of witnesses that we have had before who leave here and say, "They didn't ask this or that." We don't usually do this but I thought it might be helpful and perhaps the person who has the most practical working knowledge, of course our executive consultant, Bord Spears, and I think for the final ten minutes perhaps you could ask the questions, Bord, that we have not asked and that they might think we should have asked. That is a time assignment in ten minutes.

Mr. Spears: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have been personally fascinated with the whole discussion, and to use Mr. Drea's word "dismayed" at some things said and some things not even raised. One or two questions have been suggested in my mind by the participants here. A few needles have been stuck, and I would like to sink a small one of my own. As you gentlemen know, one of the first things you impress on a beginning reporter is that he would get the names accurately. Not right in the first page of your submission you list the five members of your delegation, and two are incorrectly spelled. I suppose this gets to the point of professional qualifications.

But my first real question is this: obviously your total concern is about professional standards, establishment and definition of standards. One of this Committee's chief concerns is the same thing, the establishment of standards and a definition of what is freedom of the press.

Are you suggesting that because this has not happened; because it is left to you professionals in the business to elevate the professional standards, are you suggesting the publishers are dragging their feet? Why has not something happened there?

Mr. Drea: I am sorry, I lost you on that.

Mr. Spears: Are the publishers dragging their feet?

Mr. Drea: Yes, I think so, collectively.

The Chairman: He was also asking why.

Mr. Spears: Is their interest not the same as yours here?

Mr. Drea: Yes, in the broad sense it is the same, but in a limited sense I don't think it is. Naturally, the better the reporters they have the better the paper they will have. Also you enter into some other things like cost factors, and I also don't think the publishers are in a position as the owners to arbitrarily dictate standards. For instance, in papers that have contracts with the Newspaper Guild it would be impossible, and would even be denied in the courts certainly, that newspaper publishers could arbitrarily put in standards which would affect the reporters because the competence or incompetence of the reporters does not have to be justified by their professional board; it has to be justified under the terms of the Labour Relations Act. I don't think publishers are in a position to dictate standards. I think it is up to the people in the industry. I don't think it is the role of the government to dictate standards.

Mr. Spears: The ultimate responsibility for the product depends on the publisher. How can you shift him the responsibility for setting standards?

Mr. Drea: I am not denying him the responsibility. I am saying collectively they don't want to assume it. They have not summed it. I think we have to face facts.

Mr. Corelli: I don't know whether this is an argument or not. I think it is interesting that papers in the country whose standards are the highest are the papers with publishers whose concern for standards is the highest. I think the wealthiest papers, the largest papers, which attract fairly easily the best reporters from elsewhere in the country, tend to have a professional standard inherent in the individual. Their concern is probably parallel and working together they enhance the product still further. The lower level of standards on other kinds of papers are probably a product of mutual disinclination to pick up the ball and run with it. Maybe on the part of the reporter this is an inability to know the standard is lacking and maybe on the part of the publisher contentment to rest with the product.

Mr. Spears: Are you saying a good publisher attracts a good staff?

Mr. Corelli: I think a good newspaper attracts a good staff, which might be the same thing.

Mr. Spears: Time is getting short. Marty, you were a little critical when you commented on the work of this Committee and said that you want the Committee to investigate the application of standards on the selection and presentation of news.

When your group was invited to come to this Committee this was one thing we hoped to elicit from you and you haven't got around to do that. I would ask specifically what criteria you yourself apply, what standards you apply. This is the question you put to the Committee.

Mr. Goodman: What I was trying to suggest was that the Committee might try and define some of these in a report which of course it would have to do through research and questioning as the Committee was in session. The standards I think Drea did define in terms of what we were looking for in reporters. At the early stage there was a definition of the type of thing that we would try and set up as reporters' standards.

The first question I dealt with was freedom of the press, the one you asked, and posed it as a right of citizens, not a special privilege, and from this flowed responsibility for certain kinds of news coverage. You would divide the news, I would think, into certain groups—what it is you have to have an obligation to put across: matters dealing with public affairs, public policy, things that are significant in the lives of people have to be reported in the press of the country.

We don't consider it adequate in our newspaper to simply let reports of the legislatures be covered, to be treated as another legislative story and it goes inside. We demand these stories be given special attention because they are legislatures—Ottawa, Queen's Park, and the municipal.

I believe there is a necessity to try and explore trends. If I could define something, news events that happen at a specific hour are a traditional easy kind for the press to cover. Now there is an obligation to try and report stories of significance that are essentially trends. News stories in this category—I will give you one very badly reported for fifty years—the advent of the automobile.

Here is something that emerged in society and caused all sorts of changes in people's lives, and is still causing changes, and was never adequately reported by the media of any kind. This is the second group of stories which I think should be reported prominently and fully and newspapers should be aware of.

The third category of stories—the traditional kind of human interest stories, what is happening to people of interest in terms that are easily identifiable to other people, some good and some bad. Natural disasters, big explosions, stories of that nature. These are three areas you can apply standards of judgment.

The coverage of financial and economic affairs in this country is abysmal. It extends right down the line. I don't even think those papers which specialize in it do a particularly good job. It is hard to get people interested in that area. Collectively as a media it is a difficult problem to train people, to motivate them to learn more. I think it is possible. Anybody would agree this is an area of news which is rather vital for informed public discussion and public policy.

For instance, is the government performing well in the fight against inflation? To get a public consensus or informed public discussion you need able reporters in this area. I think it is possible to set standards and examine them against something in front of you—that is the newspaper—and determine whether it is being met or not.

Mr. Spears: Back to Mr. Goodman again. You did suggest you hoped this Committee in its report would somehow codify or somehow suggest the standards you are hoping to emerge, and the publication of this report would enable the public to make its judgment on the performance of the media. It has been suggested by other witnesses that the judgment is being made every day for every newspaper. It is already being put to the public test. Would you comment on that?

Mr. Goodman: I suppose that would be fair to say in Toronto, where if you don't buy one paper you can easily buy another one. I am not so sure is possible to make the same judgment in a one-paper town.

Now people buy papers for a variety of reasons. They may buy the paper to look at the grocery ads and see what steak is going for today. That person has to buy the paper to get that information but he may be absolutely dismayed, or may not know enough to be dismayed with the news coverage.

Mr. Spears: You seem to think the public not competent to judge the competence of newspaper?

Mr. Goodman: The public, as politicians know, is always competent. It is not for the public to make the judgment. This is a useful guideline for the paper. We are dealing with standards that are not very well articulated at this time. I don't suggest we have been able to help you very much or have been able to put before you a group of them. One of the reasons being that it is awfully difficult to try and get the membership to agree precisely what they were so we could present them.

This is traditional; for a field which communicates to people in writing, we have been very laggard in setting down our own standards.

Mr. Spears: Would you be willing to work on it and let the Committee have the results?

Mr. Goodman: We are working on it. Of course. The standards if they are then presented—I can give you something on that. The Americans have the National Commission on Violence and its report on the media to try and set down some of the standards. It's not just the public as a whole; it is the community; the professors at the community colleges and so forth; the opinion-makers and so forth are able to articulate judgments about the performance of their media, press, television and everything, against the standard.

Maybe the standard is not perfect but it begins to set out something against which there can be a public discussion.

Mr. Spears: Thank you.

The Chairman: Gentlemen and senators, even before Senator McElman's question to you, Mr. Drea, about senatorial images and your reply, it had occurred to me that senators and journalists have indeed a great deal in common and one of the things that perhaps we have both demonstrated is over-sensitivity.

I think that your very presence here and the comments that you have made at least begin to meet some of the objections and objectives set forward in your paper, and I can only add to what Borden said in his final question: if you or your membership have additional thoughts or ideas or comments, or indeed if you are able to develop some kind of set of standards—and Senator Prowse was wrong when he said we were about halfway through; we are really only one-third of the way through the public hearings, and we won't be getting around to the report until into the spring—so you should realize, as I hope you will, that we would genuinely like to hear more from you. I am sure you know that we are genuinely interested.

May I remind the senators and others that the next meeting of the Committee is at four o'clock in the room upstairs, 356S, to receive the brief from Professor Donald Cameron of the Mysterious East.

Senator Prowse: Could I ask one question? I have already shown this to Mr. Drea, and that is a suggestion which comes from various areas and now is operating in two Paris papers and a magazine in Germany. This is the complete control of the news, the editorial departments in newspapers should be handled professionally by professional writers and editors of the paper.

In other words, in newspapers where the publisher-owner is becoming about as rare as a whooping crane, is the solution to this, as we don't know who is going end up owning the newspapers, in order to ensure independence at the profession should be allowed to assume complete control and responsibility for the editorial news department of the newspaper?

Mr. Drea: I think first of all this is not exactly what I read in there, but I had something else in mind. I think theoretically this is supposed to be true now. I don't think there is a publisher who says he meddles. He says it is his editor who is a professional. I think it is certainly that if that were made possible—because I think we have to be realistic; when a man owns a newspaper I think we are being less than honest with ourselves if we don't expect him to express some of his own opinions. He has a lot of money tied up in it. I think that, yes, this could be possible. It could be in some kind of a trust arrangement where the professional did run it. In theory they are supposed to now. This is what we are suggesting in our brief, a kind of low-key solution to this.

If we can make this profession really a profession from top to bottom regardless of where the paper is or what the size of the paper is, then we can avoid either the myth or the reality about managed news, prohibited news, tampered news, or what-have-you.

However, I would not want to go on a European kick where the reporters wind up owning the newspaper and it can't be right or wrong. I think that is a lot of bunk. I know myself if I look back at some of the things I once thought were the gospel, if somebody had not caught me in time I wouldn't be here; nobody would listen to me today.

I think perhaps some kind of trust, perhaps this might lead into the idea of a press council. Not in the negative way where the publisher would say nobody should meddle in my business, but in a positive way bringing the community into direct access with the newspapers and the professional people covering the community.

Particularly in the monopoly community. I don't think it would be needed in the community where there is competition but I think this type of arrangement might very well, if we look on the positive side, meet some of the realities of our time. There are going to be more and more communities with one newspaper. It is all very well to say about the small town, are they competent to judge news values? I don't think it matters if the public are competent or incompetent. There is no alternative.

The paper is there and nobody has got five million dollars to start another one in a very capital, intensive and low-profit industry. Those are the realities of our time. I don't think we have the God-given right to run the media. I think you have to bring in the community.

I think that might well be the pattern in the future, that the work is done in the community by the institution of the community, the local press, radio, TV—whatever it is.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. The meeting is adjourned.

The Committee adjourned.

The Committee resumed at 4.00 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call the session to order. This afternoon we are to receive the brief of Dr. Donald Cameron, who is Associate Professor English at the University of New Brunswick, and a contributing editor to The Mysterious East.

Dr. Cameron, the brief which you were kind enough to prepare has been circulated to the senators. It has been presumably studied by them, and we would like to begin by offering you some time to make an oral statement. You can expand upon your brief or explain it, or amplify it, or say anything else which may be on your mind, and following your oral statement the senators are going to proceed to question you both on the contents of your written brief and your oral remarks and on anything else which may be on their minds.

Carry on.

Professor Donald Cameron, Contributing Editor, The Mysterious East: Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a statement which I would like to read.

On the first day of these hearings you were told—rather churlishly—by Mr. Ralph Costello, publisher of the Saint John Telegraph-Journal, that he was not happy to be here. On this, as on many other matters, I cheerfully disagree with Mr. Costello, I am very happy to be here.

I am happy to be here because, judging from the reports of these hearings, you have been subjected to a great deal of windy nonsense from people like Mr. Costello, and I imagine you will be as happy as I am to climb down from the airy heights of platitudes, where the owners of Canada's media would like you to remain, and to talk about life in the real world.

You have been told, for instance, by Mr. Graham Dennis of the Halifax Herald, that he regards Nova Scotian ownership of the Halifax dailies as "as sacred trust." I had thought that kind of language went out of style about 1880, and the fact that he can still use it tells us a good deal about the period in history he comes from.

Mr. Dennis also saw no need for a press council, arguing that the public itself serves as a press council. In this he was following the lead of the Brantford Expositor's owners and that of Ottawa Journal editor Norman Smith, who made a fine ringing proclamation: "Governments should leave the running of the press to the press," he cried. "If some of us are making more money than is good for us; tax us. If we gang up or monopolize against the public interest, crack down." (I am unable to discover how you are to crack down without interfering, but when a media mogul is defending freedom of the press, logic often goes by the board.)

"If we are seditious or libellous or otherwise unlawful," Mr. Smith continued, "hale us into court. But as to what we put in our papers—good, bad, indecent, incomplete—the public be the judge." And that, gentlemen, is the rub.

In Fredericton a good many of us have looked at our daily newspaper, affectionately nicknamed The Daily Wiener, and we have judged. We consider the Gleaner a dreadful newspaper. So what? No consequences follow from that judgment. There isn't any provision for any consequences to follow.

This Committee is the first opportunity can recall for any dissatisfied citizen to do anything meaningful at all about the media—and the fact that you do exist, and do provide a forum, is in my view a cause for rejoicing in itself.

In my written submission I argued that the centralization of the media in Upper Canada and Quebec combined with the monopoly ownership of most of the New Brunswick outlets had left the Maritimes in general, and New Brunswick in particular, very badly served.

For most Maritime centres the newspaper are normally in the hands of a local monopoly if they are not owned by K. C. Irving; private radio hardly deserves comment; Toronto sends us bad television remote from our own needs; and only CBC radio is left attempting to do a responsible job. That picture is necessarily over-simplified, but I believe it is essentially accurate.

I offered the Fredericton Daily Gleaner as an instance of just how bad a newspaper can be, and I argued that ownership by K. C. Irving has not changed it very much: obviously it is not simply ownership which is the fault.

The real problem is that the same kinds of persons seem to own all the newspapers—persons whose interest is in the balance sheet, not in journalism; persons who are interested in a stable climate for business operations and consequently have no serious arguments with the status quo.

I suggested that the Wiener, for instance, shamelessly selects its news coverage in accordance with its editorial opinions. Last April it looked for a story on welfare which would show welfare as a racket; failing to find one, it simply did not print the story the reporter submitted. It still has not printed that story.

The Mysterious East, with its fourth issue now being printed, still has not been mentioned by the Gleaner, although the day before yesterday its editors were able to find space on the front page for a large photograph of the new executive of the African Violet Society.

Senator Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I did not understand a word that Dr. Cameron used back there. They had an article prepared on welfare, did you say?

Professor Cameron: That is right.

The Chairman: On the general subject of welfare.

Professor Cameron: Right; on the welfare question.

The Chairman: I might say this opening statement is in writing. Would you like to get a copy that you can follow?

You will find the African Violet about ten lines down on page 2.

Professor Cameron: I have a photograph which proves the case, if you want to see it.

The Chairman: I do not think so.

Professor Cameron: The nearest it has come to mentioning us was on January 17th, after we had published an issue on the problems of the Indians, which had been illustrated by Indian children's drawings. Brucie Greene, the Gleaner's Indian columnist, named the children whose designs had been chosen "to go into a recent magazine publication."

On the same page book reviewer Paul Butt discussed Harold Cardinal's The Just Society simply by reprinting great patches of the copy from the book's dust jacket. In my written submission I gave the Gleaner credit for its attempts to provide some coverage of the Indian community: perhaps I should withdraw that faint praise.

And if it regards the source of information as satisfactory, the Gleaner is totally uncritical. Early this month, for instance, it ran a story on the year's activities at the University of New Brunswick. The story seriously distorted last year's disturbances at the university in favour of the administration and against the student protests. No wonder: it was written by the university's public relations officer, Alan Pacey. The Telegraph-Journal carried it too.

You have heard, gentlemen, from the men who are responsible for it, what a fine job the New Brunswick dailies are doing. How they do not slant their news coverage. How independent they are. Well, let us take a test. What kind of news would we expect them to distort, if there were indeed any distortion?

An ideal case might be a speech by a prominent socialist to a conference of students, calling for socialism as the only answer for the problems of the Atlantic region and attacking both K. C. Irving and the press. You may suspect, when I set it up in this way, that I have an example in mind. I do.

On October 25th, 1969, Mr. Laurier LaPierre addressed the Atlantic Student Conference at Memramcook, near Moncton. I have with me a copy of the transcript which was made from a tape-recording of his address. Mr. LaPierre begins by talking about the problems implied in the idea of social change, and shortly works up to the idea of decentralized socialism.

The transcript, I should say, contains twenty-six pages; by page four we are slamming the capitalist system; on page six K. C. Irving has become the focus of a sardonic and energetic attack which continues for two pages. By page nine Mr. LaPierre has moved on to discuss a non-violent revolution to bring about a socialist state. The liaison between big business and a centralized federal government is next.

The theme throughout is socialism and the obstacles to it. On the seventeenth page we are discussing the role of the press in maintaining the system, and the way the press treats black people and Indians and students. On page twenty Mr. LaPierre expresses the hope that the Irving industries will be nationalized in the next two or three years, and he closes by calling on his young Maritimers to work towards a home-made solution to Maritime problems, a society which makes sense for the people who live down east.

Oh, yes. In passing he dismisses Maritime union as irrelevant and probably retrograde: he wants less centralization; not more.

How did the independent, free-thinking, hard-hitting Irving dailies report it?

On Monday, October 27th, the Moncton Times headlined its front-page story: Maritime Union "Waste of Time and Resources." It devoted twenty column-inches to LaPierre's speech in a story labelled "Staff Special." Of those twenty inches, one and a quarter was devoted to the attack on Irving. Two inches covered the comments on the press. The rest of the article was devoted to Maritime union and economic development, but the economic development was made to appear as simply a variant of the existing economic system, and the world "socialism" did not appear anywhere in the article.

The Saint John Telegraph clipped the inessential last paragraph from the story, and instead of calling LaPierre simply "the head" of McGill's French-Canadian Studies program it called him "the articulate head." Otherwise the Telegraph-Journal story was, word for word, identical with the Moncton Times story.

Naturally the Moncton evening paper, the Transcript followed its morning sister. So did the Evening Times-Globe in Saint John. And the Fredericton Wiener picked up the Telegraph-Journal story complete.

So far as any New Brunswick reader could tell, LaPierre simply came down from Montreal to tell us what to do about Maritime union. Oh, these cheeky bastards from Central Canada!

What is even more puzzling, however, is the fact that the story printed by the Irving press contains a good deal that is not in the transcript. Why? Very simply, because the reporter who wrote the Times story did not hear Mr. LaPierre. Instead he relied on some mimeographed notes which Mr. LaPierre passed out in advance.

When he actually spoke, Mr. LaPierre threw away the notes and delivered a rousing committed speech. But the reporters had taken the handout and left—with one exception. The one exception, the one New Brunswick daily to report the story reasonably accurately, the one daily to mention socialism, to quote the vigorous criticism of the Irving empire, was the one daily in the province not owned by Mr. Irving: I mean, of course, l'Evangeline, the Moncton French-language daily. Vive l'Evangeline libre!

Now I don't know the answers to the problems of the Maritimes. Probably you don't either. I don't really imagine Jean Marchand does. But there is obviously a logical possibility that some form of socialism is required, and that is certainly a possibility we should be debating in the Maritimes. But no English-speaking reader in New Brunswick had the chance to find out even that Mr. LaPierre had proposed it.

The point is that that kind of rotten reporting is actually interfering with the development of the Maritimes. And it's interfering on behalf of people like K. C. Irving. I don't suggest, of course, that K. C. Irving told his newspaper how to cover that story. He doesn't need to. They know perfectly well who butters their bread, and they aren't going to take any chances. And because they must surely be afraid that if they dig into anything important in New Brunswick they're likely to run into K. C. Irving's interests, they just don't bother digging. It's a sort of enforced laziness.

I hope I have made my point that the state of the press in our part of the country is intolerable. And some groups of citizens are refusing to tolerate it any longer. At least three new small periodicals have been established in the Maritimes; there are indications of more to come.

In my written submission, I pointed out some methods by which the federal and provincial governments could make it easier to establish new papers, and thus improve the citizen's chances of doing something effective after he has made the judgment all the big publishers are so anxious to have him make.

I want to stress now the fact that I do think this is one of the very few ways for government to interfere in the nation's media without risking freedom of the press. Another system would be a blanket subsidy of some kind, available to all general publications or to all non-profit publications (that is, in fact the basic effect of the current postal regulations); a third is by making some avenue of publicity available so that the aggrieved reader can seriously embarrass an incompetent or dishonest newspaper. This last function is, of course, one of the immediate benefits of this inquiry.

The only alternative now is the establishment of an independent periodical, and that's what The Mysterious East has attempted. We felt a real need for journalism which would provide an outlet for the poor, the radical, the dispossessed and the powerless, and in the absence of anything better we decided to try to provide it ourselves.

The resulting monthly magazine has been remarkably successful. We have not had a great deal of advertising, but our readers' support has sustained us. We have provoked flurries of consternation in some places where they are greatly needed—in provincial war authorities, in the governing bodies of universities, among some of the less scrupulous landlords.

We have a lot more to do, too, and we hope to make the magazine a forum for all varieties of progressive opinion in the Maritimes, a pole around which thoughtful and imaginative Maritimers can organize.

Such goals obviously pass beyond simple reporting (just as, for instance, the Gleaner's anti-pornography campaign did). We will be presenting our own briefs to various bodies, as we are doing here; possibly we will take an active role against pollution; we are trying to become a centre of information for people who want to know what their rights before the law actually are, how to organize a tenants' association or a housing co-operative, what are the basic facts about drugs. After all, if we believe in the things we write about, our obligation does not end when the magazine hits the newsstands.

I will conclude by mentioning two such projects, both of which will be announced in our next issue, due out in a week or two. The first of these is an essay contest, closing March 31st, for readers who will tell in five hundred words or less why their local paper is the worst in the Maritimes. We will judge the entries primarily on the basis of documentation and liveliness of presentation, and the prize will be a year's subscription to the Lancaster Guardian Weekly, the New York Times, the Toronto Globe and Mail, or any similar paper of the reader's choice. And all the entries will be sent on to this Committee—so, in a sense, everybody wins.

The second such project—well, perhaps I could just read you part of the text of the announcement from our fourth issue, since this is probably a suitably public occasion on which to announce the establishment of the Rubber Duck Awards.

Our parent company, The Rubber Duck Press, Inc., is pleased to announce the establishment of the Rubber Duck Award, to be given each month to the person, corporation, government or institution which has, in the opinion of the Board of Directors, committed the most astonishing act of foolishness, incompetence or knavery during the previous month.

Nominations are invited from our readers. Nominations should be accompanied by letters explaining clearly and concisely the reasons for which the award would be made. Nominees will normally be chosen from within the Atlantic region, though nominees whose actions seriously affect the Atlantic region are also welcome. There is no reason why Jean Marchand or Air Canada should not win the Award.

Successful—or whatever—nominees will receive a Presentation Rubber Duck... with a citation on our stationery explaining the grounds on which the award was made, as well as a copy of the issue of The Mysterious East which announces the award.

And readers who nominate the winners will receive Souvenir Rubber Ducks, with citations for valour and public spirit.

To kick the Awards off, we have already named one winner. The winner is a private corporation which was set up with lavish public funds in return for a promise to operate a vital public service in perpetuity. On this base, it built a huge financial empire; now the public service doesn't make money, so the company wants to drop it.

The Rubber Duck Award this month goes to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Canadian National Railways, whose cutbacks in service are a heavy blow to our region, is a closer runner-up. But CNR was never more than an amalgamation of unprofitable small railroads under public ownerships; the CPR is a private company, set up for private profit and sustained for years by government assistance.

Its charter gave it twenty-five million acres of land, including great tracts in the downtowns of many western cities; it was exempted from most forms of taxation; it was permitted to import its building materials duty-free; it was given liberty to build what branches it wanted while being protected by law from all railway competition south of the border by a twenty-year ban on rail lines south between the CPR and the border. It had cash grants and loans of over fifty million dollars, about half of which was repaid. In return it offered to operate a railway service.

Now the passenger services are losing money. The company isn't losing money; it's not even losing money on its freight services. It's losing money on its services to people. So it wants to drop almost all its passenger services—or have them heavily subsidized.

Well, hell—we put up the money to get that company going. Maybe it's time to press the government to take it back—all of it; hotels, real estate, mines, airplanes, ocean liners and all. Why should we build them a company and then pay subsidies on the parts that don't make money to go into their pockets?

In fact, CP's application to drop passenger services should make the Maritimes think again about this whole business of government loans, tax incentives and so forth to private companies. Even without considering disasters like Clairtone and the heavy water plant (which seem to indicate we only attract corporate cripples anyway) the companies expect us to live up to the letter of our promises—as K. C. Irving once made plain on the floor of the New Brunswick Legislature. But if the CPR is any indication, the companies don't expect us to insist on similar scruples from them.

We don't ever expect to give a more richly deserved Rubber Duck Award than this one.

I am confident, Mr. Chairman, that your Committee will give us no reason to give a Rubber Duck Award to it. However, it seems to us that you will have no lack of candidates for these awards once you have completed your hearings, and we hope that you will be good enough to nominate them.

On that assumption, I'd like to leave you a Souvenir—I repeat, a Souvenir Rubber Duck, and to commend you now for valour and public spirit.

And in closing, may I make a suggestion? I would like to suggest that as your inquiry proceeds, you keep this memento on your desk and, at the end of your hearings, look at it again to see what other tangible evidence you have received from people like Mr. Dennis, Mr. Costello, and Mr. Wardell to indicate that they, too, are going around making trouble for the wealthy and the powerful on behalf of the ordinary citizen of our troubled eastern provinces. I am perfectly confident that the little duck will be sitting there, full of perkiness and irreverence—and absolutely, totally alone.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Dr. Cameron, both for your remarks and the souvenir award, which I will certainly retain.

I think for the purposes of the discussion we are now going to have, we will ask you about everything you have said except the reasons for the award to the CPR, which is probably not within the aegis of this particular Committee.

I think Senator Prowse is going to start the questioning.

Senator Prowse: I am wondering where to start here. The first part of the questions was going to ask you, I am not sure that you have not covered some of them. In the first paragraph...

The Chairman: Is this the oral or the written brief?

Senator Prowse: No; the written brief.

The Chairman: It is from the written brief.

Senator Prowse: Yes. I think the oral brief speaks for itself. I am not sure I want to go into that one.

You said, about halfway down the page:

"All around me important stories were going unreported and undebated."

Would you like to just outline those? I note this reference is made throughout here. Can you give us perhaps some of the ones you consider to be outstanding examples of stories that have been unreported?

Professor Cameron: Well, I think that the kind of thing we are trying to do in the Mysterious East is in itself to some extent an answer to that.

We had in mind things like pollution, for example. We had a long story on pollution in our first issue. We pointed out the job that the press had not done on this.

I was particularly delighted when Mr. Wardell's magazine, the Atlantic Advocate, in late September, or the August issue, contained a little run-down on the dying Saint John River but was full of praise for the plants here that were cleaning it up.

As far as I could make out those are the same plants that we were talking about in our article and we could not find too much evidence that they were cleaning it up. The mentioned by name only one company, and that is the Vulcan plant, which is safely tucked away in Maine, and of course it does not advertise or anything about this.

Senator Prowse: That is the only one mentioned?

Professor Cameron: That is the only one mentioned by name.

Senator Prowse: One that is out of the country?

Professor Cameron: One that is out of the country.

Senator Prowse: The reason I asked you the question was, I would be glad to have you expand on this. As you realize, it is one thing to get an accusation but it is another thing for us to get a hard fact upon which we can rely, because when we have evidence from people who say that they do not suppress news except on the basis of, you know, good taste and motherhood and the generally accepted virtues, unless we have specific examples we are stuck with the evidence that is in front of us.

So if you have some evidence to lay down—and this is one—have you got any more?

Professor Cameron: Well, this now is a maller one, of course, but one which perhaps was fairly central to starting out the magazine, and that was the reporting by the Gleaner, and to a lesser extent the Telegraph-Journal—in fairness I think the Telegraph-Journal wanted to show—it is not all it could be but it is probably the best we have.

Senator Prowse: The best of a bad lot.

Professor Cameron: That is right, that could be it, but the Gleaner, for example, in reporting the disturbances last year at the university really—it seems quite clear—tailored its coverage in favour of the administration, and I am a loyal member of the Canadian Association of University Teachers which censured the university. It seems the university's action was indefensible, admittedly so, and there were professors whose actions were so indefensible, but I would have thought the institution could do better than the university did last year.

What we had was simply a sort of party line from the administration with no attention whatsoever to any kind of thing that provided the real answer.

We would get news like...

The Chairman: Dr. Cameron, on that point of the students, if I may just ask you one question. You mentioned both in your oral brief and now that the Gleaner and the Telegraph-Journal carried a story. You say it was written by the university's public relations officer.

Was the fact he was the university's public relations officer indicated in the byline?

Professor Cameron: No.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Professor Cameron: No. It was just "by Alan Pacey."

Again the kind of thing we would encounter would be this repeated accusation in the news coverage and editorial coverage that a small minority of rabble-rousers were causing trouble.

In fact, I would say there are roughly four thousand students at the university in the daytime. Two thousand of them were marching around the administration building—not going into it—they had been forbidden to go into it—but marching around in a protest demonstration.

Now, there is a pretty substantial rabble-rousing minority when it is half of the student body on that occasion.

I was told by the Gleaner reporter, who I think is not with the paper any more, that he had gone up there to cover some entirely different event, even though this protest had been well advertised in advance, and when he got up and he saw two thousand people milling around in the snow he called down and said, "Listen, we have got to get a photographer up here. We have got to do something on this story." He said, "We have got a story." But they had no intention of covering it whatsoever.

Senator Prowse: The ostrich approach to the news. In other words, you stick your head in the sand and hope it will be gone when you come out.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, this brings me to another point. Would I be being fair if I said that in your reviews you work on the principle that you want people to see your bias and you hope your logic will persuade them that you have a sound reason for it?

Professor Cameron: Yes. I would say we proceed on the principle that an unbiased report is probably impossible, and any report of an event is a selection of parts of the events which the person reporting deems to be significant.

I think some of the failings in the Maritime press are just the kind of person that is reporting.

We feel in our news that we make it perfectly clear what our kind of viewpoint is and the reader can make what allowances he sees fit.

Senator Prowse: We have had things said to us by one group that has most of its investment in newspapers, where they have a semi-monopoly situation—at least they have the only newspaper in each one of the areas they serve—and they expressed the thought that it would be improper for them in those circumstances to exploit their dominant position by taking an aggressive stand on any matter of controversy.

Would you comment on that attitude, as you see it?

Is that what they are doing in New Brunswick? Do they justify the fact that they do not cover certain things by saying that they operate under that philosophy?

Professor Cameron: I don't think they could possibly do that because in Fredericton in the issue...

Senator Prowse: Do they try or do they say that? Or have they been called to account?

Professor Cameron: You probably know more about what they say than I do but the Halifax papers, I note, recently made that point, that they did not stir up that where they thought it would be irresponsible.

Kenneth Bagnell's criticism in an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail magazine and one in our magazine said that the problem with the papers is that they are so heavily responsible as to constitute a kind of irresponsibility.

Senator Prowse: Would it be possible in fairness to say that some of the reasons for criticism might be then their attempt to lean over backwards in order not to be accused of bias?

Professor Cameron: I think that would be a rationalization that they might offer. I do not think that has anything to do with what they in fact do.

For example, the Gleaner's anti-pornography campaign was really an ideal case in point. They quite clearly attempted to whip up controversy which they were on the one side...

Senator Prowse: And where presumably all good people would be.

Professor Cameron: Yes, presumably.

Senator Prowse: You cannot really get into too much trouble with an anti-pornography campaign, can you?

Professor Cameron: Well, they did, you know. There are some of us who consider ourselves at liberty to read filthy books for the pleasure of filth, if we want to, and view that as more important than depraving the minds of the young who would probably not be depraved by that kind of thing anyway.

Senator Prowse: I rather enjoyed your letter which they refused to print. On the other hand, did you really expect them to publish it?

Professor Cameron: I really did not know you know. I had had one letter previously published by them where they had objected to Canada permitting people like Stokely Carmichael coming into the country and speaking to the black people in Nova Scotia, and so forth.

They had said we should keep him out at the border and that the immigration service should keep a record of known trouble-maker and so on.

I made the point, if a person had no record in Canada, we had no reason to keep him out and the only logical way we could keep him out or put him out would be if he did something to disturb us; not on the basis of what he might have done somewhere else.

They had published that one, so I really did not know whether they would or not. It was sort of a test case to see if there was anybody bright enough to catch the double entendre but, I guess, they are brighter than I am originally given them credit for.

Senator Prowse: But not possessed of an great sense of humour.

Professor Cameron: I would say I think no I think the Gleaner is a singularly humourless newspaper.

Well, no, I shouldn't really say that. They are a very, very humorous newspaper. But they didn't intend it.

Senator Prowse: Not the way they expected.

Professor Cameron: Right.

Senator Prowse: In other words, they had a good idea but it's not the one they thought was.

Professor Cameron: Right.

Senator Prowse: Let us go on then. We have got the ground rules on this. Let us go onto the more important aspects.

Senator Sparrow: May I ask a supplementary question?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Are you suggesting that individuals should be allowed into Canada regardless of the record they have in any other country; is that your suggestion? We should open up the borders to them?

Professor Cameron: I do not think that the kind of person who is coming here for a political activity, of which you and I may or may not approve, should be barred at the border.

I think I will put it this way: that Mr. Carmichael has the right to come in and make a speech, and if he wants to foment trouble and if he can foment trouble amongst the black people in Nova Scotia, that is probably because there are grievances he can point out to them.

I do not think it is fair to keep him out on that basis.

If, on the other hand, we have somebody who has been convicted of, say, a smuggling offence, or that kind of thing, well then, probably that case is different. Where it was the political side of this thing...

Senator Prowse: You are referring to the political side. I do not think you intended that to include reference to, say, a known Mafia character.

Professor Cameron: No, I did not intend it.

Senator Prowse: You were referring there merely to people because of their political attitudes; we are not going to censor political thoughts because it is censored in other countries?

Professor Cameron: That is right. That seems to me to be the thing.

Senator Prowse: I think you have covered your oral statement and you have in your brief—and I think everybody has read it—if they have not read it, after hearing your oral presentation, I am sure they will.

I read your brief where you covered the types of things that caused you to get into action, and then starting on page 4, paragraph 1, you start in with two suggestions.

What can be done about the media, especially in the Atlantic provinces, and the first suggestion is that the universities be entitled to set up their own FM stations.

Have they made application at the present time, do you know? Has there been any effort made to do this?

Professor Cameron: I do not have much detail with me about this. My understanding is that there have been and are a number of university stations in Canada.

I believe Queen's University at Kingston has one.

Senator Prowse: I think Alberta has one.

Professor Cameron: Alberta has one? I think the Regina campus in the University of Saskatchewan does, too. Is that correct?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Professor Cameron: I think in the Atlantic provinces there has been a good deal of interest. I know there was a group working on this in Dalhousie University when I was there and there is a group at the University of New Brunswick also interested in this, and here the problem, I think, is simply finding the money.

We have the physical facilities. We have a long record of closed-circuit radio, but it is simply money to put in a transmitter and to pay a couple of technical salaries.

Senator Prowse: You can get very inexpensive installations. We had one of the organizations, I think maybe it was the Indian and Metis Brotherhood who were here and suggested that for around $20,000 or $25,000 they thought—or even less—that they could set up a low-powered station that would have a 25-mile radius type of circulation. Would that type of thing do the same thing? Now, this can be picked up by people on their ordinary bands. By getting a low-power band in an area that is not going to get interference from local stations, they can sort of limit the area. Would this be any use to them down there?

Professor Cameron: This would be an AM band?

Senator Prowse: Yes, because everybody doesn't have FM receivers.

Professor Cameron: Yes. I think that would serve the same purpose. I think it would be of less use in New Brunswick than it would be in the more populated areas.

For instance, if we had one in Fredericton it would serve the metropolitan area of perhaps fifty thousand people or something of that nature, and obviously that is a fairly small proportion of the New Brunswick population.

Whereas in Montreal something of that nature would serve a great many people; around two million. Or something in that neighbourhood.

Senator Prowse: Let us give the universities a radius of around twenty or twenty-five miles for these small stations.

Professor Cameron: Probably.

Senator Prowse: Wouldn't they be able then, if you had them scattered around, they could serve that area; but so far as you know anyway, there has not been an application made yet to the CRTC for licensing of any station of the type that you could envisage here?

Professor Cameron: Unless these other ones...

Senator Prowse: As far as you know.

Professor Cameron: Unless these other ones fall in that category, those ones at Queen's and Alberta, but these are all AM stations.

Senator Prowse: No, I am talking about your area.

Professor Cameron: No, I don't think so, although I have heard there was an application made to have a station at St. Francis Xavier but I have not checked to find out more about that.

Senator MacDonald: I think they are quite close at St. Francis Xavier with the regular station there, CJFX.

Professor Cameron: Do they have a proportion of the time? Is that it?

Senator MacDonald: I think there is a very close contact.

Professor Cameron: I knew they were active in broadcasting. I did not know what the arrangement was.

Senator Prowse: Do you know whether the CBC would be prepared to go in and assist in the way of training and assisting personnel in developing talent that you envisage? Have you ever talked to them? You did work with them yourself. You know them fairly well. I wonder if you had discussed this with them at all.

Professor Cameron: I have only talked to local people. They would be very happy to help us on a sort of volunteer basis right there in the station without any sort of formal arrangement.

They would simply send somebody down for a couple of hours, you know, once a week or something of that nature.

As far as anything formal is concerned suspect their problem is financial.

Senator Prowse: Would it cost very much for them to do that limited amount of training in connection with their ordinary broadcasting duties, by bringing people in, letting them look and maybe letting them try a little practical work, or would they run into may be union difficulties?

Professor Cameron: That is right. They did indeed run into union difficulties.

We were going to put a radio workshop department in the English department last year, a radio drama workshop, and that was one of the suggestions. Perhaps we should go to the CBC and learn something about the technical side of it, and the CBC was very willing to have us do that but they made the point we could not possibly touch any of the dials, buttons and switches and so forth because if we did in fact handle the equipment, the union would be angry about breach of the contract or something of that nature.

Senator Prowse: Somebody would have got paid if the other fellow touched it.

Professor Cameron: No. Even so that seemed to feel if we were there with the regular operator you could not touch the equipment and there may be a union problem there.

Senator Prowse: So if this system is going to work, you will have to go into this area it will have to be worked out with a number of different people.

Professor Cameron: Yes, that is right, although that was last year. Now this year we have a brand-new situation. The University Student Council has put up something like $15,000 for new equipment for radio UNB, which is a closed-circuit arrangement, and the new equipment of course is broadcasting level and broadcasting quality and could, of course, have CBC personnel training on people with our equipment which would take it, get around the union problem.

Senator Prowse: I see. Now, then, we go to the second one. You say the liaison between the universities and the media could be closer. That is what we have been talking about.

On the third one on page 5, paragraph

The Chairman: On the CBC?

Senator Prowse: No, this is the Drama Festival, quite aside from the CBC. It has nothing to do with radio and television.

Professor Cameron: That is still going on, certainly, and thriving, as far as I understand it.

Senator Prowse: The reason I asked you the question is that I know some of the radio stations—I do not think TV have done it in Edmonton—but the radio station in Edmonton used to make use of these drama groups...

The Chairman: Senator Prowse they cannot hear at the back.

Senator Prowse: ... used to make use of the local drama groups to do dramatizations on radio and the people in the drama group were quite happy about it, and so were the public that was listening.

So far there has been no attempt to initiate any programs like that outside of Don Messer.

Professor Cameron: Well, perhaps I can tell you a story that casts some light on this. When I was teaching at Dalhousie back in 1957-68 the drama school—some people in the drama school and I as a writer of plays and they as producers and actors and so on became interested in the idea of producing and writing plays for television and producing them for television and producing them over the CBC or the CTV station in Halifax, you know, at some off-peak period—some time instead of the Edge of Night, or something of that nature, or possibly even late at night, one or two in the morning before sign-off.

We drew up a fairly detailed proposal and we had two or three scripts in mind and we certainly had the actors and producers. They did not know anything about television and the whole aim of the thing was to find out about television, to actually get them doing it.

We took this proposal to the CBC and Mr. Kennedy, who was the regional director, wrote me a very brief letter in which he just said "We do not anticipate any drama productions from this region." Period.

CJCH Television were quite interested but for various reasons it did not go ahead. It was not their fault that it did not go ahead but their problem was money.

They said it was going to cost them $300 or $400, and they didn't have $300 or $400 for that; that their production time was spent making commercials and this kind of thing.

Senator Prowse: Do you think you could put on a local production for $300 or $400?

Professor Cameron: Well, they indicated this. That was a situation in which we would provide the actors and directors and so on and they would provide a camera crew and I think a producer to work with.

Senator Prowse: Do you know whether the arrangements they had, like the actor arrangement with the actors of the CBC set-up, whether they would let you use enthusiastic amateurs?

Professor Cameron: I really do not know because I never got to the level of discussing this kind of problem.

Senator Prowse: I think the Committee would be interested in knowing to what extent this matter of local production results from a lack of initiative on the part of the TV people and to what extent, if at all, it results from road blocks that have been set up because of other arrangements that have been made, for a very good reason, throughout the system.

Professor Cameron: Yes. I really do not think I can cast too much light on that. That is probably an internal CBC question. Probably the CBC could answer it.

Senator Prowse: We will ask them when they come here.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And then in the fourth one you suggest that:

"Monopolies such as the one in New Brunswick should, ideally, be dismantled."

You refer particularly to the Irving set-up. Then you say:

"I must reluctantly suggest that some regulation of the permissible extent of monopoly control of a region's newspapers also deserves consideration.

"Where a newspaper has an effective local monopoly, it should not be permitted ownership of broadcasting enterprises in the same geographical area."

Now, we have had a number of newspaper publishers who have said, "We are attempting to get a foothold in the electronic area," and who have explained the reason for it, which is, as a hedge against possible future technological developments such as the print-out of newspapers on home sets which they see in the not too distant future, apparently.

Now, what would be your reaction to that itself?

Professor Cameron: I see the logic of it. I am not sure that is an appropriate response to the problem.

I am at a loss to provide a better one short of simply getting electronic expertise in some other form.

Obviously that is much more expensive. It does not make any money.

Senator Prowse: One of the explanations that has been given to us...

The Chairman: Excuse me again, Senator Prowse. They cannot hear you and they particularly cannot hear Professor Cameron.

I might say, Senator Prowse, I am going to let you finish this line of questioning and some of the other senators have indicated they want to ask some questions.

We will return to you, of course.

Senator Prowse: I have just a couple of questions here which seem to be important.

The next point I had and then I will leave this one about the monopoly. Maybe some of the other senators can chew on that. But the one I really was interested in is on page 6, paragraph 19:

"We ought to consider, at least, setting up a national bilingual newspaper published simultaneously from coast to coast..."

And then:

"Alternatively, we could offer financial support to dailies prepared to try to become national papers. An immediate step would be to subsidize, either through preferential freight rates or otherwise, air-speeded delivery to remote areas of major metropolitan dailies or of special editions of those dailies."

Do you think that the Government of Canada would be able to get away with subsidizing the press without being accused of trying to muzzle or buy it?

How can we set this up to ensure that the kind of charge would, on the face of it, be patently ridiculous?

Professor Cameron: One obvious response is to say if the newspapers do not want the money, do not take it. You know, if they are really concerned that they should assert their independence, they should stay out of the scheme.

Senator Prowse: What do you imagine would be the result of a situation in newspapers right across Canada in every place where Air Canada stops if the Globe and Mail decided they were going to put a paper in every city in Canada?

What would it cost, say, in air freight to subsidizing, say, fifty thousand papers daily in Edmonton, fifty thousand in Calgary, thirty thousand in Saskatoon, and thirty thousand in Regina, and one hundred thousand in Winnipeg?

Specifically, take areas where this might be a nice thought.

Professor Cameron: It would obviously be an extremely expensive proposition but possibly technologists will provide us with some better answers such as electric print-out of this kind of thing. This may well be a better answer. I do not know. Again probably helping speaking of the confusion—For example, have been shown the coverage of these hearings from the Toronto and Montreal papers and so forth.

Now, I can get these where I live but they come in two or three days late. You have to make a special trip downtown to get them.

As a matter of fact, you simply do not get them. You cannot get them delivered and on.

Whether it is the best answer over the long haul, may be open to question, but it does seem that some means by which you can have competition in the monopoly newspaper area is a critically important thing; and the reason I suggested it in this form was any newspaper which wanted to try it presumably should be given some kind of subsidy.

Whether it is prohibitively expensive, I do not know. I have not examined the economics of the thing.

My main concern is that there should be some way of getting a newspaper that is not immediately controlled by the local monopoly.

Senator Prowse: We would be interested in getting a practical suggestion. That is why I picked this up because it is intriguing but I am not sure it is practical.

The Chairman: Dr. Cameron, we will move on to other senators, but before we do I would like to ask you one question.

You say on page 1 of your oral brief:

"We consider the Gleaner a dreadful newspaper."

Why do you buy it; or do you buy it?

Professor Cameron: Oh, sure.

The Chairman: Why?

Professor Cameron: Well, for one thing everybody needs a light moment in the course of a day; but aside from that there just is not any other everyday source of news you can actually have written down.

The Chairman: The reason I put the question to you is that publisher after publisher has come before us and said that the public makes their decision every day.

Presumably many publishers at least think if you buy the paper that is a form of approval.

Professor Cameron: Then I will cancel my subscription, if that is what you think.

The Chairman: I am not suggesting that.

Professor Cameron: I think it is patently obvious why one—because if you look at the situation, for example, as a consumer in this situation, if I want coverage of local affairs to any extent whatsoever the only source that really does cover Fredericton at all is the Gleaner.

The Telegraph-Journal makes an attempt. The Telegraph-Journal covers sort of major stories. If there is a major dust-up in Fredericton, it is in the Telegraph-Journal; but if I am looking for a little news like what went on at City Council last night, all this kind of thing, there really is not any other place I can get it with the sole exception of the CBC, and with the CBC, I cannot clip it out and keep it, if it is of some significance.

Senator Smith: I would like to ask Dr. Cameron a question about his reference in his oral submission to the welfare monster, I suppose you would call it.

How do you know last April the paper intended to write a story on welfare and was looking for a drama that might be tied into how horrible and how cruel this welfare system was? How do you know that?

Professor Cameron: Let me understand that.

Senator Smith: ...it showed welfare as a racket.

Professor Cameron: That is the point: what are we looking for? What the Gleaner was looking for was pretty clear and it was recipients who were receiving money they were not entitled to. That is, it was after the recipient of welfare rather than the welfare workers as a sort of monster, going from family to family and stuff like that to find practices which the Gleaner would be expected to espouse.

The reason we know about this is, of course, the reporter did in fact go out and did interview a number of people, not around the welfare department, including welfare recipients and so forth, and said to several people at the conclusion of this investigation he had come out with his mind made up, and he had changed his mind, that he could not find any evidence of this and by and large he thought that the welfare department was necessary and useful, and indeed practically doing a noble kind of work.

He had certainly clearly changed his mind. He went to get a story down there and the story did not appear. Some people who had been questioned subsequently asked him about it and he said, "Yes, it has been"—I don't know how he expressed it. I do not know if he used the word "suppressed." In any case it did not get printed.

He said, "Why do you not phone the Gleaner or write the Gleaner and ask them why not?" because he was quite anxious to see the story which he did write in fact get printed, and he felt he was not in a position and he didn't see how he could do that, and the matter was never proceeded with in that way.

Senator Smith: Do you think that is a very serious thing for a newspaper to do, to examine a subject and then decide on their editorial experience the public do not want to read about this?

We have been told on a number of occasions—I do not know whether it is from witnesses or members of the Committee, that good news sometimes is not news.

I think in terms of this particular subject there are a very substantial number of people who make assumptions about "Oh, this welfare is a racket" and they would not say it if they thought about it.

They were also making the same assumptions some years ago about family allowances: "Oh, well, people just go down to the liquor store." You do not hear this so much now.

If somebody had sent a reporter out to examine into what happened to family allowances—that has been done but it has been done by the public service; not reporters—but if the reporter came back to his newspaper saying, "Well, we made an examination and some of it goes to life insurance and some goes to buy kiddies' clothing and so on; we didn't find very much evidence of poor purchases"; do you think that should be published as a story? Would that have, in your opinion, reader interest?

Professor Cameron: I would be very surprised if a thorough investigation of something of that kind would not turn up something that would be of reader interest.

I think this is what this reporter had in mind on that. As I understand it, he felt he had discovered that there was a fairly considerable group of people in Fredericton, who, for one reason or another, were on welfare and who really needed it.

I think he felt he had seen some dramatic examples of what welfare was for and he wrote a story, which I gather was full of this kind of thing. "Where does your welfare money go?" "Are we in fact paying where it is needed?"

He went on to say, "Well, these are the people who are getting it and this is the kind of problem that it is resolving." You know, three cheers for solving that kind of problem.

Senator Smith: You may have lots of examples to support your statement about the Sydney Herald and the Telegraph-Journal or the Moncton Times. I do not know just how many examples you have but I just wondered whether this was a valid one or not.

I was reminded of the non-story aspect of it when I was told—and this is one of those stories which nobody seems to want to prove to me—that a certain and quite prominent weekly publication in this country sent its journalists out across the country with instructions to mail a letter at a certain time on a certain day and the idea was to demonstrate the bad postal service. The story is told mostly by postal employees and that is the point to this. The only letter that took two days or longer was one from the Northwest Territories. All the rest appeared at the headquarters of this office within two days, and of course there was no story. In fact, they were not interested in printing that sort of thing.

Professor Cameron: Yes, I agree, there are certain non-stories. My understanding of it was that this reporter did in fact feel there was a positive story.

Senator Smith: I want to ask you something else. In your moving as a young man from Vancouver which I think is a swingy place—I have never lived there but it gives me the impression that it is a different kind of place than you would find in beautiful Fredericton and that part of Halifax.

When you went to Dalhousie to teach there, when you moved from that environment into the Maritime environment, did you feel yourself conscious of living among people who have different concepts? They seem to enjoy the quiet life and they are slow to accept change, even if it is for their own good; do you believe that is a valid reason for most of our newspapers reflecting that kind of life style or life philosophy?

Professor Cameron: Well, I do find some flavour of the quality you point to, but I had a very odd experience. I did not go directly to the Maritimes. I went from Vancouver to England for three years and after those three years I came to Nova Scotia. I had not been here since 1964 so it was a very different place now from what I remembered.

To me the sense of it is "Yes, there are now some different attitudes" and some of the attitudes I think are gradually being proven right.

I think for example there is a certain skepticism in the Maritimes about progress which is seen on the basis of this story on pollution which, to a considerable extent, is justified. I do not think it looked justified 15 years ago but I think it does look justified now.

To me the sort of sense of it has been that there was a fairly considerable community of people in the Maritimes who were anxious to see a certain intelligent kind of change and who really did not have the vehicles upon which to press for this kind of thing.

I think of a man like Alan O'Brien, the Mayor of Halifax, for example, who seems to be a fairly admirable political figure. I do not think that he has really had an opportunity to make his views known as widely as he might.

That may be a bad example but that is the kind of person I find in the Maritimes, as well as the conservative side of it.

Just in passing I think one thing that I ought to say because not enough people seem to say it: I got off a plane the first time I arrived in Halifax; I got off the plane in Halifax and looked at the rather dreary aspect of Halifax Airport and rode in on the bus.

By the time I got to downtown Halifax I felt that for the first time in my life I was home. I had never been there before, and I felt that I belonged there. And I have never ceased to feel that way about it.

Senator Smith: In your experience as a writer and observer in the newspaper publishing field and so on, do you think there is any virtue at all in a Nova Scotian being the owner of a Nova Scotian newspaper and a few Brunswickers being the owner and publisher of a newspaper published in New Brunswick?

Professor Cameron: I rather wish you hadn't asked that question because I find myself in the profoundly embarrassing position of agreeing with K. C. Irving on this.

Senator Smith: Well, all right. Let us leave that.

Senator Prowse: If he wants to answer it, let him.

Professor Cameron: No. I do agree with Mr. Irving. I do prefer myself to see a local owner because I think it is probably easier to get at him in some ways.

You know, I am not sure, but if Canada is a branch plant economy, then the Maritimes is a branch plant of the branch plant, so to speak.

There are a great many enterprises in the Maritimes, it is true, but it seems to me the big decisions are made elsewhere and not by the people affected.

The Sydney Steel Corporation as it is now, the decision that brought about the Sydney Steel Corporation, I would think, is a perfect example of that kind of thing. I think we ought to minimize that. The people affected by these things ought as much as possible to know about them or have access to them.

Senator Smith: You think it would be to the advantage of the people of Nova Scotia—that we come back to that—to have a publisher-owner of a newspaper in that province who may have come from some other part of the country in order to bring a fresh attitude to the publishing business?

Professor Cameron: Well, really, that comes down to asking me whether I ought to exist, and obviously I think so.

Senator Smith: I am speaking more of a daily newspaper.

Professor Cameron: Yes, I know. But in essence the same principle applies because the Mysterious East is to a considerable extent staffed by people who are not native Maritimers. By and large we are all refugees from other places which we considered uninhabitable.

One of our men is from Chicago. He has come to the Maritimes because he thinks there is a chance of making some money, and it is a reasonably intelligent place to live.

The Chairman: Are any of them from Toronto?

Professor Cameron: I wish you hadn't asked me that.

Senator Prowse: You have to draw the line somewhere.

Professor Cameron: I wish you had not asked me that because I was born there, although I left it when I was two and have been back for only one day, which seems to me to be enough.

Senator Smith: We were talking about attitudes that are no longer valid. Maybe there is no longer a place for a Senator William Dennis, who is the father of the present publisher of the Halifax paper, and who in my opinion—I am sure in the opinion of my fellow Nova Scotian, Senator MacDonald—whose paper did a lot of good things for the Province of Nova Scotia, but maybe that day is gone. Maybe we need a different kind of newspaper.

He was a great propagandist for Nova Scotia. He pressed what he called "Maritime rights." I am not sure we had Maritime rights but we had a case for special treatment and we are seeing some results of it in the last ten or fifteen years.

I suggest to you that might influence the kind of newspapers we have.

Professor Cameron: It could well be, but insofar as the ownership in the area is part of the cause of the problem, then I think we are on the horns of a dilemma because obviously

I do feel ownership in the area is an important thing, is a desirable thing.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator McElman: I have a supplementary.

The Chairman: All right.

Senator McElman: You are on the record that you agree with Mr. Irving that local people should own local newspapers.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator McElman: I should like to go on record that I agree with it, too, but how local is local?

The Chairman: The question now is "how local is local?"

Senator McElman: New Brunswick is local.

Professor Cameron: Yes.

Senator McElman: How local is local? Do you follow along and still agree that he should own them all?

Professor Cameron: No, certainly not.

Senator McElman: I think the record should be clear.

Professor Cameron: No, I do not agree he should own them all but I do agree, if possible, they should be mostly owned by people who live in and around the communities they serve.

Senator Sparrow: Doctor, you referred in your brief—I cannot give you the numbers particularly, although it starts at page 5, where you suggest "Monopolies such as the one in New Brunswick should, ideally, be dismantled."

Then you refer in another section to assistance to competing newspapers or newspaper publications which wish to compete, to assist in breaking these monopolies.

Are you suggesting both of these methods or which one of them would you think is the best method of doing it?

If there is a way of dismantling, are you suggesting the dismantling be by actual legislation once it is established?

Can you expand on that?

Professor Cameron: I am not sure what the appropriate machinery would be to dismantle the monopolies. I have not gone into any anti-combines affairs seriously such as there is, and I am not sure what the mechanism ought to be.

I think there is a problem with the press and any interference with it is obviously going to bring the kind of screams that you have been hearing from various people like Mr. Costello.

A really practical answer I think would be this one of subsidizing or being prepared to grant some kind of loan to a newspaper or to a group of people who can show that they had the expertise to produce a newspaper and were ready to produce a newspaper. But the person simply did not have the capital. That one would be perfectly fair.

The kind of thing that bothers me, it seems to me, is that the businessmen like to say they believe in competition and that freedom improves competition, whereas we see in the Maritimes and in a number of cases patent it does not.

I come back to my original premise that competition is a good thing and if the private sector does not furnish it, then perhaps the public ought to.

Senator Sparrow: Competition is the way to break the backs of the monopoly. Basically that is what you are suggesting in the brief.

Professor Cameron: Yes, I think that would be right. At the very least, Frank Fillmore, who is with the Fourth Estate in Halifax, who once asked what he hoped to achieve in the Fourth Estate. He said, "If we do not achieve anything else we might succeed in making the Halifax daily into a serious newspaper," and I think that even that effect would be worth some money.

He said, "Even if it did not succeed, even if it did not make an impression with the local market, it should exist for that."

Senator Sparrow: With the local monopoly to which you refer there seems to be no indication of groups or chains of newspapers in Canada breaking into that market, although we did have one witness who said they would be prepared to. In your study on that ownership, do you feel that there could be some corporate agreement that outside groups stay out of the Maritimes as such; is it just they have no interest in going there particularly, or why are they not there?

Professor Cameron: Well, I think recently they are. There is—I forget which one of Charlottetown papers—but one of them is owned by Southam.

The Chairman: No; Thomson Newspapers are in Charlottetown.

Professor Cameron: I doubt there is any blanket agreement of that kind. What I would suspect is that there is an agreement probably among the board rooms that that is more or less K. C. Irving's territory, or something like that. That would be more what I would suspect, probably not even an overt agreement; just simply a thought. If somebody suggested you had better not tangle with Mr. Irving because you come away with a little less flesh or something like that.

Senator Prowse: He may be bigger and tougher than they are.

Professor Cameron: He may be.

Senator Sparrow: I read with a great deal of pleasure your written brief last night and your verbal one today, but I was a little concerned about—this is perhaps in a lighthearted vein—you said "The Gleaner is for the police, even the Chicago police."

The Chairman: Where is that, senator?

Senator Sparrow: After page 11.

On the second paragraph about halfway down you are jokingly suggesting that you may be wrong about the Gleaner. "The Gleaner is for the police, even the Chicago police" and it seems to indicate that because the Gleaner is for the police that they are in fact wrong. Actually I am for the police.

Professor Cameron: There is a sort of civil liberties consideration that comes in here. I agree that the police are obviously a necessity and deserve our support in many ways, and so on.

There is also—and I think we have seen a fair amount of evidence in the last few years—there is a tendency in some cases for some police forces to really offend the liberties of the individual.

There is very, very little protection for them in some respects. So my point here is that the Gleaner has never, to my knowledge, been critical of the police force for anything.

Not too long ago the narcotics squad were asking a few questions of thirteen-year-old schoolchildren at the principal's office of the high school, without witnesses and without counsel for the children, and without warning the children of their legal rights, and without allowing them telephone calls; that kind of thing.

It seems to me that is scandalous, but I am sure the Gleaner does not think it is scandalous, and they wrote an editorial, I think, before the report of the Chicago disorders was received, and in that it said the Chicago police were simply doing their job, and so on, when in fact I think people had seen it on the television, running demonstrators against the wall with motor cycles, which seemed a little beyond the call of duty to me, at least.

Senator Sparrow: It was just an offhand type of statement in your brief, I assume?

Senator Prowse: A figure of speech.

Professor Cameron: Yes, I think you can say that. I think that would be fair.

Senator McElman: In the context of the Fredericton area, of which you were speaking, would you agree that the attitude they have displayed with respect to the police is somewhat anomalous with relation to the attitude they have displayed with respect to government enforcement authorities, such as the Combines Branch?

Professor Cameron: Yes. I think there is a certain contradiction there.

Senator Sparrow: Just one more question. On page 5 you refer to the stodginess of our television compared with that of Britain. I understand you studied in London not too long ago.

Professor Cameron: That's right.

Senator Sparrow: You have had a recent comparison?

Professor Cameron: I was there from 1961 to 1964 and again for a month last summer.

Senator Sparrow: How do you compare the two media then in England and in Canada?

Professor Cameron: Let us just say I think we could probably include our TV as well as the BBC over there.

My particular interest in this is the interest of a playwright. What happened to me when I was in Ontario; I had taken on more or less a kind of characteristic of a university person's view of television of the early fifties and more or less said, "Well, of course, I do not have one," you know.

We went to England and we had a television which came with the place we were living in and I worked for the BBC in a series like, for instance, Wednesday Play.

I was suddenly sort of startled because it seemed to me this was bound to be the popular art form of the future, you know; that it was capable of being an art form, and that they had gone a long way towards making it an art form which reached a great many people and was obviously enjoyed by a great many people.

You get in the BBC all kinds of original drama, for example, written and commissioned by the BBC from first-rate writers dealing with whatever the writer happens to wish to deal with, and often dealing with contemporary subjects in Great Britain.

I found—we had a television set for six months when we were in Halifax and there was very, very little of that. Occasionally you may get something from the National Film Board presenting a show or something like Festival, but there was very, very little encouragement, as it were, for a writer in Canada to go into television, which disappointed me bitterly because that is what I wanted to do, to a considerable extent; original drama in television. That kind of thing I found wanting.

I feel the BBC does view it as being a serious art form. I think the ITV does, for that matter, too.

I do not think that by and large the CBC has done very much with television here up to this point. I do not think that is conflicting with entertainment either. I think really good dramas are really entertaining.

Senator Sparrow: What are your views on Festival then?

Professor Cameron: Well, I did not see enough of it. Again, as I think I have said in my brief, we had a television for six months. We gave it up. But from what I have seen, only two or three shows as a matter of fact, am very much impressed with the little I saw of it.

The Chairman: Dr. Cameron, there are other senators who wish to ask you questions. Perhaps I can ask you for our information in passing: what is the circulation of the Mysterious East?

Professor Cameron: I wish I knew. We print now six thousand. We seem to be disposing of most of them. We still do not have the final figures from the newsstand for even the first edition.

The Chairman: Would you know what the circulation of the Highlander would be?

Professor Cameron: I believe it is over twelve thousand.

The Chairman: How about the Fourth Estate, in round figures?

Professor Cameron: It is something in the neighbourhood of seven or eight thousand.

Mr. Spears: Nine or ten thousand.

The Chairman: You say seven to eight thousand; Mr. Spears said about nine thousand.

Professor Cameron: I know it has grown very rapidly. The figure I have is from last December, or November.

The Chairman: Does the Mysterious East have any political affiliation?

Professor Cameron: No.

Senator MacDonald: Just on that point there, I wonder if you would care to comment on the fact your criticism of the news media seems to be pretty harsh but some of the articles in the Mysterious East seem to be articles which would be more appropriate to a magazine to have that type of article rather than by a daily newspaper.
